TERRORISM NEWS:

Captured Documents Show Iraq Al Qaeda Plotted Attacks In US. ABC World News (1/22, story 3, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "American officials have long feared that insurgent and terrorist activity in Iraq could spill over into this country, and now it appears those fears were justified. For the first time, American officials uncovered a plan by al Qaeda in Iraq to strike inside the United States." ABC (Thomas) added that "highly-classified incident documents" were "captured in a raid on an al Qaeda in Iraq safe house," and "sources tell ABC News the documents show al Qaeda in Iraq was developing a plan to slip terrorists into the US using student visas, the same technique used by the 9/11 hijackers. … The plot was discovered six months ago, around the time Zarqawi was killed by coalition forces." The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 3, :30, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "CBS News has learned al Qaeda wanted to use student visas to get terrorists into this country. Intelligence officials say all of those involved have either been captured or killed."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Meyer, 850K) reports, "The plot appeared to be little more than an informal list of Al Qaeda-affiliated operatives and initial plans…said one official. But it was deemed serious enough to alert the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security, which mobilized agents in the United States to look for possible terrorists and for signs of attempted infiltration, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss classified details of the case."

D'Souza Says Radical Muslims Hate US Popular Culture, Not Freedom. In a USA Today (1/23, 2.27M) op-ed, author Dinesh D'Souza writes that Americans "are still under the illusion that America is fighting a war against the enemies of modernity. … In President Bush's words, 'They hate our freedoms.'" On the contrary, D'Souza notes, "Radical Islam's main charge against America is that we are a decadent, immoral society that is projecting its culture and values throughout the world and threatening their faith." D'Souza adds that the Bush administration "should stop calling for democracy worldwide," and "show the rest of the world the face of traditional America. … And America should promote traditional family values, not feminism and homosexual rights, in international forums like the United Nations. If traditional Muslims realized that there are millions of Americans who go to church, take care of their families and live by traditional values, they would be less likely to view us or our leaders as the Great Satan, and fewer of them will be tempted to join the camp of the Islamic radicals."

Prosecutors Claim Padilla Defense Leak Could Taint Jury. The AP (1/23, Anderson) reports, "The leak of transcripts of Jose Padilla's intercepted telephone conversations by a defense lawyer to The New York Times violated a court order and could jeopardize selection of an impartial jury, federal prosecutors said Monday. … 'There is no question that the disclosure was calculated and deliberate, with the effect of exposing potential jurors to evidence before it is introduced at trial when both sides will have the opportunity to argue its significance,' prosecutors said in court papers." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke has scheduled a hearing Wednesday on the issue, the latest in a string of complications to arise in the case of the alleged al-Qaida operative." The AP adds, "Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and former Chicago gang member, is charged with being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremists. Originally accused of plotting a radioactive 'dirty bomb' attack after his 2002 arrest, Padilla was designated an enemy combatant by President Bush and held without criminal charge at a Navy brig for 3 1/2 years. … He was added to an existing Miami terrorism-support case in late 2005 during a legal battle over the president's wartime detention powers. The dirty bomb allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment. … Three Miami-based public defenders representing Padilla - Michael Caruso, Anthony Natale and Orlando do Campo - admitted in court papers that 'one of Jose Padilla's counsel' provided the transcripts to a Times reporter for a story published Jan. 4. The lawyer responsible was not identified."

Administration's Change Of Surveillance Policy Sparks Commentary. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/23) reports, "Just watching Alberto Gonzales being grilled over the Bush administration's new, classified domestic-surveillance agreement with the FISA court was an exercise in frustration. One can only imagine what it was like for the senators doing the grilling; they were simply trying to figure out whether the deal undermines or meets the intent of their own law to protect Americans' privacy." The Tribune continues, "They didn't get very far. In Thursday's Judiciary Committee hearing, the ever soft-spoken, ever genial attorney general would neither describe FISA orders that ended the warrantless wiretap program nor agree that senators had a right to see them. … That stance is untenable. Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to prevent unlawful eavesdropping by government, and it cannot determine whether to give congressional blessing to the new rules or amend the FISA law unless its members -- who are accustomed to receiving sensitive, classified material -- know how the rules work. Congress must press the White House until it gets the information." The Tribune adds, "Talks between the executive branch and the FISA court reportedly accelerated after the November elections. According to the Los Angeles Times, government officials said the negotiations 'centered on securing an agreement that would allow the administration to seek warrants on groups of people in certain circumstances, rather than being required to obtain separate court orders for every individual under suspicion.' The Times said the changes 'appear to require individual warrants when the target is a U.S. citizen or has permanent legal resident status.' … But senators heard no such explanation from Gonzales. They must persevere until they do."

The Staten Island Advance (NY) (1/23) editorializes, "Late last week U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in a two-page letter to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, announced the death of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the super-secret program authorized by the president to eavesdrop on phone calls and e-mails of Americans believed to be communicating with suspected terrorists. … Mr. Gonzales' announcement ended a 13-month brewing battle over the constitutionality of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the warranteless wiretapping conducted by the Bush administration, which had vehemently defended its right to conduct super-secret eavesdropping on phone calls and e-mails of Americans without going through the well-established legal channels before doing so." The Advance adds, "Democrats are crowing that the Bush administration could no longer -- in the face of widespread criticism from scholars and some Justice Department lawyers -- defend its actions. … But one senior Justice Department official said: 'Obviously, this issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny ... considering all of these circumstances, the president determined that this was the appropriate course.' … So, has the administration actually backed down on one of its key interpretations of executive power? … Already some are speculating that the Gonzales letter is really a Trojan Horse. They claim that a closer reading of the letter provides a major, unresolved loophole the administration plans to exploit. … Regardless, of which side of this debate readers fall, the program raised troubling questions, not the least of which is the extent and depth of presidential powers even in the time of war. … That fact is the most worrisome about this whole affair, that the White House, having publicly announced its compliance, would behind the scenes still do just the opposite."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (1/23) editorializes, "'The truth of the matter is we looked at FISA, and we all concluded there's no way we can do what we have to do to protect this country under the strict reading of FISA.' … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week … The element of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that likely caused such consternation? The one that said eavesdropping on Americans should occur with a warrant. And the all-too-typical administration response? Ignore the law." The Sentinel adds, "FISA actually is abundantly clear on this matter of warrants. Nonetheless, the administration had some choices. It could have asked Congress to change the law. It might have noted another part of FISA that allowed warrantless surveillance on an emergency basis for 72 hours before the warrant was requested. … Instead, the Bush administration followed the now familiar script - it ignored the law until it looked as if it would be forced to comply. Last week, the Justice Department announced that it would put its surveillance program under FISA court supervision. This occurred weeks after Democrats assumed control of Congress, just before Gonzales was to appear before the Senate committee and two weeks before a federal appeals court in Cincinnati was going to hear arguments about whether the program is legal. The administration's change of heart was clearly no coincidence. … Congress must continue its oversight of this program. The court cases challenging it must also proceed. There are simply too many unanswered questions."

In an op-ed for the Washington Times (1/23), Bruce Fein writes, "George Orwell had his 'Animal Farm,' and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has his version of the Constitution. … According to the attorney general, the three branches of the government are equal, but President Bush is more equal than Congress or the Supreme Court. Thus, the president is constitutionally empowered to open mail, conduct electronic surveillance, break and enter homes, or torture detainees in defiance of federal statutes. Congress is impotent to check the president's national security powers to prevent the massive intelligence abuses disclosed by the Church Committee, including the gathering of political intelligence under a false foreign intelligence banner. Mr. Gonzales further lectures that the president is authorized to sign bills passed by Congress but to disregard those portions he asserts are unconstitutional, which is tantamount to a line-item veto power rejected by the Supreme Court in New York v. Clinton (1998). … He adds that President Bush, like British kings, can do no wrong in national security matters. Thus, the Supreme Court improperly rebuked the commander in chief over indefinite detentions of alleged unlawful enemy combatants, habeas corpus and military commissions by disputing Mr. Gonzales' doctrine of presidential infallibility doctrine." Fein adds, "The Founding Fathers, in contrast, believed the three branches of government should be equal in the Constitution's checks and balances. Since men were not angels -- even saintly President George Washington -- ambition must be made to counteract ambition to forestall the tyranny of 'Animal Farm.' Judicial review of presidential actions was enshrined in the expectation the White House would chronically seek to usurp or misuse power to boost its political standing, especially in times of conflict." Fein concludes, "Notwithstanding the attorney general, the equilibrium of power among the legislative, executive and judicial branches has proven the best way to preserve an enlightened democratic dispensation for the ages."

The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (1/23) editorializes, "A year ago, when the program of warrantless wiretapping of overseas calls came to light, the Bush administration argued strongly that the surveillance was outside the purview of the courts. … By virtue of the president's executive powers on behalf of national security, the White House said, the administration already had the power to monitor those communications. … And aside from the inherent powers that gave the president the right to monitor those calls, the kind of massive electronic eavesdropping that was being done by the National Security Agency simply made the Carter-era Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court an outmoded tool for dealing with the threat of terrorism." The Caller-Times continues, "Trust us, the White House said reassuringly: The program has all the necessary constitutional protections built into its system without any courts. … Then the November elections happened. And last week, in a quiet turnabout, the Bush administration announced that it was discontinuing the program of warrantless wiretaps and said that any future wiretaps would be done under the authority of the FISA Court. … It was a welcome change of method, even if it did not represent a change of heart on the part of the Bush White House." The Caller-Times adds, "The warrantless wiretapping program was an abuse of presidential powers and its dismantling should be welcomed by Americans. The program, while it operated, overrode one of the basic constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures by the power of the state. That abuse fit the Bush administration's view that national security trumps all other concerns, when in fact the need to preserve our way of life in times of crisis demands that we uphold those constitutional protections then more zealously than ever."

US To Keep Syrian-Born Canadian On Terrorism Watch List. The New York Times (1/23, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "Despite a Canadian inquiry that cleared a Syrian-born Canadian citizen of any terrorist ties, the Bush administration has formally refused a Canadian government request that it remove the man, Maher Arar, from the terrorist watch list, saying that the United States has secret information justifying his inclusion." In a letter sent last week to Canadian public safety minister Stockwell Day, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that "their departments and American intelligence agencies 'have re-examined the materials in the possession of the United States regarding Mr. Arar.'" Sen. Patrick Leahy, who last week "angrily pressed Mr. Gonzales about the case," said in a statement yesterday, "This abhorrent practice stains America's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights, and I hope this administration will renounce it at long last."

CNN.com (1/23) reports, "American officials said Monday that a Canadian should remain on a U.S. terrorist watch list despite the Canadian government's conclusion otherwise and its apology after the designation led to his detention in Syria." CNN continues, "In a joint letter, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff informed Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety, that they had again looked at intelligence in their possession concerning Maher Arar. … 'Based on this re-examination, we remain of the view that the continued watch listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate,' the U.S. officials said. … 'Our conclusion in this regard is supported by information developed by U.S. law enforcement agencies that is independent of that provided to us by Canada regarding Mr. Arar.'" CNN adds, "In 2002, U.S. officials detained Arar at a New York airport as he was trying to return home to Canada from a vacation in Tunisia. Canada had placed Arar, a Syrian native, on a terrorism watch list. He said the United States arrested him and eventually sent him to Syria, where he allegedly was tortured and held for 10 months. … In September, a Canadian report concluded that Arar wasn't a terrorism suspect. Gonzales has said the U.S. legally deported Arar and didn't send him to Syria to be tortured. Syria defends its handling of the case, saying a Canadian diplomat visited Arar twice and found he was treated well. Human rights groups widely criticize the Damascus government for torturing prisoners"

AFP (1/23) reports, "On Monday, the US Center for Constitutional Rights, which is supporting Arar in his legal efforts, denounced the US keeping Arar on its watch list. … 'It is now crystal clear that the US has shown everything it has on Mr. Arar to Canada, and that there is no reason for him to be on a watch-list,' said center attorney Maria LaHood."

Cohen Urges Stimson's Firing. Washington Post (1/23, 690K) columnist Richard Cohen writes about Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Cully Stimson, "I, for one, do not accept Stimson's apology. I think it is insincerely offered and beside the point. ... By now, any other administration would have fired Stimson, apology or not. His words show that he is unfit for government service, not to mention membership in the bar." Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) corrects an error from last Friday's editorial, noting Stimson "is a deputy assistant secretary of defense, not state."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Continental Airlines Flight In Texas Delayed By Bomb Threat. The AP (1/23) reports, "A Continental Airlines Inc. commuter flight was delayed without incident for about an hour Monday after its scheduled landing at George Bush Intercontinental Airport because of a bomb threat, authorities said. The flight…was diverted to a taxiway, where local, state and federal authorities took about an hour to determine the plane and its passengers were safe, said Marlene McClinton, spokeswoman for the Houston Airport System." The AP adds, "FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap described the incident as a 'nonspecified bomb threat' that apparently started in Tyler," Texas, where the flight originated.

United Airlines Passenger Faces Federal Charges For Flight Disruption. The AP (1/23) reports, "A United Airlines passenger faces federal charges for allegedly making statements about a hijacking, trying to open a cabin door and fighting with flight attendants while aboard a flight from Boston to San Francisco. Erin Callahan Lambert, 28, who apparently was intoxicated during Flight 179 on Sunday, was taken into custody after the plane landed at San Francisco International Airport, authorities said. She was charged Monday with assaulting a flight attendant and interfering with the performance of duties of flight crew members." The AP notes, "Lambert, a Bay Area resident, was turned over to San Francisco airport police upon arrival at SFO, where she refused to be interviewed by the FBI and requested an attorney, the affidavit said."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Pass Chemical Plant Security Law "With Teeth." The New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) editorializes, "The new Democratic leadership in Congress has a chance to finally do what the Republican Congress and the Bush administration failed to do after Sept. 11: to protect the nation's chemical plants from an attack. Lawmakers should stop the Homeland Security Department from adopting new regulations that would block state and local governments from doing more to protect their residents and should finally pass a federal law with teeth." Though supporters of the "pre-emption" of local rules "always claim that they just want a uniform standard," in cases "like this one — where the federal law is absurdly weak — it is obvious that the real agenda is to block serious safety measures at every level of government."

WAR NEWS:

Warner Comes Out Against Surge Plan. GOP Sen. John Warner, the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, yesterday expressed his opposition to President Bush's new Iraq strategy. The CBS Evening News (1/22, lead story, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) said last night "some key Republican senators are calling for the President to abandon this idea of a troop surge. Led by…Warner, the message was clear." Warner: "Mr. President, that level, 21,500, directly into the face of ever increasing polls that say the Iraqi people want us to go home." This "underscores the increasing likelihood that a majority of Congress, including a significant number of Republicans will go on the record opposing Mr. Bush's plan." GOP Sen. Susan Colins: "So I don't think this will work. I think it's a mistake to ask thousands of additional American GIs to go into the midst of a sectarian battle whose solution is political." NBC Nightly News (1/22, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) also led its broadcast announcing that Warner, "a prominent Republican senator from Virginia, staunch on defense, today came out against the President."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Levey, 850K) calls Warner "one of the White House's most powerful supporters of the Iraq war," and calls the development "a serious setback for President Bush." Warner is "a widely respected onetime Navy secretary" and "had been largely restrained in his criticism of the president's plan until Monday." Warner's "decision to introduce a nonbinding resolution — co-sponsored by…Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, along with Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- deals a blow to a White House that has been struggling to contain a revolt on Capitol Hill." The Times goes on to compare the Warner resolution with that introduced by Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden. The Biden resolution, "unlike Warner's, calls Bush's proposal an 'escalation,' a word criticized by some Republicans as politically loaded because of its association with Vietnam. It also does not include wording that acknowledges the president's constitutional authority to direct the war."

USA Today/AP (1/23, 7A) notes the action taken by Collins, Coleman and Warner "raised the number of Senate GOP publicly against Bush's plan to five. Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine have said they back the Democrats' resolution."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "In an interview last evening, Mr. Hagel said that…Warner had allowed him to preview the language on Friday and found it to be, in some instances, more detailed than his own in specifying what course the administration should follow. 'The bottom line is this is a pretty significant piece of legislation,' Mr. Hagel said. 'In no way is this good news for the administration.'" Biden "has called a meeting tomorrow on the matter and signaled a willingness to accept changes to broaden support. 'What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war,' said a Biden aide. … Nonetheless, the situation is complicated by the growing rivalry among would-be Democratic presidential candidates, including Mr. Biden himself. The Delaware Democrat has to navigate through this thicket, and if the various camps aren't careful, the whole debate could degenerate into the sort of political word games and posturing that so often bring ridicule on the Senate."

But the New York Times (1/23, Zeleny, Hulse, 1.16M) reports Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, "the Massachusetts Democrat who has proposed a resolution to block spending for any increase in troops, said the terminology in a final resolution may be less important than gaining Republican support for it." The Washington Times (1/23, Hurt, 88K) quotes Kennedy saying, "The opposition to the President's misguided escalation of the Iraq war is growing louder and louder."

In fact, the Washington Post (1/23, A6, Weisman, 690K) reports that "by last night, Warner had already met with Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), and the two camps were negotiating a single resolution likely to be approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday."

The Financial Times (1/23, Sevastopulo, Negus) runs a similar report under the headline "GOP Delivers New Blow On Troop Surge," noting "the intensified opposition to the surge came the day before General David Petraeus, the incoming US commander in Iraq, was to face tough questions on Capitol Hill on whether Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his promise to crack down on sectarian militias."

House GOP Wants Monthly Reports From Bush On War Progress. Meanwhile, said ABC World News (1/22, story 2, :30, Gibson, 8.78M), "House Republicans drafted strategic benchmarks for US and Iraqi forces to meet and want to require the Administration to issue monthly status reports on the war."

Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported House Minority Leader John Boehner "emphasized the support for the President among rank-and-file Republicans on Iraq is no longer rock-solid." Boehner: "There are a lot of members of our party who are skeptical that the plan will work because of its dependence on the new Iraqi government stepping up its activities."

The Washington Post (1/23, A6, Weisman, 690K) reports "the House Republican benchmarks…represented a clear break from administration policy. Under the proposal, every 30 days the White House would have to present Congress clear measurements showing the Iraqi government's progress in purging insurgents and terrorists from its security forces, identifying the level of combat experience for Iraqi army battalions, tracking expenditures on Iraqi army equipment and measuring the effectiveness of the police force in Baghdad. The administration would also have to measure Iraqi government efforts to breed tolerance among its country's warring sects." The Post adds, "Some Republican aides saw both the Senate and House developments as positive for Bush, because they give Republicans eager to voice their opposition to the president's Iraq policy ways to go on record without siding with the more forthright statements of opposition drafted with more Democratic support. But Democrats characterized the development as strong evidence of Bush's eroding support."

McClatchy (1/23) reports, "Combined with near-unanimous Democratic opposition to Bush's war policy, the Republican stands show a broad bipartisan lack of confidence in the president's course."

Rockefeller Says "Iraq Adventure" Draining Domestic Security Funds. The AP (1/23, Shrader) reports, "The new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee said he fears the government will not have enough money for homeland security and other domestic priorities because of President Bush's 'Iraq adventure.'" In an interview, Sen. Jay Rockefeller "criticized almost every major facet of the Bush administration's national security course since Sept. 11, 2001. 'The president has in a sense walked away from the war on terror,' Rockefeller said."

Growing Number Of Lawmakers With Relatives In Iraq Noted. USA Today (1/23, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Montana Sen. Max Baucus (D) "lost his nephew, Philip, in Iraq. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., says his son, Alan, had two close calls: one from an improvised explosive device, the other from a sniper. Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., credits his nightly prayers with his son Perry's narrow escape from a mortar attack in Fallujah." USA Today adds, "Almost four years into the war, the conflict in Iraq has begun to touch some of the lawmakers who authorized it in a very personal way. That reality -- which stands in stark contrast to the popular stereotype of Congress -- will be embodied tonight by Sen. Jim Webb, the Virginia Democrat delivering the response to President Bush's State of the Union address. Webb's eldest son, Jimmy, is a Marine in the combat zone. He can't bring himself to talk about his son -- not even to the president -- but others speak eloquently of their loved ones' sacrifices." Sen. John McCain "faces the possibility that his youngest son, Jimmy, will go there this year." Other lawmakers with family in Iraq include Rep. Kenny Hulshof, Sen. Kit Bond and Rep. Duncan Hunter.

Poll Finds Bush Approval At 28%, With 59% Opposed To Iraq War. The CBS Evening News (1/22, lead story, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Opposition to President Bush's new Iraq strategy is growing in a new CBS News poll out tonight, and in Congress where more members of his own party are coming out against it. … Opposition to the war has driven the President's job approval rating to an all-time low, 28% on our CBS News poll." These numbers, added CBS, "are not good. And they come at a bad time for the President." CBS (Axelrod) added, "They come on the eve of the President's State of the Union address. And not only are his approval ratings at an all-time low, opposition to the war in Iraq is 59%, an all-time high."

Al Qaeda Mocks "Surge" Plan. The New York Times/AP (1/23, Press) reports, "Al Qaeda's deputy leader on Monday mocked…Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, challenging him to send the 'entire army' and vowing that insurgents would defeat them, according to a new videotape released by an American group that tracks messages from Al Qaeda." The group, the Washington-based SITE Institute, "said it had intercepted the video from Ayman al-Zawahri, which had not yet been posted on militant Islamist Web sites, where his messages usually appear. SITE, which assesses and analyzes intelligence related to terrorism, did not elaborate on how it had received the message."

ABC World News (1/22, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that in the tape, "Zawahiri criticizes President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq. And in remarks addressed to the American public he says, 'If you continue the policy of Bush and his gang, you will never even dream of peace.'" The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 3, :30, Couric, 7.66M) also noted Zawahiri "challenged the President to send the whole US Army, vowing the insurgents will defeat them."

Surge Expected To Curtail Violence In Short Term. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Ricks, 690K) reports, "The battle for Baghdad will start in mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods chosen by military strategists as being the least likely to offer stiff resistance, raising the odds of early success, according to military planners and officials familiar with the thinking of the incoming Iraq commander, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus." But "that could be followed by a sharp increase in violence as insurgents learn US and Iraqi tactics, military officials said." Pretraeus "plans to send all 17,500 additional US troops ordered by President Bush into Baghdad, regardless of whether Iraqi army units join the fight as planned, according to officials familiar with his thinking. Anticipating an uneven performance by the Iraqi army, military planners are advocating using American force and funding quickly to establish early victories, both in improving security and showing economic progress." Petraeus "will require his troops to operate and live among the population, hoping to safeguard security and economic gains for neighborhoods cleared of violence. Military experts say that violence could decrease through April and May but that once insurgents get a feel for US and Iraqi army tactics, a new 'fighting season' could begin in late spring -- triggering potential political problems for U.S. public support of the operation."

Petraeus Claims Iraqi Elections Created Instability. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, Ricks, 690K) reports Petraeus "believes that the US government has made a host of serious mistakes there, according to written testimony he submitted yesterday to the Senate Armed Services Committee. Among the errors he cites are inadequate planning for the occupation, failing to recognize the emergence of the insurgency, not having enough troops in certain areas and holding elections in such a way that they deepened Iraq's sectarian divisions." Petraeus is quoted as saying, "There was the feeling that elections would enhance the Iraqi sense of nationalism. Instead, the elections hardened sectarian positions as Iraqis voted largely based on ethnic and sectarian group identity."

Ahead Of US-Iraqi Security Push, Insurgents Continue Campaign of Violence. The AP (1/23, Gamel) reports, "A suicide bomber crashed his car into a central Baghdad market crowded with Shiites just seconds after another car bomb tore through the stalls where vendors were hawking DVDs and used clothing, leaving 88 dead Monday in the bloodiest attack in two months." The bombings, "along with a double bombing that killed 12 people in the town of Khalis, battered Shiites during one of their holiest festivals. The attacks were the latest in a renewed campaign of insurgent violence in advance of a US-Iraqi security operation."

ABC World News (1/22, lead story, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Iraq theater of war is getting evermore dangerous and new US troops soon to arrive in Iraq are coming onto a bloody stage. … It almost seems as if the attacks are timed to taunt President Bush."

The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 2, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With all the talk about the troop buildup, we want to show you what it is like on one of Baghdad's most violent days." CBS added that "based on today's attacks," US troops "have their work cut out for them." NBC Nightly News (1/22, lead story, 3:30, Boettcher, 9.87M) said the violence "provides a grim backdrop as US troops arrive here, more reinforcements" who "find that they are in the middle of a civil war."

The New York Times (1/23, Santora, 1.16M) reports that "in the past such Sunni aggression has been met by swift reprisals by Shiites, a cycle of violence that left some 34,000 Iraqis dead last year. Monday's bombings, directed so specifically at civilians, seemed intended to elicit a reprisal, much like the bombings in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City one day last fall, which killed 144 people." The Times adds, "Late Monday, a Sunni mosque in the Dora section of Baghdad was blown up. There were no reports of casualties." The Washington Post (1/23, A12, Partlow, Nouri, 690K), Washington Times/AP (1/23, Salaheddin) and Los Angeles Times (1/23, Daragahi, 850K) also report the story.

Al Qaeda Claims Responsibility For Downing US Helicopter. The AP (1/23, El-Magd) reports, "An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed Monday that its fighters shot down an American military helicopter in a crash that killed 12 US soldiers. The US military has said the cause of the crash has not been determined."

US Soldiers Clearing Baghdad Serve As "Stationary Targets" For Militias. The New York Times (1/23, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "Two blocks from the new American outpost in Ghazaliya, one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, a fight was raging. … On Friday morning, it became an American fight, too, after a few rounds whizzed by Sgt. Sergej Michaud's head, and he and three other soldiers returned fire. The battle would rage for nearly an hour, with mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades exploding near the soldiers, who in turn laid down heavy fire, eventually driving the attackers away. Previously, that would have been the end of it, with the soldiers moving on to their next patrol area and eventually returning to their base. But this time, the Americans were staying, defending their new home in a neighborhood where the rule of law had been driven out by the reign of the gun." The Times describes this effort as "a test case for President Bush's new Baghdad security plan. … In the week since the Americans arrived, however, the troops have seen the truth of what their commanders warned in announcing the plan: it leaves Americans more exposed than ever, stationary targets for warring militias."

White House Praises Maliki's Move Against Sadr Militia. Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported, "It does appear that Prime Minister Maliki has taken to heart US criticism of his failure to crack down on the militia led by cleric Muqtada al Sadr. But even as the militia reduced some of its threatening public appearances there was major bloodshed today. … One military analyst said it is possible that Sunni insurgents are trying to strike a blow before more US forces arrive in the capital." Fox noted, "One Iraqi government official said that U.S. Intelligence reports convinced Maliki that the Mahdi army included death squads targeting Sunnis. The crackdown was a move welcomed by the White House." White House Spokesman Tony Snow: "You are seeing a clear signal that the Maliki government is very serious about addressing, on a nonsectarian basis, the problem of those who are trying to operate outside the law."

Sunni Sheik Declares War On Insurgency. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Perry, 850K) reports from Ramadi, Iraq, on "Sheik Sattar Bazeaa Fatikhan, [who] projects the aura of power and seriousness that comes to a man who has taken a stand. After Sunni insurgents killed his father and four of his brothers last year, Fatikhan declared war against the insurgency. He convened a summit of about a dozen prominent sheiks. From that meeting came a document called 'The Awakening,' in which Fatikhan persuaded all but one sheik to join him in opposition to the insurgency." Since then, "Fatikhan said, the sheiks have 'eliminated' a number of insurgents. U.S. officials regularly visit Fatikhan, seeking his counsel, showing him the kind of deference one might expect for a leading government official. ... For U.S. forces, Fatikhan's stand is a significant boost in a bitter fight with insurgents who, until recently, controlled large segments of Ramadi, the provincial capital." Army Col. Sean MacFarland "credits Fatikhan and other sheiks for an increase in police enrollment, a decrease in insurgent recruitment and new courage among Iraqi forces."

Insurgents Seize Baqouba's Mayor As US Officials Report Progress. The AP (1/23, Mroue) reports, "Many residents of Baqouba say they live hunkered down in cold, dark houses afraid to go out, that the once mixed Shiite-Sunni neighborhoods are riven by sectarian cleansing, that the police force has virtually collapsed." However, US and Iraqi military officials "paint a different portrait. They insist the city is not nearly as dangerous as 'rumors' put it. According to them, Baqouba is improving and violence is down. Events Monday seemed to contradict those assertions. A car bomb and mortar bombardment in nearby Khalis killed at least 12 people, and state television reported that gunmen in Baqouba proper attacked the mayor's office, ransacking the building and setting off explosive charges that damaged the structure. Police said the Sunni mayor was kidnapped, a report U.S. officials said they could not immediately confirm." Col. David W. Sutherland, 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, is quoted as saying "terrorists…would have you believe schools and markets are closed and people are afraid to go out of their homes. Again, in reality, markets are open with fruits, meat, and produce readily available."

The Washington Post (1/23, A12, Londono, Shammari, 690K) reports Maj. Brett G. Sylvia said, "Families are starting to move back into the area. A sense of normalcy is attempting to be reestablished in this area." However, "Minutes before the news conference began, armed men kidnapped the mayor of the provincial capital, Baqubah, blew up his office and stole six government cars, including three new Chevrolet police pickup trucks, officials in the province said. The near-simultaneous scenarios played out like a tale of two Iraqs, one inching toward stability, the other engulfed in chaos. After seizing Mayor Khalid al-Sanjari, one of the armed men grabbed a loudspeaker from a police car and taunted the chief of police, the officials said.

Suicide Bomber Kills 10 In Afghanistan Today. The AP (1/23, Shah) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a US military base in eastern Afghanistan on Tuesday, killing 10 people and wounding 14 others, an Afghan official said. The bomber approached a group of Afghan men who were waiting outside the base in the city of Khost, in Khost province, before triggering an explosive strapped to his chest." The provincial governor "said the men were daily workers, lining up to get into the base at the time of the blast. Suicide attacks have increased as Taliban militants intensify their insurgency against Afghan government forces and foreign troops."

AFP (1/23) also reports the blast, saying, "No one immediately claimed responsibility for the blast but suicide attacks are a hallmark of the Taliban-led insurgency that kicked off when the hardline Islamic movement was driven from power in 2001."

Suicide Bomber Killed Four In North Waziristan Yesterday. The New York Times (1/23, Khan, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "rammed his explosive-laden car into a military convoy near Mirali in the restive North Waziristan tribal region on Monday, killing 4 people and wounding 23, witnesses said. … The attack occurred at a checkpoint about a mile east of the town of Mirali when a joint convoy of the army and paramilitary was heading from a garrison in Bannu to Miramshah, the restive region's administrative headquarters."'

Pakistanis Say Omar Likely In Afghanistan. The AP (1/22) reports, "Taliban leader Mullah Omar is likely based in southern Afghanistan and leading the resurgent Islamic militia from there, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said Monday. A spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry said that Omar's exact whereabouts remain unknown." The ministry's "comments follow claims by Afghan officials that a captured spokesman for the Taliban militia told interrogators that Omar was living in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta and that he was protected by Pakistan's ISI intelligence service. ... Pakistan vehemently denies backing the militants."

US-Led Forces Kill Pakistani Soldier By Mistake. The AP (1/22, Jan) reports, "U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan mistakenly fired at a Pakistani border post and killed a soldier, Pakistan's military said Monday after lodging a protest over the death. A US military spokesman said four precision-guided bombs were dropped on four suspected militants who were firing rockets at a U.S. military outpost at Bermel in Afghanistan's Paktika province, near the Pakistani border. ... But the Pakistani military said in a statement the post that was hit is located near Shawal, a mountainous area close to the Afghan border in Pakistan's North Waziristan tribal region."

NYTimes Says Pakistan's Government "Perhaps Sponsoring" The Taliban. The New York Times (1/23, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "To learn why a resurgent Taliban is fighting American and NATO troops to a military draw in Afghanistan, you have to go to the frontier region on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. Our colleague, Carlotta Gall, did just that last month and what she learned led to a physical assault on her by Pakistani intelligence officials and five hours in custody for her photographer, Akhtar Soomro. … We now know why. Ms. Gall's reporting has determined that Quetta is an important rear base for the Taliban, and that Pakistani authorities are encouraging and perhaps sponsoring the cross-border insurgency. That is a role that Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, denies. But residents of the border area, opposition figures and Western diplomats point to specific cases of Pakistani involvement. Americans need to know more about this collusion and to demand better answers from General Musharraf."

IED "Jammers" Also Disrupt US Radio Communication. USA Today (1/23, Brook, 2.27M) reports the Pentagon "has launched an urgent effort to develop radio systems immune to the jamming signals that troops use to foil homemade bombs planted by insurgents in Iraq. The jammers, which block signals that detonate improvised explosive devices (IEDs), have become so powerful they can 'cause the loss of all communications' for U.S. troops, a Pentagon solicitation to contractors says. It calls for information on devices that will allow troops to use jammers and radios at the same time."

DOJ:

Ensign Mum On Reasons For US Attorney Dismissals. The Las Vegas Sun (1/23, Skolnik, Mascaro) reports, "The Justice Department briefed Nevada Republican Sen. John Ensign last month on plans to replace Nevada's top federal prosecutor, but Ensign has decided that whatever the reasons, the public need not know them." The Sun continues, "U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas is one of at least seven top federal prosecutors being removed by the Bush administration, five from other Western states. All were appointed by Bush. … As is true with Bogden, the reasons for the departures remain mysterious." The Sun adds, "Absent explanations, Democratic lawmakers and lawyers across the West are speculating. They wonder if the prosecutors pursued cases that displeased Washington, or if the Justice Department wants to choose replacements under a new Patriot Act provision that allows the appointments without the customary review by the U.S. Senate. … 'If you ask me if my suspicions are aroused, they are,' said Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif. Her state lost two U.S. attorneys. … During his five-year reign as the highest-ranking federal prosecutor in Nevada, Bogden has scored some notable successes. His office boosted firearms prosecutions, secured the convictions of dozens of violent gang members and oversaw the cases against four former Clark County commissioners convicted of taking bribes." The Sun notes, "Even defense lawyers, Bogden's frequent courtroom opponents, speak highly of his straightforward style and fair play. … So why did Bogden suddenly announce his resignation Wednesday, after days of speculation that he was forced out of office by the Justice Department? … Officials in Nevada and Washington, D.C., are only providing hints as to why he and the other prosecutors are leaving. … The sudden bloodletting involved U.S. attorneys up and down the West Coast, as well as New Mexico, and one in Arkansas. The new interim U.S. attorney in Arkansas had been a political operative who worked for powerful White House aide Karl Rove. … No potential replacements have yet been named for Bogden, although a Justice Department source confirmed that officials have talked to both Ensign and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid in recent days regarding a replacement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, SEC Officials Question Jobs In Apple Options Probe. Bloomberg (1/23, Gullo, Guglielmo) reports, "Apple Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs was questioned by U.S. government investigators about backdating of employee stock options grants at the company, lawyers familiar with the matter said." Bloomberg continues, "Jobs met with officials from the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department last week in San Francisco, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the interviews are confidential. The company said last month that it found 'no misconduct' by Jobs or current management after an internal investigation of the stock-option backdating." Bloomberg adds, "The meeting, which took place the same week Apple announced record sales of its best-selling iPod music player, shows the U.S. government is still seeking information about Jobs's role in the backdating even after the company's report clearing him and others, said Nell Minow, editor at the Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm in Portland, Maine. … 'It is after all the SEC's view on his culpability that matters, not the internal investigation at Apple,' Minow said. … The people wouldn't disclose specifics about what Jobs was asked, what he told investigators and whether there would be additional meetings."

Jobs Waited Months Before Filing Options Disclosure. The Washington Post (1/23, D1, Sipress) reports, "With federal prosecutors investigating the granting of stock options by Apple, the actions of its iconic chief executive, Steve Jobs, are being more closely examined." The Post continues, "A review of how Jobs handled his stock options from 2001 shows that he waited about two-thirds of a year to report the receipt of 7.5 million options that the company admitted last month were improperly backdated. The board meeting at which they were reportedly approved never took place." The Post adds, "The timing of Jobs's filing was not illegal and beat the deadline. But it broke with the practice common among other Apple officers and directors of submitting the report, in this case a Form 4, within weeks, not months. … Jobs filed his statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission in August 2002, reporting that he had received the stock options on Oct. 19, 2001. Apple now says the options were actually finalized in December 2001, when the value of the options was significantly less because of changes in the stock price. Jobs filed his personal disclosure about eight months later." The Post notes, "In contrast, three other directors who filed within days of Jobs had waited only four weeks to disclose their options. In fact, the filings of 53 other Form 4s by Apple officers and directors between the start of 1999 and late August 2002 -- when new disclosure requirements came into force -- took just under four weeks, on average. When Jobs received a previous grant of 10 million stock options in January 2000, he filed his Form 4 in just under three weeks."

US Attorney Shakeups Cloud Apple Probe. The California Recorder (1/23, Scheck) reports, "Two things set the investigation of Apple Inc. apart from the hundreds of other stock option backdating probes: the indispensability of the company's CEO, and the fact that while both in-house lawyers and HR staff were involved with options grants, it's the lawyers who are getting the most scrutiny." The Recorder continues, "With Apple's fortunes tightly linked to its leader, Silicon Valley titan Steve Jobs, anything seen as jeopardizing his role at the company strikes intense fear into stockholders. That helps explain why Jobs took the risky step last week of talking to federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers to convince them of his innocence. … But with turmoil in the U.S. Attorney's Office, and no joint defense agreement among potential targets of the investigation, the probe looks more uncertain now than at any time since it launched last fall." The Recorder adds, "Lead prosecutor Christopher Steskal announced Friday that he's leaving government for Fenwick & West. Earlier that week, his boss, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan was sacked, and has hired legal placement company MLegal to find him his next job. … Ryan's No. 2, Eumi Choi -- the other prosecutor on the Apple case -- has had her resume floating around Silicon Valley for weeks. … That means that every aspect of the probe -- including whether it even turns into a criminal case -- will remain uncertain until at least two key prosecutors are replaced."

Foundry Networks CEO To Remain Despite Role In Options Backdating. The San Jose Mercury News (1/23, Schwanhausser) reports, "Foundry Networks said Monday that Chairman and Chief Executive Bobby Johnson Jr. will surrender his role as chairman -- but will stay on the board and continue to run the company -- even though he personally picked the dates for a 'substantial' number of tainted stock options." The News continues, "The Santa Clara company said Johnson was not advised that such practices could violate accounting rules and cause the company to overstate its profits. Foundry said Monday it faces a pretax accounting charge that could mount to as much as $205 million because of misdated options it gave directors, officers and rank-and-file employees from 2000 to 2003. … Johnson received no misdated options, the company said." The News adds, "Foundry, which makes computer networking hardware, also stripped Timothy D. Heffner of his title as chief financial officer. But it shifted him into a new executive job that has no accounting or financial responsibilities. … Foundry's case is noteworthy because of the similarities to the high-profile case involving Apple CEO Steve Jobs. Though Apple acknowledges that Jobs recommended favorable grant dates, the company said he did not understand the accounting implications. Unlike Johnson, Jobs received tainted options. But Apple said he did not benefit from the options, which he later exchanged for restricted stock. … Foundry's decision to keep two central players despite acknowledging their roles in the options abuses is both rare and risky, said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues. Most companies have fired or forced out implicated executives and directors, he said."

US Charges 13 In Alleged Foodservice Fraud. The AP (1/23, Gordon) reports, "Federal regulators have accused an additional 13 people of aiding an alleged massive accounting fraud at U.S. Foodservice Inc., a subsidiary of Dutch grocery retailer Ahold NV, in a scandal that brought the resignation of top executives and criminal probes in the United States and the Netherlands." The AP continues, "The Ahold affair was one of Europe's biggest accounting scandals, and the Dutch company skirted bankruptcy in 2003. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission in 2004 accused Ahold of fraudulently overstating sales by billions of dollars and fabricating hundreds of millions of dollars of earnings." The AP adds, "The civil charges filed last Thursday by the SEC bring to 30 the number of people the agency has accused of aiding the alleged fraud by signing false audit statements that enabled a $1 billion overstatement of Ahold's earnings in 2001-02. The SEC announced the new charges on Monday. … All 13 of those charged most recently in federal court in Washington were employees of or agents for vendor companies that supplied Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice, which sells food in bulk to restaurants and cafeterias. … Nine of the 13 have each agreed to pay a $25,000 civil fine to settle the SEC's allegations, which they neither admitted nor denied, the agency said. They are: Carl Allen, Donald Childers, John Crowder, Chris Jakubek, John King, Steve LeBarron, Patrick Penderghast, Frank Riggio and Richard Vecchia. … The cases remain pending against the other four, whose titles at the time were: Gary Bell, vice president for business development at Hunt-Wesson Foodservice; Joseph Grendys, the owner of Koch Poultry; Anthony Holohan, sales representative for C.F. Sauer Foods Inc., and Michael Smith, corporate accounts manager for Citrus World."

Report Finds Take Two Allowed Former CEO To Backdate Options. USA Today (1/23, 5B, Iwata) reports, "Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of Grand Theft Auto and other popular video games, failed to monitor stock-option grants, including a significant number that were backdated over a six-year period, according to an internal report released Monday by the company." USA continues, "The report found that Take-Two's compensation committee abandoned its responsibilities and allowed former CEO Ryan

Brant 'to control and dominate the granting process' and engage in 'a pattern and practice of backdating options' from 1997 to 2003. .. Brant resigned as CEO five years ago and as chairman last October." USA adds, "The investigation, by the BDO Seidman accounting firm and the law firm Kasowitz Benson Torres & Friedman, found no evidence that Take-Two's current executives engaged in misconduct, or that the company's former or current directors 'engaged in willful misconduct or other dishonest acts.' … However, the report found that three former Take-Two executives — a former controller and two former chief financial officers that the report did not name — 'appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process' and declined to appear for interviews with investigators."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A17, Kingsbury) reports, "The New York-based videogame maker disclosed in July the Securities and Exchange Commission was investigating its options-granting process, and Take-Two said last month that independent investigators found improprieties in the company's granting processes. Take-Two's review began with the company's April 15, 1997 initial public offering. … The company noted the outside law firm which conducted the options review said three former executives who 'appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process, declined to appear for interviews' and limited to some extend the information collected. The trio was Take-Two's former controller, who was fired last month, and the two chief financial officers Larry Muller and James David Jr. The pair served in that post from 1999 through 2001. Take Two's filing with the SEC on Monday didn't disclose the officials' names."

The New York Times (1/23, News) reports, "The restatement will be the second time Take-Two has revised earnings to fix accounting irregularities. In 2005, the company paid a $7.5 million fine in settling a Securities and Exchange Commission suit over how it booked sales. Take-Two is among at least 200 companies that are being investigated on suspicion of changing the date of options grants to inflate their value. … 'They're very familiar with the S.E.C.,' said Paul-Jon McNealy, an analyst with American Technology Research in Boston who rates the shares neutral. 'It's not finished yet.'"

Suspects In Siemens Probe Finger Finance Head. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Crawford, Esterl) reports, "Two key suspects in a fraud investigation roiling Siemens AG have told German prosecutors that Chief Financial Officer Joe Kaeser has known for years about an alleged scheme to pay bribes to win overseas telecommunications contracts, according to witness statements reviewed by The Wall Street Journal." The Journal continues, "One suspect also told prosecutors that two other senior executives at the German conglomerate knew since at least early 2005 about the alleged bribes-for-business scheme: current management board member Rudi Lamprecht and Lothar Pauly, who headed the telecom division before leaving the company in late 2005." The Journal adds, "The revelations come at a sensitive time for top managers at Siemens, who have been fending off criticism ahead of an annual holders' meeting Thursday that they didn't do enough to stop corruption. Evidence of wrongdoing could cause some countries to ban Siemens from participating in big infrastructure projects that generate much of its revenue. … The investigation also could complicate the conglomerate's efforts to jettison its telecom business, merging much of it into a venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland. The testimony alleges that bribes took place in Siemens's wireless-telecom business, and weren't confined to the fixed-line unit, which was the original focus of the criminal investigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

IG Report Criticizes FBI Response To Foley Emails. The AP (1/23, Margasak) reports, "The FBI should have acted to protect teenage House pages when it initially learned last July that Rep. Mark Foley had sent disturbing e-mails to a former page," according to a review released yesterday by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine. Fine's report also "said that bureau spokesmen wrongly asserted that the decision was influenced by a congressional watchdog group's failure to provide information missing from the e-mails. … 'We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the Congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley,' Fine reported." The AP adds, "The inspector general, however, found no misconduct by FBI officials, who at the time were aware only of e-mails to a former Louisiana page that were not sexually explicit and gave no indication of criminal activity."

page program or, 'at the very least,' told the whistle-blower agency that provided it with the messages that it was declining to investigate, said the 31-page report." The Herald adds, "The FBI, in a statement issued late Monday, noted that the inspector general's report concluded that the agency had 'acted within the range of its discretion' in not opening a criminal investigation. And it noted that the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia later reviewed the same messages 'and agreed that no further investigation was warranted.'"

With the exception of the Washington Times (1/23, Seper, 88K), which reports the story under the more positive headline "No Misconduct Found In FBI Decision On Foley," other news coverage of Fine's review takes a negative tone toward the FBI, echoing the AP and McClatchy reports. USA Today (1/23, Johnson, 2.27M) titles its story "FBI Should've Followed Up On Foley's E-Mails," noting, "In a written response, the FBI said it would review its internal policies. But the bureau said Foley's most explicit communications with pages were not part of its initial evaluation of the case. The FBI said internal 'misunderstandings' contributed to the release of inaccurate information to reporters." However, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington Executive Director Melanie Sloan "said the government's release of inaccurate information amounted to a 'coverup' of the FBI's 'shocking inaction.'"

Under the headline "FBI Faulted For Inaction In Foley Scandal," the Washington Post (1/23, A4, Eggen, 690K) reports that after the scandal broke, "Several officials at the FBI and Justice Department" said to "reporters that the messages supplied by CREW had been 'heavily redacted' and that the group had refused to provide further information. Fine's review found, however, that the only thing removed from the messages was the identity of the person to whom the communications had been forwarded" and "that a chronology prepared by the FBI's Washington Field Office contained inaccuracies that were likely repeated to the press." The Post notes, "The FBI, in a prepared statement, attributed the erroneous statements about CREW to 'inaccurate information' that led to 'misunderstandings on the part of FBI and DOJ spokespersons.'"

Under the headline "FBI: We Flubbed Foley E-mails," ABC News' The Blotter (1/22, Ryan, Ross) noted, "In effect, the report finds the FBI's inaction contributed to the failure of officials to detect Foley's inappropriate behavior, which eventually led to his resignation when ABC News revealed more sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages to current and former pages. While finding no official misconduct on the part of FBI officials, the inspector general said 'the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face' to have warranted follow-up steps." The Palm Beach Post (1/23, Crowley) reports, "The supervisory special agent for the Public Corruption Squad told Fine that after reading the e-mails, he thought, 'What a freak,' but he decided they did not fall into his jurisdiction. He passed them to Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity. … The agent in charge of Cyber Crimes called the e-mails 'odd' but also 'did not see any evidence of wrongdoing,' Fine said. … She told Fine that the e-mails, which were not sexually explicit, were 'not the job of the FBI. This is a parental job.'"

Under the headline "Report Faults FBI Handling Of Foley Case," the Los Angeles Times (1/23, Schmitt, 850K) reports at the end of its story, CREW's Sloan "said: 'Not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming' the advocacy group. The FBI said it would study the report. 'The FBI shares the [inspector general's] interest in ensuring that information regarding potential criminal activity is evaluated objectively and in conformance with established policies and practices,' the bureau said in a statement. 'Accordingly, the FBI will carefully examine the … review for any changes to existing policies or procedures that may be warranted.'"

CNN.com (1/22), CBS News.com (1/22, Lambidakis), Government Executive (1/22, Mandel) and Bloomberg (1/23, Roland) similarly report on Fine's analysis, noting the yesterday's FBI statement in response. CNN's The Situation Room (1/22, Costello) and Fox News' Special Report with Brit Hume (1/22) also briefly noted Fine's report.

Boston Herald Says FBI "Flubbed" Investigation. Under the headline "FBI Flubbed Foley Probe," the Boston Herald (1/23, 184K) editorializes, "The Department of Justice yesterday concluded that the FBI should have investigated Foley and the inappropriate e-mails he had sent to a former House page when the agency was informed of them back in July." The Herald adds, "It appears that like everyone else tainted by this scandal, the FBI passed the buck until Foley resigned and the sordid details were reported by the media. Now the new Congress has revamped the board that oversees the page program and has pledged regular meetings. But unless every agency, every individual with an interest in protecting these young people understands their duty, that will be of little comfort.

Libby Trial To Begin Today After Arduous Jury Selection. Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported, "Lawyers in the trial of former White House aide Scooter Libby wrapped up the first stage of jury selection. It has not been easy to find an unbiased panel of 36 people in Washington D.C., from which the final jury can be chosen." Libby's lawyers have "spent a week trying to find jurors whose views of the administration or the war in Iraq would not interfere with their ability to render a fair verdict. … Though it is unusual to ask potential jurors about their political views, much of the questioning has focused on Iraq, especially the decision to go to war and the reasons for it, which are an inescapable aspect of this case."

The Washington Post (1/23, A4, Goldstein, 690K) reports the jury is "a largely apolitical, educated group. … The nine women and three men selected for the jury -- as well as four alternates -- are scheduled to hear Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald and one of Libby's attorneys, Theodore V. Wells Jr., lay out opposing portrayals of the celebrated case in opening statements today. Over the next four to six weeks, testimony in the case will expose the inner workings of the Bush White House shortly after the Iraq war began and confidential conversations between well-known journalists and their sources in the administration."

The New York Times (1/23, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "In addition to the 12 jurors, Judge Reggie M. Walton seated four alternates to replace any of the 12 who may fall ill or have other problems. All 16 jurors will hear the case, unaware who are alternates, to ensure that they pay attention. The lawyers on both sides and reporters covering the case do know which jurors are which. … The jury includes a former reporter for The Washington Post who said his editor was Bob Woodward, a Post journalist who is expected to be a witness in the trial. The former Post reporter also said that until recently he was a neighbor of Tim Russert of NBC News, who is also expected to be a witness."

The New York Times' guest columnist Stacy Schiff (1/23) writes, "It is true that what began as a search for a leak ended — after much collateral damage — with an indictment for a lie. At this juncture it can be difficult to grasp what, precisely, is on trial. Some of us seem viscerally to wish something else were."

GOP Lawmakers Seek DOJ Polygraph Of Berger Over 9/11 Documents. Fox News (1/23) reports, The Justice Department should administer a polygraph test to former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger to find out what documents he took from the National Archives in 2002 and 2003, Rep. Tom Davis wrote in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dated Monday." Fox continues, "Davis, ranking Republican on the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, is leading a group of 18 lawmakers who say the Justice Department has been 'remarkably incurious' about Berger's decision to remove documents relating to the Sept. 11 commission's inquiry into his role in helping prevent terror attacks during the Clinton administration. … 'It is extraordinarily important that the Justice Department avail itself of its rights under the plea agreement and administer a polygraph examination to Mr. Berger to question him about the extent of his thievery. This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead up to the terrorist attacks on the United States,' Davis wrote. … The letter was signed by all Republican members of Congress." Fox adds, "Berger admitted to taking documents on two of the four occasions he went to the National Archives to bone up on his responses for the Sept. 11 commission on his inquiry into how intelligence and law enforcement communities failed to prevent the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks on the United States. He said he hid some of them at a construction site near the archives building in Washington. … Berger agreed to take a polygraph test as part of a plea deal reached in September 2005. As part of the guilty plea, he was also sentenced to 100 hours of community service, two years probation, three years of lost security clearance and a $50,000 fine plus court costs. … At the time of the report, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department 'has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter.'"

FNC Special Report with Brit Hume (1/22, 6:16 p.m.) broadcasted, "Virginia Republican Congressman Tom Davis was the ranking member of the House Ethics Committee has asked Alberto Gonzales to order a lie detector test promptly for Sandy Berger. The lawmakers remind the agreement that Berger who pleaded guilty of taking high the cost by dark documents from the National Archives had entered a plea, but the test was never administered. It is essential to National security to find out if he's hiding anything else about the case."

State Department Official Sentenced To Prison In Classified Documents Case. The Washington Post (1/23, A3, Markon, 690K) reports, "A former high-level State Department official was sentenced to a year in prison yesterday for keeping more than 3,500 classified documents at his Fairfax County home and concealing his relationship with a Taiwanese intelligence agent. Prosecutors said Donald W. Keyser possessed far more unauthorized classified documents than any government employee ever prosecuted by the Justice Department." The Post adds, "The sentencing did little to resolve the lingering mystery surrounding the downfall of Keyser, which stunned the Washington diplomatic establishment. When he was first charged in September 2004, the FBI said he had passed documents to Taiwanese agents during covert meetings in the Washington area. But court papers filed with Keyser's guilty plea in December 2005 did not mention passing any documents, and law enforcement and diplomatic sources said at the time that the case did not involve espionage but rather a government employee who became careless."

The AP (1/23, Barakat) reports, "At his sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court, Keyser admitted to egregiously bad judgment in striking up a personal relationship with 35-year-old Isabelle Cheng, a known intelligence officer with Taiwan's National Intelligence Bureau whom he first met in 2002. But Keyser rejected any accusation that he was acting as an agent of Taiwan or that he compromised U.S. interests." The AP notes, "Prosecutors never charged Keyser with disclosing classified information to Taiwan, but it was clear from Monday's hearing that they remain suspicious of his activities. Court records indicate that Keyser failed polygraph tests when he was quizzed about a secret trip he took to Taiwan in September 2003 to meet Cheng." The New York Sun (1/23, Gerstein) adds, "Keyser's sentencing was delayed repeatedly after prosecutors accused him of failing to keep his promise to cooperate in debriefings with the FBI."

"Girls Gone Wild" Producer Sentenced, Fined. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Hoffman) reports, "The community service is piling up for 'Girls Gone Wild' mogul Joe Francis. … The producer of racy videos featuring young — and often naked — women was sentenced today to 200 hours of community service over two years by a federal judge in Los Angeles and was placed on two years probation for failing to adequately document the ages of his subjects. The amount of time was double what Francis' lawyers had sought." The Times continues, "The heavier-than-expected sentence is the second time that a federal judge has come down hard in sentencing Francis. In December, in Panama City, Fla., a federal judge sentenced Francis' company Mantra Films Inc. to serve 32 hours of monthly community service for 30 months. … The sentencing stems from a plea agreement Francis made with the Department of Justice in September, when he admitted to shooting underage women in his videos and pleaded guilty to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws. … Those laws govern the way in which producers of adult material document the ages of performers in sexually explicit videos and are intended to hinder the sexual exploitation of children. … In addition, Francis has greed to pay $500,000 in fines in California, with his company paying an additional $1.6 million in fines in Florida in a related case."

Justices Strike Down California Sentencing Law. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Savage, 850K) reports the U. Supreme Court yesterday "struck down a part of California's 30-year-old sentencing law, which allows judges to add several years to a criminal's prison term. The ruling could mean new sentencing hearings for several thousand state prisoners who were recently given longer terms. If their sentences are still being appealed, they can take advantage of today's ruling." But "the decision does not necessarily mean they will get lighter sentences. Indeed, the Supreme Court's interest was not in whether prison terms are too long or too short, but rather how they are decided." The New York Times (1/23, Steinhauer, 1.16M), in an analysis titled "Ruling's Effect On California Inmates Is Probably Limited," makes the same point.

The court made its ruling after a 6-3 split. USA Today (1/23, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports that dissenting from the majority ruling were Justices Anthony Kennedy, Stephen Breyer and Samuel Alito. The New York Times (1/23, Greenhouse, 1.16M) says the decision "will require the California courts to reconsider thousands of sentences as the Legislature contemplates its options for amending the statute to meet the justices' objections. While no other state is directly affected, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's forcefully worded majority opinion demonstrated that the Roberts court is committed to carrying out the full implications of the revolution in criminal sentencing that the court began seven years ago in Apprendi v. New Jersey."

The Washington Post (1/23, A10, Barnes, 690K) reports Alito "argued that California's law met the standards the court had set for the federal system. 'The California sentencing law that the court strikes down today is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect' from the remedy the court offered in 2005, Alito wrote. From the beginning, Kennedy and Breyer have opposed the court's resistance to systems that allow judicial discretion."

The Legal Times (1/23, Mauro) reports, "The 6-3 ruling in California v. Cunningham may throw into uncertainty a segment of recent sentences imposed in California under the state's 1977 sentencing law. … 'California has some work to do, but it should not cause havoc in the courts,' says Stanford Law School professor Jeffrey Fisher, who wrote a brief in the case for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and is a key strategist in challenges to sentencing laws. Fisher said defendants on direct review should get a 'fresh look' at their sentences as a result of the ruling Monday." The Times adds, "The decision also signals that the newly constituted Roberts Court is committed to the Apprendi line of cases, which, since 2000, have recalibrated the balance between judges and juries in the sentencing process and upended both state and federal sentencing laws. In Apprendi v. New Jersey, the Court held that any fact that increases a sentence beyond certain parameters set forth in the sentencing statute must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt."

The AP (1/23, Sherman) reports, "It is the latest in a series of high court rulings over the past seven years that limit judges' discretion in sentencing defendants. The court has held repeatedly that a judge may not increase a defendant's sentence based on factors that were not determined by a jury. … 'This court has repeatedly held that, under the Sixth Amendment, any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by the jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence,' Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the court, referring to an article in the U.S. Constitution. … Several states have changed their sentencing laws to require prosecutors to prove to a jury aggravating factors that could lead to longer sentences."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/23, 850K) writes, "Much as Californians may resent this ruling, which comes in a heinous case and could potentially trigger challenges to thousands of sentences, we should have seen it coming. … Like its previous recent decisions on judicial sentencing, the ruling leaves both legislatures and judges considerable leeway. Legislatures can still establish minimum and maximum sentences, and judges (if state law allows) can choose a particular sentence based on characteristics of the perpetrator, including previous convictions." But "it is clearer than ever that if sentencing depends on the particular facts of the crime, then it is up to the jury, not the judge, to make that call."

Oregon Prison Official Allegedly Took Bribes From Contractors. The Oregonian (1/23, Green, 318K) reports, "Federal agents found more than $450,000 in cash in the home and safety deposit box of an Oregon prison official accused of taking bribes from companies that sell food for inmates' meals and snacks. Farhad 'Fred' Monem, who earns $75,500 a year as the food service administrator for the Oregon Department of Corrections, was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his home and office Jan. 10. A federal judge Friday unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme and detail what agents discovered during their searches." The Oregonian notes, "No charges have been filed against Monem or others allegedly involved. Federal prosecutors declined to discuss a timeline for arrests in the bribery scheme, which they allege included Monem's wife, Karen, and officials from food distributors and brokers in California, New York and Maryland."

Opening Arguments Made At Coke Formula Theft Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/23, Stanford, 379K) reports, "Prosecutors opened their case in the Coke secrets trial Monday by vowing to prove that former secretary Joya Williams conspired with two accomplices to try to sell product samples and confidential documents for more than $1 million. 'This case is about greed and poor choices,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Chartash. But Williams' defense attorney, Janice Singer, said her client was taken advantage of by two lying ex-cons. She said Williams copied and took home various work materials for innocent reasons and never intended for them to fall into the hands of the alleged accomplices." WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/22, Shirek, King) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, Chartash "showed the jury surveillance photos of Joya Williams at her desk at Coke's headquarters in Atlanta last year -- taken after the FBI began investigating her -- showing Williams filling her personal bag with company documents, and with bottles of brand new Coca-Cola drinks that were in development."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/23, Weber) reports Williams "was angry at her employer for not treating her well and hatched a plan to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker to sell to rival PepsiCo Inc., a co-defendant testified Monday. Edmund Duhaney, "who pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to testify, told jurors that…Williams said the documents and product samples -- which include information about the company's new coffee-infused drink, Coca-Cola Blak -- could be worth a lot of money to a competitor. 'She made a statement, "This happens all the time in corporate America" -- that Pepsi, the rival company, would be interested in this,' Duhaney said, recalling an April 2006 meeting with Williams and another co-defendant, Ibrahim Dimson."

Cunningham Probe Spurs Questions On House Subpoena Response. The Hill (1/23, Crabtree) reports, "A flurry of subpoenas issued late last year to three powerful House committees and two staffers are raising new questions about House policies on document retention as well as internal House rules governing response to subpoenas. A U.S. district court in San Diego sent subpoenas to the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees late in the year, according to notices in the Dec. 27 and Jan. 4 editions of the Congressional Record. Elizabeth Phillips, an Appropriations staffer, and Rebecca Kuhn, who formerly worked as ex-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham's (R-Calif.) executive assistant, were also subpoenaed to testify, according to letters they submitted to then-House Speaker Dennis Hastert as required by House rules. … The U.S. attorney's office in San Diego first requested thousands of pages of documents from the panels last spring through a letter to the House general counsel. The subsequent subpoenas are an indication that federal prosecutors were concerned late last year that the committees were not voluntarily handing over the previously requested files, which, according to media reports, include classified documents relating to secret CIA contracts and a 59-page classified report into Cunningham's activities produced last fall by an investigator working on an internal probe for the House Intelligence panel."

Judge Reduces Sentence For Former Michigan School Official. The Macomb (MI) Daily (1/23, Hotts) reports, "Disgraced educator John Gardiner was placed in a wheelchair to be returned to prison Monday after a judge refused a plea for home confinement but did slice five months off Gardiner's original sentence." The Daily continues, "Gardiner, the former superintendent of East Detroit Public Schools, had sought a reduced sentence for his conviction in what has been called the largest public corruption scandal in Macomb County history. … However, U.S. District Court Judge Patrick Duggan issued a new sentence of 41 months in a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va., reduced from the original sentence of up to 46 months for convictions on racketeering and extortion. … 'Dr. Gardiner has maintained he is not guilty and he has the right to feel that way, but a jury has found him guilty,' Duggan said." The Daily adds, "Monday's sentencing hearing was ordered after the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Duggan made an error at Gardiner's original sentencing because of confusion over mandatory sentencing guidelines. … At Monday's hearing, it was possible for the judge to add another year onto the original sentence. Instead, Duggan's new calculation resulted in a range of 37 to 46 months, and he opted for five fewer months. … Gardiner, who has been in prison for 22 months, will likely now be released from prison in March of 2008 instead of August 2008." The Daily notes, "The 74-year-old Gardiner was among 20 people named in a 35-count indictment handed down by the U.S. Justice Department. They were charged with accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts, vacations, cash, and home improvements financed by contractor William Hudson Jr. … In return, Gardiner and others helped arrange lucrative contracts for school bond work to Hudson, who also is in prison for his part in the scandal."

CDC Adviser Arrested On Public Indecency Charges. The AP (1/23) reports, "A prominent public health expert who is a top adviser to federal health agencies was arrested on suspicion of public indecency in an airport men's room. Dr. Hugh H. Tilson, 67, was arrested Jan. 16 at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport after a plainclothes police officer said he saw Tilson masturbating at a urinal while watching other men urinate. … Tilson recently co-chaired a task force advising the Atlanta-based federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on setting agency priorities and goals. He was visiting Atlanta last week for a senior leadership retreat with CDC Director Julie Gerberding and others."

Former Connecticut Church Official Pleads Guilty In Child Pornography Case. The AP (1/23, Christoffersen) reports from Bridgeport, CT, "The former music director of a church where former President Bush once worshipped pleaded guilty on Monday to possessing child pornography." The AP continues, "Robert F. Tate, 64, of Greenwich, admitted possessing between 150 and 300 pornographic images of children, some engaging in sexually explicit conduct. Prosecutors said some children in the images were younger than 12 years old. … Tate was the longtime music director of Christ Church in Greenwich, where former President George H.W. Bush attended while growing up. Funeral services for his parents, Prescott Bush Sr. and Dorothy Walker Bush, were held there." The AP adds, "At his last hearing in December, President Bush's aunt and other members of the church attended to support Tate. .. .Tate faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced April 12."

Judge To Review Federal Probe Of Pellicano Documents Leak. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "A federal judge Monday said she would personally review the government's investigation into the disclosure of confidential documents in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping case, amid claims that the latest leak was triggered by a previously unreported FBI interview of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian. U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer's decision followed an acrimonious hearing at which attorneys for Pellicano and for Kerkorian's longtime attorney, Terry Christensen, complained that the leaks to the New York Times had severely hurt their clients' rights to a fair trial. The defense attorneys also pointedly questioned why authorities had not identified the source of the leaks after nine months of investigation." Christensen lawyer Terree Bowers "suggested that the government, fearing that the tapes might be ruled inadmissible, had decided to leak them," but US Attorney's office spokesman Thom Mrozek "said he would not comment on what he called 'the latest conspiracy theory being floated by people associated with the defense.'"

Pellicano Attorney Seeks Subpoenas Of NYTimes Reporters. The New York Times (1/23, Seelye) reports, "A defense lawyer in the case involving Anthony Pellicano, the Hollywood private eye accused of masterminding a long-running wiretapping ring, called yesterday for two New York Times reporters to be subpoenaed to find out who leaked them recordings of conversations and other evidence in the case." The Times continues, "On Jan. 11, The Times printed excerpts of 33 recorded conversations that Mr. Pellicano had with Terry N. Christensen, a lawyer for Kirk Kerkorian, the billionaire Hollywood mogul. The newspaper also put audio excerpts of the conversations on its Web site. Mr. Christensen has also been charged in connection with the wiretapping." The Times adds, "In papers filed last week in federal court, Mr. Christensen called on the judge, Dale S. Fischer of United States District Court, to force the two reporters, David M. Halbfinger and Allison Hope Weiner, to reveal their sources. … In a hearing yesterday in Los Angeles, Terree A. Bowers, the lawyer representing Mr. Christensen, told the judge that the reporters might be 'criminally liable' for their actions. He said in a telephone interview after the hearing that he told the judge that their posting of the conversations on the Internet violated his client's presumption of innocence. … The judge asked Mr. Bowers to spell out specifically what relief he is seeking and how he would like her to deal with the case. In a statement, Catherine J. Mathis, a spokeswoman for The New York Times Company, said: 'We believe it is critically important for reporters to be able to protect their confidential sources of information and will continue to advocate for their ability to do so.'"

Probe Finds Suspect Was Handcuffed Before Shooting LAPD Officer. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Blankstein, Winton) reports, "A suspect who was handcuffed by police during an early morning arrest in the Westlake district managed to reach for a gun hidden in his pants and open fire, seriously wounding a veteran officer, several LAPD sources familiar with the investigation told The Times today." The Times continues, LAPD Rampart Division training Officer Andy Taylor, 37, was rushed by ambulance to Cedars-Sinai Medical Center in Los Angeles, where he was treated for a gunshot wound to his shoulder and chest. … The 12-year veteran, who was listed in stable condition, also was hit in his bullet-proof vest. Chief William J. Bratton said that the officer could be released from the hospital as early as Tuesday." The Times adds, "Bratton said he would withhold comment on the specifics of the shooting until he is presented with a full preliminary briefing by investigators with the LAPD's Force Investigation Division. … Department officials said Taylor was one of several officers who responded to an apartment building in the 600 block of Coronado Street about 5 a.m. today after a report of an assault there. .. .According to the LAPD sources, who spoke to The Times on the condition on anonymity, the officers questioned several men in a second floor residence at the multi-unit complex."

Former Mississippi County Official Pleads Guilty To Katrina Kickbacks. The AP (1/23) reports, "Former Bolivar County (MS) Administrator Adrian Brown pleaded guilty Monday to receiving a cash kickback from Hurricane Katrina relief funds." Brown "remains charged with witness tampering," although he "was not taken into custody and will continue under his current $20,000 bond and supervised release until sentencing." The AP notes, "Brown was arrested by FBI agents at his office on June 6 for requesting and accepting kickbacks from David Spikes, as well as witness tampering. Spikes, who owns Nternet Solutions in Pace, was hired to develop and maintain a Web site for the county to assist displaced Katrina residents who evacuated there. … The indictment also charged that Brown used intimidation and threats to try to influence the testimony of Spikes' wife, Monique Spikes, to a federal grand jury."

Three In Louisiana Plead Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The Lafayette (LA) Daily Advertiser (1/23, Jackson) reports, "Two Morgan City residents and one New Iberia man pled guilty Monday after attempting to defraud FEMA. … Richard Hufnagel, 40, of New Iberia, admitted to applying for emergency benefits following Hurricane Katrina, claiming that he lived in a warehouse in New Orleans during the storm. Hufnagel received $55,000 in FEMA aid for flood damage he claimed to have suffered. … Morgan City resident Shannon Sylvester, 19, received $2,000 in disaster relief funds shortly after Hurricane Katrina in 2005, claiming she had to evacuate her New Orleans residence as a result of the storm. … Ashley Clark, 22, also of Morgan City, received $4,665 worth of FEMA aid after filing a claim for damages done to her residence as a result of Hurricane Rita."

Mississippi Woman Sentenced To Probation For FEMA Fraud. WLBT-TV Jackson (1/22) reported on its Web site, "A Ridgeland woman pled guilty and was sentenced for FEMA fraud related to Hurricane Katrina Monday. Tabuthia Bell was sentenced to three years of probation with forty hours of community service. Bell was accused of submitting a false claim to FEMA for Hurricane Katrina disaster assistance funds."

Immigrants Said To Keep Cockfighting Culture Alive. USA Today (1/23, 3A, Bazar) reports, "Immigration has helped fuel the popularity of cockfighting, a common practice in some countries that is illegal in most of the USA." USA continues, "Statistics are hard to come by, but law enforcement officials and animal rights groups in places such as Denver, Houston and Santa Barbara County, Calif., say they've seen a surge. Others question whether there's just more attention on the activity because police are cracking down. … Cockfighting is illegal in every state except Louisiana and New Mexico. … 'It's definitely on the rise,' says Wayne Pacelle, head of the Humane Society of the United States. Pacelle says the Internet has helped connect cockfighters. He also cites increased involvement of immigrants from countries such as Mexico and the Philippines. 'It's legal in a lot of places where there's significant immigration to the United States,' he says. 'You're seeing participation from people of those nations.'" USA notes, Mark Kumpf of the National Animal Control Association acknowledges there can be a cultural link. He doesn't think cockfighting is on the rise, though. What's up, he says, is enforcement. … Police are aggressively busting cockfighting operations, from fights to bird smuggling, because crimes such as drug dealing, assault and gambling often are associated, he says."

Maryland Couple, Company Settles Federal Contracting Fraud Charges. The AP (1/23) reports, "A Potomac (MD) couple and the company they run will pay $1.55 million to settle allegations that they submitted false claims on federal contracts, a case that involved a whistle blower who worked for the company." The AP continues, "Robert Yin and Karen Kaufman-Yin, along with their Bethesda-based company COSMOS Corp., allegedly submitted the claims for contracts with the National Science Foundation, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Justice Department." The AP adds, "Yin is the president of COSMOS while Kaufman-Yin is the vice president and chief financial officer. The company provides research, analysis and other services to government agencies and private organizations. … According to federal prosecutors, COSMOS improperly charged government contracts for costs that dealt with the company's operations, including marketing, bid proposals and administrative labor. The company is also accused of shifting labor costs from private contracts to its government contracts."

Wrongful Imprisonment Case Against FBI Nears End. The AP (1/23, Lavoie) reports from Boston, "Two men who spent decades in prison for a 1965 gangland slaying they didn't commit wept on the witness stand as they recounted what the years behind bars did to them and their families. … But Justice Department lawyers made it clear Monday that theirs will not be the kind of emotional case presented by the men who are suing the government for wrongful imprisonment and malicious prosecution." The AP continues, Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said the government will not offer testimony from a single live witness. Instead, the government will rely on depositions from several people involved in the 1965 murder case. … The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and two other men who died in prison after they were convicted in the 1965 killing of Edward 'Teddy' Deegan. They say the FBI cannot be held liable for the results of a separate state investigation." The AP adds, "Attorneys for the men, however, say the FBI knew the men had been framed for Deegan's killing, but hid evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men to protect a Mafia hitman and FBI informant, Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza. … Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza. … The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi."

NYTimes Calls For FDA Regulation Of Tobacco Products. The New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Any doubts that the tobacco industry has surreptitiously raised the nicotine content of cigarettes should be laid to rest by a study from researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health. They confirmed last year's discovery of the nicotine increase by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health and went on to identify how the tobacco companies designed their cigarettes to accomplish this." Their "continued bad behavior makes it imperative for Congress to grant the Food and Drug Administration the authority to regulate tobacco products, including the power to reduce nicotine levels and demand extensive data from the companies."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mississippi Voting Intimidation Case Resumes. The AP (1/23) reports from Jackson, MS, "The federal trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County entered its second week Monday with more testimony anticipated from whites who claim their right to participate in the election process has been violated." The AP continues, "Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. … Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population." The AP adds, "On Friday, two white witnesses said Brown had threatened to challenge their right to cast ballots in the party's 2003 primary. In addition, an unsuccessful white candidate for Noxubee County supervisor told the federal judge he was unfairly treated by the defendant as to how absentee ballots were counted in a close race against the eventual black winner. … Federal prosecutors want U.S. District Judge Tom Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped. … Cheri Anne Eaves and Kari Hardy testified on Friday that Brown accused them of being disloyal Democrats and had threatened to try to deny their right to vote in the 2003 Democratic primary. Brown allegedly had put them on a list he circulated of 174 white voters he would challenge as ineligible to participate in Democratic Party election because they were closet Republicans."

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/23, Gates) reports, "A black Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee official said she was going to follow her own law in counting absentee ballots during a 2003 primary election, a white candidate's son testified Monday. … 'I was not allowed to make challenges,' said Richard Heard, whose father was a candidate for county sheriff." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters. … A trial on the lawsuit is in its second week in U.S. District Court in Jackson. District Judge Tom S. Lee will decide the case. … The Justice Department is still presenting its side." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Wil Colom, attorney for the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and Chairman Ike Brown, said his clients believe the complaints are imagined. Colom said most of the charges regarding election discrepancies are normal election errors and miscues that happen every year in every county in America. … Heard testified that he remembered seeing one absentee ballot where the signature didn't match the name on the application and questioned pollworkers about it. … But Heard said the woman in charge at the polls eventually said 'We aren't going by state law but my law today.' … Heard said he also was concerned that an absentee ballot he notarized for a white voter was rejected."

Unanimous Supreme Court Strikes Down Prisoner Lawsuits' Hurdles. The New York Times (1/23, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "ruled unanimously that a federal appeals court had overstepped its bounds by making prisoner lawsuits even harder to file than Congress intended. The barriers the lower court had put in place 'cannot fairly be viewed' as a correct interpretation of the law, the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said for the court. Unless Congress explicitly provided otherwise, Chief Justice Roberts explained, courts should apply to prisoners' lawsuits the same procedural rules they apply to any other lawsuit and 'should generally not depart from the usual practice under the federal rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns.'"

The AP (1/23) reports, "In an opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts, the court overturned procedural obstacles in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that led to dismissal of civil rights complaints brought by three Michigan inmates. … The appeals court in Cincinnati covers the states of Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky. Federal courts in the circuit allowed just 18 of nearly 500 inmate civil rights suits to proceed, a recent American Civil Liberties Union study concluded, making the circuit the most restrictive in the country for such lawsuits." The AP adds, "The Republican-controlled Congress passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act in 1995, seeking to slow a flood of federal lawsuits. … The law requires prisoners to go through a lengthy administrative grievance process before they may sue in court. … The law worked – too well, according to critics. Nearly 42,000 civil rights petitions were filed in 1995 before the law took effect. Five years later, the number was down to 26,000, according to the Justice Department. … 'Today's decision will at least help to ensure that the courthouse door is not completely shut,' ACLU legal director Steven Shapiro said in a statement."

Long Beach, CA, Uneasily Awaits Hate-Crime Verdict. The Washington Post (1/23, A3, Geis) reports from Long Beach, CA, "A crowd of black teenagers and three young white women stood on a street corner on Halloween night. A male voice cried, 'I hate [expletive] white people!' The crowd surged, and someone cracked one of the whites in the head with a skateboard, dropping her to the ground. That much is not in dispute. … Who is responsible and how this could happen in the port city of Long Beach, which prides itself on its diversity and tolerance, has been the subject of arguments in court, civic forums and private living rooms here ever since." The Post continues, "Ten defendants -- nine female and one male, ages 12 to 18 -- were charged with assault for allegedly beating and kicking the women, giving one 12 facial fractures and another a concussion. Eight of the teenagers are also charged with a hate crime. Their trial has dragged on since early November." The Post adds, "This week attorneys are expected to finish closing arguments and a judge will render verdicts. The city is waiting uneasily to find out whether it will live up to its self-image as a unified, tolerant community or dissolve into racial hostility. … City leaders have reacted to the racial flare-up with alacrity, sending out volunteers to the victims and organizing community forums to denounce racism. … Yet some African Americans express frustration that city leaders have not been more visible in their community. Some are also angry at the local newspaper, which initially covered the victims' story that they were attacked, without reporting that some witnesses called it a mutual fight, or that the arrested teenagers have no criminal history and are accomplished athletes on a local high school track team."

Former California Executive Claims He Was Dismissed For Religious Reasons. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Goffard) reports, "A former executive of an Irvine car wax manufacturer alleges in a lawsuit that the company fired him because he had not pursued 'a Christian lifestyle' and wasn't 'on fire for Jesus.'" The Times continues, "Atticus O. Firey, 34, of Newport Beach contends Meguiar's

Inc. committed religious discrimination when it fired him in July after nearly 10 years with the company. Company president Barry Meguiar repeatedly urged Firey, then the chief operating officer, to attend church, the suit alleges, and told him he was 'robbing this company of the blessing of God by not being on your knees and on fire for Jesus.' … Meguiar, who is host of a cable TV and radio program called 'Car Crazy,' did not return a call seeking comment. His lawyer, Richard Ruben, said religion had nothing to do with Firey's firing. He said the company's senior management decided to terminate Firey because his job performance was sub-par, with a management style that was 'demeaning' and 'negative.' … He added that the company's management includes 'people of all religions' and characterized the lawsuit as a 'publicity stunt.' He said he expected a judge to throw out the suit, because Firey had previously agreed to submit to arbitration, rather than go to the courts, should such a dispute arise. … The suit, filed Friday in Orange County Superior Court, says Meguiar sat in Firey's office and read to him from the Bible, thrust Christian books on him and demanded he read them and forced managers to attend prayer meetings. When Firey asked about a promised bonus, the suit says, Meguiar said he would not give it to him until Firey joined a Christian church."

Virginia Delegate Makes Amends For Controversial Comments. The Washington Post (1/23, B1, Gardner, 690K) reports Virginia GOP Del. Frank Hargrove, "who caused an uproar last week by questioning the need for a state apology for slavery, proposed a measure Monday that would commemorate the freeing of the last U.S. slaves in June 1865." Hargrove "said he has been deluged with at least 4,000 phone calls and e-mails at his home and office since he inflamed the House of Delegates by saying that blacks should 'get over' slavery and that apologizing for slavery was no more necessary than asking Jews to apologize for 'killing Christ.'"

ANTITRUST:

Georgia State Lawmakers Urge DOJ To Reject Delta Bid. The AP (1/23, Bluestein) reports, "Georgia's legislative leaders signed a letter Monday urging the Justice Department to reject a takeover bid facing Delta Air Lines, the Atlanta-based carrier locked in a corporate battle to remain a stand-alone company." The AP continues, "The lawmakers said in the letter that a merger between Delta and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. would result in skyrocketing air fares and reduced competition. … 'The tremendous amount of overlap between the route networks of these carriers will drive significant consolidation, reduce flight choices, increase fares for our consumers, affect jobs and have a negative impact on our region,' the legislators said in the letter, which was addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." The AP adds, "The ceremonial signing by House Speaker Glenn Richardson and Senate President Pro-tem Eric Johnson drew a gaggle of reporters and lawmakers. It represents the latest attempt by Delta to bring its boardroom struggle into the public. … The airline, the nation's third-largest, has reached out to Atlanta's business and civic leaders and organized public rallies to protest the takeover bid launched by its archrival in November 2006."

The Athens (GA) Banner-Herald (1/23, Eckenrode) reports, "Legislators also on Monday introduced resolutions in the House and Senate voicing support for Atlanta-based Delta. .. US Airways is offering Delta's creditors more than $10 billion in cash and stock to accept the merger. … Delta is fighting the offer and wants to emerge from bankruptcy this year standing on its own." The Banner-Herald adds, "Delta's creditors have not yet weighed in on the bid. But if it is approved, the deal still will have to receive approval from the Justice Department because of antitrust questions. … A U.S. Senate committee on Wednesday also is expected to look at how the proposed merger would effect competition and air service on routes where the two airlines overlap."

WAGA-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/22, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "A high-level show of support for Delta Air Lines as it tries to fight off a hostile takeover bid. Georgia's top legislative leaders signed a letter to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez asking for 'a full and careful review' of the takeover bid by Us Airways. Delta has said it wants to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone airline. With this great company and ensuring that they stay here in Atlanta and they are vie Brant for the future." WSB-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/22, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "This is an ad that the Delta pilots took out in USA Today outlining why they think the bid is a bad idea, this on the same day that Delta got support from Georgia's legislative leaders. From the Lieutenant Governor to Georgia's Speaker of the House, all signing a letter to Attorney General, Alberto Gonzalez reviewing the takeover bid for Delta. The lawmakers' letter saying that overlap between the two airlines will affect jobs and have a negative impact on Georgia's economy. I'm convinced that delta's standing alone will be in the best interest of all the citizens, not only just here in Georgia, but abroad. WXIA-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/22, 7:00 p.m.), and other cities also broadcasted this story. Some examples are: WAWS-TV, Jacksonville, FL (1/22, 4:00 p.m.), WTVQ-TV, Lexington, KY (1/22, 5:30 p.m.), and WAGT-TV, Augusta, GA (1/22, 11:00 p.m.) and Chattanooga, TN.

US Air's Delta Offer Loses Creditor Support. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A2, Dade, Carey, Trottman) reports, "As a Senate committee prepares to take testimony tomorrow on consolidation in the airline industry, US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile $10.1 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. appears to be losing traction among creditors who will determine the fate of the Atlanta airline, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "After digging into the details of the US Airways offer -- which was sweetened 20% less than two weeks ago -- and hiring former Continental Airlines Inc. Chairman Gordon Bethune to help analyze its prospects, the Delta creditors' committee has grown skeptical of the proposed merger, these people said." The Journal adds, "Separately, talks about a possible merger between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. have been put on hold, without a framework for a deal and without specific plans for further negotiations, according to people familiar with the thinking of both sides. … Delta creditors encouraged the talks, which culminated in a series of 'detailed, specific conversations' among senior managers from the companies regarding potential structures, processes and timetables for a transaction, according to a person knowledgeable about the matter. A combination of Delta and Northwest remains 'a very viable option,' according to one person close to the situation, but isn't likely to be pursued until both airlines emerge from bankruptcy protection this year, if ever. Delta intends to leave Chapter 11 proceedings in April and has made its own proposal to creditors to emerge as a stand-alone company. Northwest hopes to emerge from bankruptcy-court protection in the second quarter."

Cemex Extends Bid For Rinker. Bloomberg (1/23, Steffens) reports, "Cemex SA, the world's third-largest cement maker, extended its $11.7 billion hostile takeover bid for Australia's Rinker Group Ltd. by two months while it waits for U.S. regulatory approval." Bloomberg continues, "Cemex's $13-a-share offer for Australia's biggest building materials company will now end March 30, the Monterrey, Mexico-based company said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today. … Cemex wants to buy Rinker because of its business in the U.S., which is focused on Florida, Arizona and Nevada, the fastest-growing states. The deal would make it the world's biggest cement maker. Cemex Chairman Lorenzo Zambrano said today the offer is ``compelling" while Rinker has described it as 36 percent too low." Bloomberg adds, "Cemex is offering to pay Rinker's shareholders in U.S. dollars, saying they can choose to be paid in Australian dollars at the exchange rate prevailing at the time of settlement. … U.S. antitrust regulators on Nov. 30 said they needed more information from both companies before being able to make a ruling on the proposed deal."

3M Poised To Clear Books On Antitrust Suits. The Legal Intelligencer (1/23, Duffy) reports, "With a proposed settlement worth nearly $40 million, office supply giant 3M is poised to close the books on more than a decade of litigating antitrust suits." The Intelligencer continues, "In a series of suits, a competitor and purchasers accused 3M -- the maker of Scotch tape and Post-It Notes -- of abusing its monopoly power in the market for transparent tape by driving a competitor out of business." The Intelligencer adds, "The $39.75 million settlement in Bradburn Parent/Teacher Store Inc. v. 3M -- a class action brought by direct purchasers and retailers -- comes on the heels of a trio of settlements reached last year. … In court papers filed last week, plaintiffs lawyers asked U.S. District Judge John R. Padova to grant final approval of the settlement and to award them attorney fees of $13.9 million and nearly $1 million in litigation costs for their 11,000 hours of work over four years. … In August, Padova approved a $28.8 million settlement in Meijer Inc. v. 3M, a class action brought on behalf of large-volume retailers who were excluded from the Bradburn case. … And court papers show that 3M also struck deals with two big retailers that had opted out of the Meijer case -- Kmart and Publix Supermarkets Inc." The Intelligencer notes, "All of those suits stemmed directly from a 1997 suit, LePage's Inc. v. 3M, which resulted in a $68 million verdict in 1999 and a finding that 3M had set out to monopolize the market for transparent tape. … LePage's, a competing supplier of tape, had accused 3M of using illegal tactics to drive it out of business."

Qantas Suitors Seek To Reassure Unions. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, C9) reports, "The buyout group bidding for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. met with union officials yesterday, promising not to cut services or send maintenance operations offshore, amid fears about jobs and working conditions. … However, unions said they wanted legally binding guarantees to protect staff and would continue talks with the buyout consortium, Qantas and the Australian government." The Journal continues, "The Airline Partners Australia consortium, which includes Macquarie Bank Ltd., Allco Finance Group Ltd., Allco Equity Partners Ltd. and North American private equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Onex Corp., said it talked with representatives from the Transport Workers Union and the Australian & International Pilots Association."

Equity Officer Properties Considers Another Takeover Bid. The New York Times (1/23, Pristin) reports, "Equity Office Properties, which agreed in November to be bought by a private equity company, the Blackstone Group, for $36 billion, including debt, said yesterday that it would begin discussions with a rival group that has offered to top that price." The Times continues, "Equity Office, the nation's largest office landlord, with 585 buildings in 24 metropolitan areas, also said it would open its books to the challengers, a consortium led by Vornado Realty Trust." The Times adds, "Raising the stakes in what was already the largest buyout battle ever, Vornado and its partners, Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital, proposed last week to pay $52 a share for Equity Office, or 7.2 percent more than what Blackstone has offered. Vornado, a real estate investment trust that owns more than 100 million square feet of office, retail and showroom property, said its offer would include about $10.6 billion of its stock. … Setting a Jan. 31 deadline for the Vornado group to submit a formal proposal, Equity Office said it continued to recommend approval of the Blackstone merger."

Record Industry Mulls Unrestricted Digital Music. The New York Times (1/23, Shannon) reports, "As even digital music revenue growth falters because of rampant file-sharing by consumers, the major record labels are moving closer to releasing music on the Internet with no copying restrictions — a step they once vowed never to take." The Times continues, "Executives of several technology companies meeting here at Midem, the annual global trade fair for the music industry, said over the weekend that at least one of the four major record companies could move toward the sale of unrestricted digital files in the MP3 format within months." The Times adds, "Most independent record labels already sell tracks digitally compressed in the MP3 format, which can be downloaded, e-mailed or copied to computers, cellphones, portable music players and compact discs without limit. … The independents see providing songs in MP3 partly as a way of generating publicity that could lead to future sales. … For the major recording companies, however, selling in the MP3 format would be a capitulation to the power of the Internet, which has destroyed their control over the worldwide distribution of music." The Times notes, "Until last year, the industry was counting on online purchases of music, led by Apple's iTunes music store, to make up the difference. … But digital sales in 2006, while 80 percent ahead of the year before, grew slower than in 2005 and did not compensate for the decline in physical sales, according to an industry report released in London last week."

ENVIRONMENT:

President To Link Energy Security, Global Warming In State Of The Union. In an analysis, the Financial Times (1/23, Daniel) writes, "In his quest for a defining legacy beyond the Iraq war, tonight a chastened President George W. Bush in his State of the Union address will put energy security - reducing US dependence on foreign oil - at the heart of his political agenda for his final two years." In tonight's speech, Bush "will make an explicit link between the demands of energy security and the environment, says Tony Snow, White House spokesman." The "fact that Mr Bush is even talking about his actions on climate change, and will set out how his own policy helps address it, marks a profound departure from the past. Yet there remain doubts about whether the White House is willing to embrace more radical energy efficiency initiatives, or abandon its policy of the first six years of seeking to expand the supply of domestic oil." The Times adds, "Senior aides say he has been frustrated by the barrage of leaders admonishing him on global warming, from Tony Blair's constant solicitations to interventions by Angela Merkel, the German chancellor."

Corporate Leaders Urge Bush To Support Carbon Dioxide Caps. The Washington Post (1/23, A6, Mufson, 690K) reports, "On the eve of the State of the Union address, the chief executives of 10 major corporations urged President Bush to embrace mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in order to stem climate change. But yesterday White House spokesman Tony Snow said that binding caps on carbon dioxide emissions would not be part of the president's proposals tonight." There "has been widespread speculation about what Bush might say about climate change tonight." The Post adds, "Major corporate leaders have been changing their position on climate change for the past year or two, and many of them are convinced that some form of regulation of or tax on carbon emissions is inevitable. With many states talking about coming up with their own laws, corporate leaders have started to urge the federal government to establish a nationwide standard."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Ball, 2.04M) reports, "[S]ome of the country's biggest industrial companies are acknowledging that fossil fuels are a major culprit" in global warming and that their "emissions should be cut significantly over time. ... Some see a lucrative new market in clean-energy technologies. Many figure a regulation is politically inevitable and they want to be in the room when it's negotiated, to minimize the burden that falls on them." The "broadening, if incomplete, consensus that fossil fuels are at least a big part of the global-warming problem signals real change in the environmental debate. The biggest question going forward no longer is whether fossil-fuel emissions should be curbed. It's who will foot the bill for the cleanup -- and that battle is heating up."

Speech Expected To Boost Ethanol. The New York Times (1/23, Barrionuevo, 1.16M) reports, "After three decades of surviving mostly on tax subsidies," the ethanol industry "is poised tonight to get its biggest endorsement from on high that it has a long-term future as a home-grown alternative to gasoline. In his State of the Union address, President Bush is expected to call for a huge increase in the amount of ethanol that refiners mix with gasoline, probably double the current goal of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012." Although "the details of the proposal are not known, 15 billion gallons of ethanol would work out to more than 10 percent of the country's current gasoline consumption, and is far beyond the current capacity of about 5.4 billion gallons." The Times adds, "For an industry once dominated by the will of a single powerful producer, Archer Daniels Midland, ethanol has come a long way, joining the oil industry and producers of major agricultural commodities as an entrenched political force in Washington."

The Washington Post (1/23, A6, Mufson, 690K) reports, "The energy agenda in Washington has been long dominated by oil interests, but in a reversal of political fortunes, these days it is Big Oil fighting to preserve its tax incentives and the ethanol industry that is adding new ones. President Bush may up the ante tonight in his State of the Union address, many analysts think, by setting new targets for ethanol use or encouraging automakers to shift to engines capable of handling E85." The "ethanol industry is already on a roll" and "investors drove up the stock prices of ethanol companies yesterday in anticipation of Bush's speech." But "an increasing number of economists and energy experts are questioning whether the benefits of producing ethanol -- especially ethanol made from corn -- have been oversold."

Pelosi Plan For Climate Change Committee Meets Resistance. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Eilperin, Grunwald, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's "power play" in creating a select committee on energy independence and climate change, "demonstrated her seriousness about climate, a complex issue that may be as legislatively difficult and politically treacherous as health care was in the 1990s. But it also reflected her seriousness about imposing discipline on her caucus and preventing a return to the days when long-serving Democratic chairmen ran their committees as independent fiefdoms." Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell, "a legendary defender of his committee's prerogatives as well as the carbon-emitting auto industry of his home state -- had made it clear that he expected to lead the party's global-warming debate in a rather leisurely fashion. Pelosi was end-running him." Dingell "saw Pelosi's new committee as a recipe for duplication, incompetence and the suppression of democracy." And California Rep. Henry A. Waxman, chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, "warned that Pelosi might be scheming to write bills out of her own office. 'That's the way the Republicans did it,' Waxman said. Those are fighting words in the new majority, and some Energy and Commerce Democrats are willing to fight."

The Hill (1/23, Snyder) reports Dingell "found an unlikely ally in his spat" with Pelosi "over a new climate-change panel: former committee chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas). While Barton and Dingell have butted heads on energy policy, the two were like-minded in their opposition to a select committee on climate change that would operate outside the bounds of their own committee." The "spat threatened to draw energy lobbyists, who largely had sat on the sidelines this session, into an awkward intra-caucus fight between two people — Dingell and Pelosi — it doesn't pay to upset."

The Hill (1/23, Kaplan) reports New York Rep. Anthony Weiner and other Democrats on the House Energy and Commerce Committee "were disgruntled" about Pelosi's "plan to take away some of their turf by creating a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming" with Massachusetts Rep. Edward Markey at its head. The Hill adds, "Some liberal Democrats are said to be frustrated with [Dingell], who is closely allied with the auto industry and opposes some measures, such as increasing gas mileage standards, to reduce greenhouse gases. But a cross-section of members are frustrated with Markey."

Energy Self-Sufficiency Goal Called Unrealistic. In a Wall Street Journal (1/23, A19, 2.04M) op-ed, Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, writes, "With geopolitical turmoil, volatile prices and continuing reminders of the international political power of oil, the concept of energy independence is compelling and deeply appealing." But "if energy independence is presented as self-sufficiency, it will likely fall flat. And, as prices run through their cycles, disappointment will undermine the longer-term commitments that are required for a sound energy future. Today, quite simply, cutting ourselves off from global energy markets is not realistic." However, "if the goal of energy independence is understood differently, to mean energy security -- resilience, robustness, reduced vulnerability -- then it is much more useful." This kind of definition "emphasizes the central goal of diversification -- encouraging investment and higher levels of research and development in both alternative and conventional energy sources. It means a new push for energy conservation, higher energy efficiency, lower energy intensity." It also "requires an understanding that this kind of energy independence -- as measured in energy security -- actually requires interdependence with other nations, both consumers and producers of energy."

Ford Introduces Hydrogen Hybrid As Industry Hopes For More Research Funding. The Washington Post (1/23, D1, Freeman, 690K) reports on Ford's introduction of the HySeries Edge, "a plug-in hybrid with an electric drive powered by a battery and a hydrogen fuel cell." The car's "arrival intensifies the competition to manufacture a mass-market electric hybrid that reduces reliance on gasoline and curbs the emission of greenhouse gases. But the futuristic Edge vehicle is Ford's only one, and it cost $2 million to build." The Post adds, "To get a car like this into the showroom for sale to the public will require the automotive and energy industries to leap high technological hurdles. The infrastructure to deliver alternative fuels such as hydrogen is in its infancy, and engineers are puzzling over how to mass-produce a lightweight, inexpensive and safe electric battery." The "industry is hoping President Bush will announce his intention to increase research funding during his State of the Union speech tonight."

Judge Moves Hearing On Nevada Bomb Test To January 31. The AP (1/23) reports, "A federal judge has pushed forward by one day a scheduled hearing on a proposed non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would generate a mushroom-shaped dust cloud in the Nevada desert." The AP continues, "Judge Lloyd George cited a scheduling conflict in moving the date of the telephone conference call to January 31st. A Justice Department lawyer from Washington is due to provide an update of the federal Defense Threat Reduction Agency proposal. No date has been set for the blast. … It would involve detonating a 700-ton ammonium nitrate and fuel oil bomb at the Nevada Test Site -- about 85 miles northwest of Las Vegas." The AP adds, "Government officials call the test important for gathering data about penetrating hardened and deeply buried targets. Critics have called it a surrogate for a low-yield nuclear 'bunker-buster' bomb. … They say it'll scatter dust contaminated nuclear weapons tests at the test site. The explosion has been postponed since Western Shoshone tribe members and 'downwinders' in Utah and Nevada filed suit last year."

Utah Land-Use Plan Revisited. The Salt Lake Tribune (1/23, Baird) reports, "The federal government and environmental groups got a do-over Monday in their bid to dismiss a lawsuit filed by Kane and Garfield counties that seeks to overturn the Grand Stair- case-Escalante National Monument's land-use plan." The Tribune continues, "U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart originally heard arguments to dismiss the suit last fall, then recused himself. Judge Bruce Jenkins replaced Stewart, and opted to hear the arguments for a second time at the Moss Courthouse in downtown Salt Lake City. … But where Stewart seemed skeptical of the government's contention that the counties could show no harm from the monument plan - and thus had no standing to bring the suit - Jenkins appeared dubious that the counties could make their claims stick without laying out more specifics." The Tribune adds, "Jenkins also challenged the counties' argument that they have been permanently tied to the decisions made by the Bureau of Land Management in 1999 that regulated travel, water diversions and other land uses in the monument. … 'What statute do you point to showing that this is a final agency action?' Jenkins asked Shawn Welch, the counties' attorney, during the nearly two-hour hearing. … The counties have claimed that there is a large network of county-owned roads that criss-cross the 1.8 million-acre monument that the BLM has refused to recognize. … Justice Department attorney Tom Snodgrass once again argued that the counties have failed to prove any road ownership claims beyond four routes that were recognized in the land-use plan - and thus could show no harm."

NRC Commissioner Says Efforts To Build New Reactors Hampered By Budget Delay. Under the headline, "Lack of Budget Could Hurt Nuclear Energy Revival, Official Says," the New York Times (1/23, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "The senior member of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission warned on Monday that the failure of Congress to pass a detailed budget for the current fiscal year could damage the nuclear renaissance that the government tried so hard to encourage with the energy bill of 2005." The Times adds that Commissioner "Edward McGaffigan Jr., said that if the commission received applications this year, 'we basically are going to have to put them on the shelf, because we're not going to have the folks to work on the applications until well into calendar year 2008.'" Having passed only "two of the 11 spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, 2006," much of the "government has been operating under a 'continuing resolution,'" and "Democrats say they plan to extend that resolution through Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year." Commissioner "McGaffigan said that if the commission could not process applications, some companies wanting to build would decide to wait."

Greater Oversight Of US Oil, Gas Leases Urged. Karin Lissakers, director of the Revenue Watch Institute, writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) that during the "last six months, media coverage, Congressional hearings, lawsuits by private citizens and a scathing report by the Interior Department's inspector general have exposed a litany of failures in the department's management of oil and gas leases on public lands and waters." In fact, Lissakers says the failures "have become so glaring, in fact, that there is even speculation that the President, a good friend to the energy industry, might speak about them in his State of the Union address tonight." She urges Congress, "with the president's encouragement," to "insist that the United States practice at home the transparency it preaches abroad," by "enact[ing] a requirement that all companies extracting oil, gas and other minerals from federal lands publicly report all of their production on those lands and all royalties and other payments made to the federal government from that production." Only then, she concludes, "can the American public have confidence that the taxes owed by those who have benefited from the use of our public lands are being properly accounted for and fully collected."

WPost Urges Cleanup Of Anacostia River. The Washington Post (1/23, A16) editorializes, "The promise of massive redevelopment in the District -- new neighborhoods, office buildings, parks, retail complexes, and baseball and soccer stadiums, with the Anacostia River as an urban centerpiece -- could wind up mired in muck. As reported in distressing detail by staff writer David A. Fahrenthold, the river is disgracefully dirty, brimming with trash, toxic chemicals, dead animals, diseased fish and raw sewage. At least the Potomac River and the Chesapeake Bay have constituencies pressing for improvements in those waters; but without a groundswell to revive the Anacostia, potential developers may hold their noses and turn away." The Post continues, "One revolting source of pollution is the District's sewer system, designed more than 100 years ago to dump raw sewage into the river during rainstorms. The D.C. Water and Sewer Authority has a plan to dig huge tunnels under the city to store this flow and then treat it to remove the sewage. But the agency's chief of staff, Johnnie Hemphill, told The Post that the project could take close to 20 years and $2 billion. This month, the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court's ruling that set stricter caps on the amounts of pollutants dumped into the Anacostia. Jerry N. Johnson, the water and sewer authority's general manager, said the new rules may slow the project while officials figure out how to adapt. But the cleanup must go faster, not slower. … No single pollution solution exists, but until federal, state and local officials develop a sense of emergency, the Anacostia River will continue to dampen the chances of economic vitality in the core of this region."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Disagrees With Attorneys On Timing Of Arellano Felix Trial. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/23, Soto) reports, "The federal judge overseeing the possible death-penalty trial of accused drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Felix sharply disagreed with lawyers for both the defense and the prosecution over when a jury would hear the case." The Union-Tribune continues, "Prosecutors and defense lawyers told U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns Monday that they could be ready to take the case to trial in June 2008. … Burns disagreed and refused to put the case off that far. … He has been pushing the lawyers to get the case before a jury quickly, at first saying that it should go this spring, but now insisting it can get started this year." The Union-Tribune adds, "The lawyers say that's impossible, given the voluminous evidence gathered against Arellano and the fact that before the case can go forward, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty. … Arellano is accused of racketeering and conspiracy, and could face the death penalty if convicted of operating a continuing criminal conspiracy that has led to several murders. … Also accused in the case is Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who prosecutors say was a top Arellano Felix henchman who ordered the beheadings of Rosarito Beach police officers last year."

Extradited Mexican "Drug Lords" Appear In US Court. There are now more than 400 media references to the extradition and U.S. court appearance of several Mexican "drug lords" and others. For example, the AP (1/23) reports four "drug lords who had been serving time in Mexican prisons were brought shackled into an American courtroom Monday to face drug and intimidation charges. Among them was Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, believed to be one of the kingpins most responsible for violence along the Texas-Mexico border in recent years, said Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. 'This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership,' Tandy told reporters by teleconference from Washington." The AP adds, "Besides Cardenas-Guillen, the group includes Hector Palma Salazar, the suspected former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana."

In a separate story, the AP (1/23) reports from Mexico City that President Felipe Calderon "pledged Monday to wage a permanent war against organized crime by coordinating more closely with local police and giving all law enforcement better training, equipment and intelligence work. … His comments came three days after his administration extradited four alleged drug lords and 11 other suspects to the United States. He said he wouldn't give up the battle." Tandy "described the extraditions as 'an enormous leap forward.' 'Most were major drug traffickers. Many were long-term targets of the United States. All now face their worst fear: U.S. justice,' Tandy said in a media conference call Monday. 'On behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives.'"

The AP (1/22) also reported that more than a dozen leaders and workers in Mexico's "most brutal and powerful drug cartels were brought before a federal magistrate in Houston Monday before being shipped to several states to face charges. They face various drug-related charges in different states, including New York, Colorado and California, officials said." News outlets that used a version of the AP story include CBS News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, Dallas Morning News, San Diego Union-Tribune, Miami Herald, Fort Worth Star Telegram, and Forbes.

USA Today (1/23, Leinwand) reports a "suspected Mexican drug lord whose cartel allegedly smuggled more than four tons of cocaine a month over the U.S. border will stand trial in Texas. Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, the alleged kingpin of the Gulf Cartel, and three other alleged drug lords appeared in a Houston court Monday. Mexican authorities delivered Cardenas-Guillen and 14 other alleged Mexican drug dealers and criminals to Houston late Friday and early Saturday, the Drug Enforcement Administration said." Cardenas-Guillen "was charged in Texas in December 2000 with drug trafficking and threatening to kill federal agents, Tandy said. Cardenas-Guillen and his cohorts allegedly attempted to kidnap and kill a DEA agent and an FBI agent during a confrontation in November 1999, the indictment said."

The Dallas Morning News (1/23, Corchado) reports President Calderón "called on the political opposition Monday to share 'co-responsibility' for fighting the drug war, and senior U.S. officials praised Mr. Calderón's 'stunning' leadership in extraditing alleged Mexican drug lords to the U.S." John Walters "said the Bush administration is prepared to 'look at added resources' to help strengthen Mexican security." Karen Tandy said, "This past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico took an enormous leap forward, particularly with the extradition of Mexican drug kingpin Osiel Cárdenas-Guillén. … For the past eight years, he commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world." The Myrtle Beach Sun News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Contra Costa Times used the Dallas Morning News story.

On its Web site, KHOU-TV, Houston (1/22) reports federal agents in Mexico who "transported reputed kingpin Osiel Cardenas Guillen shot video that appeared on a Web site of the Mexican newspaper El Universal. It shows Osiel Cardenas on a flight to Houston where he was handed over to DEA agents."

KHOU-TV, Houston (1/23) also reports on its Web site that Karen Tandy said, "This is the first time that the Supreme Court of Mexico has extradited cartel leaders and leadership." KHOU adds that Cardenas "is considered to be one of the most dangerous drug kingpins in recent history who, according to DEA agents, transported up to six tons of cocaine per month to the U.S."

Suspects Won't Face Death Penalty. The Houston Chronicle (1/23) reports Cardenas "is also charged with leading an ambush of U.S. federal agents in Matamoros, across the border from Brownsville, in November 1999. Brandishing his trademark gold-plated .45-caliber pistol, Cardenas and a dozen of his henchmen surrounded a car carrying two agents from the DEA and the FBI and threatened to kill them if they didn't turn over an informant, Tandy said." Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said none of the suspects will face the death penalty, a punishment that does not exist in Mexico. 'We have to make the assurances necessary for a successful extradition,' McNulty said. John Walters...agreed, calling it 'a watershed event.'"

Mexico's Attorney General Plans More Extraditions. The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Enriquez, Martinez) reported, "On the heels of the extradition of four top drug cartel leaders, Mexico's attorney general said Sunday he planned to send more suspects to face U.S. trials, tacitly acknowledging that corruption had allowed drug kingpins to direct operations even while in maximum-security Mexican prisons. … Aggressive extradition is emerging as the second prong of Mexican President Felipe Calderon's get-tough approach to the drug gang violence that killed more than 2,000 people nationwide last year. In January, 17 Mexican suspects have been handed over to U.S. authorities, a pace that would easily surpass last year's record 63 extraditions."

Gonzales Praises Calderon. CNN Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/22, 6:14 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says we recognize the bold stance of President Felipe Calderon. Some of those most directly affected remain skeptical including US border sheriffs. The corruption is almost out of control. And it would be hard for anyone, including the President of Mexico, to come in and try to clean up the problem. In fact, US officials expect a short-term increase in violence. Many kingpins run their business prisons and some of those cartels are now leaderless. The DEA held a rare conference call to its reporters today. That the cooperation from Mexico President Calderon is both extraordinary and significant. And also one Justice Department official praised the Mexico government for showing what it called courage in taking on drug trafficking organizations."

Alabama Drug Ring Busted After Two-Year Probe. The Tuscaloosa News (Alabama) (1/23, Taylor) reports, "More than 20 people have been accused of taking part in a sophisticated operation that brought illegal drugs from the West Coast to West Alabama." The News continues, "A two-year investigation by dozens of federal agents and local law enforcement officers resulted in federal drug trafficking charges against 21 people from Tuscaloosa and Greene counties." The News adds, "A 37-count indictment unsealed Monday charges them with distribution of powder and crack cocaine. Twelve of them were arrested over the weekend. … The men allegedly used several drivers who used 18-wheeler freight trucks to haul drugs from California to a location in Greene County where it was then distributed to lower-level dealers, said Jill Ellis, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Birmingham. … David Smith, 58, of Boligee was described as the organizer of the operation." The News notes, "The first count of the indictment charges Smith with operating a continuing criminal enterprise. Other charges included using a telephone or computer to facilitate drug trafficking, conspiracy to posses with the intent to distribute and distribution of cocaine and crack. … 'Smith's drug trafficking organization was a major distributor of powder and crack cocaine to high- and mid-level dealers throughout West Alabama,' U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said in a written release. … The men arrested over the weekend were described as

'lieutenants' within the organization, or distributors who use 'runners' to get the drugs to street-level buyers."

The Birmingham (AL) News (1/23) reports, "Dozens of federal, state and local law enforcement officers on Saturday rounded up the first dozen of those indicted, including David Smith, 58, of Boligee, whom U.S. Attorney Alice Martin described as the organizer of the ring. … Gregory Borland, assistant special agent in charge of Alabama's Drug Enforcement Administration, called the investigation one of the most significant he has been involved in Alabama."

Mike Tyson Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges In Arizona. In Phoenix, the AP (1/23) reports former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson "pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of drug possession and driving under the influence of drugs. … Tyson was indicted earlier this month on felony drug possession and paraphernalia possession counts and two misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence of drugs. If convicted of all four charges, he could be sentenced to up to 7 1/2 years in prison."

Researchers Tie Gun Ownership Rate To Homicide Rate. The New York Times (1/23, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "States with the greatest number of guns in the home also have the highest rates of homicide, a new study finds. The study, in the February issue of Social Science and Medicine, looked at gun ownership in all 50 states and then compared the results with the number of people killed over a three-year period. The research, the authors said, 'suggests that household firearms are a direct and an indirect source of firearms used to kill Americans both in their homes and on the streets.'"

Report Examines Problems With Philadelphia Gun Dealers. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/23, Moran) reports, "Gun-control advocates joined Philadelphia Police Commissioner Sylvester M. Johnson yesterday in calling for more prosecutions of gun dealers who sell to the gun-traffickers and straw purchasers fueling the violence plaguing Philadelphia and other cities." The Inquirer continues, "At City Hall, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a national report, 'Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers,' that highlights more than two dozen cases - including nine in Pennsylvania - of dealers who sold guns that wound up in the hands of criminals. The criminals were prosecuted but the dealers were not. … 'The recent upsurge in criminal gun violence places renewed importance on the question: Where do criminals get their guns?' the report states." The Inquirer adds, "The report identified, among others, Abington Gun Sports in Willow Grove, which allegedly sold to female straw buyers working for a man who authorities say then went on a rampage in Philadelphia in 2003, holding up fast-food restaurants, carjacking a Lexus, and robbing a bank of nearly $60,000. … The guns the women bought included an AK-47 SAR assault rifle, two 12-gauge shotguns, a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle, and a Marlon 30-30 rifle, according to the federal indictment of Andre Henry, three other men and three female straw purchasers. The case is pending."

US Launches Program To Curb Illegal Gun Sales. KTVT-TV, CBS 11, Dallas-Fort Worth (1/23) reports, "The U.S. Attorney's Office, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the firearms industry are joining forces to stop the illegal purchases of firearms." KTVT-TV continues, "Monday they unveiled a campaign called 'Don't Lie for the Other Guy.' The program hopes to raise public awareness and educate firearms dealers about 'straw' purchases. … A straw purchase is when someone buys a firearm for someone who cannot legally buy one for themselves." KTVT-TV adds, "A spokesperson for the ATF said, 'This program is an important tool for ATF as we pursue our mission of preventing terrorism, reducing violent crime and protecting the public.' … It is a federal felony to purchase a gun for someone who can't, punishable up to 10 years in jail and up to a $250,000 fine. … In 2005, ATF arrests led to over 1440 individuals being convicted of illegal firearms trafficking. That's up 14 percent from the previous year. … The group will display flyers in all gun stores and distribute materials about illegal firearms transactions. Several public service announcements about the program are also planned to hit the airwaves."

Los Angeles County Sheriff Traces Guns' Path To Compton. The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Garvey) reports, "To crack down on gangs and stem soaring violence in Compton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca asked his deputies and detectives not just to investigate crime but to also probe where gang members were getting their guns." The Times continues, "So sheriff's officials embarked on unprecedented census: tracking down the origins of nearly 900 weapons confiscated there last year. The results, released Monday, offer a glimpse into the complex and unexpected ways guns get into the hands of gang members." The Times adds, "Sixteen guns recovered in or near Compton were traced to a single store in Sparks, Nev., through databases of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. That same location, officials said, accounted for more than more than 350 weapons recovered nationwide by law enforcement officials last year, including 65 in the Los Angeles area. … The bureau is investigating the store and law enforcement officials declined to identify it, Baca said." The Times notes, "The bulk of the weapons confiscated in Compton were originally sold in California. But scores of others came from Arizona, Nevada and Colorado. Nine weapons were registered in Connecticut and a few others were registered in Ohio. … Several of the weapons were traced to murders."

Villaragosa Meets With Gonzales, Mueller About Gang Violence. CNN Paula Zahn Now (1/22, 8:18 p.m.) broadcasted, "Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaragosa: "It's bad enough that we believe we need to get a handle on it now. This approach has to be a comprehensive, multi-agency approach. About a couple weeks ago I met with Alberto Gonzales, the Attorney General, talked to him about the gang problem in Los Angeles. I spoke and met with the FBI director, Mr. Mueller, where we talked about providing more Federal FBI assets in our fight against gangs, and I've also met with and spoken with Governor Schwarzenegger."

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Immigrant Charged With Sexual Assault Seeks Deportation. Fox News (1/23) reports from Woodstock, IL, "Not many illegal immigrants ask to be deported. But Jose Vallejo of Mexico did, rather than face a potential prison term of 30 years for sex assault here in the United States. And he nearly got his wish." Fox continues, "Prosecutors in Illinois say Vallejo, who is now a 17-year-old Mexican national, pinned a 4-year-old girl down on a bed, then molested her on April 12, 2006. Even though Vallejo was only 16 at the time of the alleged crime, he is being charged as an adult because of the age of the victim. He faces three counts, including aggravated criminal sexual assault, one count of unlawful restraint." Fox adds, "Originally, bond was set by a state judge at $150,000 but Vallejo's family posted the cash. So, Vallejo was released by the state, but soon after, was taken into custody by federal agents for illegally entering the country three years ago. .. While in federal custody, Vallejo asked a federal immigration judge to deport him. The request was granted during a Jan. 4 deportation hearing in Chicago. … But before Vallejo was sent back over the border, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials alerted prosecutors in McHenry County, Ill., and that agency took custody of him."

Administration Blasted Over Immigrant Raids. The AP (1/23, Talhelm) reports, "The Bush administration is taking heat from lawmakers for the harm done to a company during last month's largest-ever immigration raid." The AP continues, "Immigration officials on Dec. 12 arrested 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in Texas, Colorado, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska and Utah. … After a closed-door meeting Monday with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, senators from the affected states said the raid exposed flaws in the federal government and in a program designed to help employers screen for illegal immigrants." The AP adds, "Among the concerns, senators reported, were that agencies can't share information about stolen identities and that programs designed to catch illegal immigrants allow many lawbreakers to slip through the cracks. … Chertoff acknowledged some of the problems, and said his department's programs are not "the perfect cure." Senators said they wanted Chertoff to enforce the laws, but they needed to assure companies that working with the government would not ultimately hurt them. … Swift participated in a program called Basic Pilot, which screens employees for illegal Social Security numbers. The system doesn't snag stolen Social Security numbers or numbers that are being used in multiple locations . … Since the arrests, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has announced the indictments of 148 illegal immigrants, who used other peoples' Social Security numbers and other personal information to get jobs at Swift. Local prosecutors are bringing state charges against the immigrants, including 80 in Cache County, Utah, and 18 in Weld County, Colo."

Judge Closes Suit Against US Over Immigrant Raids. The AP (1/23, Kohler) reports from Denver, "A judge closed a lawsuit against the federal government Monday after federal officials disclosed the whereabouts and status of 262 workers arrested during last month's largest-ever immigration raid at Swift & Co. meatpacking plant in Greeley, Colorado." The AP continues, "Attorneys for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, which filed the suit, said it should not have taken a lawsuit to get the information. The lawsuit alleged the U.S. government had violated the Greeley workers' constitutional right to due process." The AP adds, "The people arrested in Greeley were among 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in six U.S. states who were taken into custody on Dec. 12, most on illegal immigration charges. The union lawsuit did not cover workers in the other states. … U.S. District Judge John Kane terminated the lawsuit after union and federal lawyers agreed that all the arrested workers had been accounted for and given a chance to seek bond. … The government released the information to the union last week under orders from Kane." The AP notes, "A total of 74 of the Greeley workers remained in federal custody in Denver and El Paso, Texas, and 75 voluntarily returned to Mexico, according to federal officials. Another 18 face state identity-theft charges in Weld County, Colorado, where the Greeley Swift plant is located."

Rohrabacher Blasts Bush On Illegal Immigration. Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported, "The problem of illegal immigration is so large in Orange County, California that the local jails are full of illegal aliens arrested for local crimes. So, the jails therefore are a great place to find illegal aliens. The local sheriff knows this and would like to see the opportunity exploited. But there is a problem. … While responsibility for getting [criminal aliens] off the street typically calls to local police, when it comes to getting them out of the country, most cops can't get the training to do that. Letting local police enforce immigration law is controversial. Even in Orange County California where Sherriff Mike Carona wants his deputies cross-trained in immigration law with access to the federal immigration database. … 10 years ago, congress changed the law to allow local police agencies to enforce federal immigration statutes and it appropriated money to help. Yet when Carona asked Immigration and Customs Enforcement to train 500 of his deputies, the feds said it would cost too much. So he tried to hundred 200 – still too expensive. He got 12." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher: "We've authorized a great deal of help for these local people to help and enlist them in the battle to get control of illegal immigration and this administration turns around and gives them a pittance. … President Bush is not committed to stopping this flow of illegals into our country."

TAX:

Former North Carolina Tax Preparer Pleads Guilty To State Tax Charges. The Shelby (NC) Star (1/23, DeLea) reports from Raleigh, NC, "Former Shelby tax preparer Jerry O. Adams III, who still faces federal charges on defrauding the U.S. Department of Treasury of more than $3.8 million, pleaded guilty to failing to file and pay the state individual income tax last week in state court." The Star continues, "Judge K. Dean Black issued Adams a 45-day suspended sentence and placed him on supervised probation for two years. The sentence will be reduced to unsupervised probation after he pays $3,675 in court costs and restitution to the state. … 'It's the department's responsibility to make sure everyone pays their fair share of taxes,' said Kim Brooks, director of public affairs for the Department of Revenue. 'That's what we did here.'" The Star adds, "Adams said he's innocent but wanted a quick resolution. He said he's working on a settlement on the federal charges. … He said the state case started when the U.S. Internal Revenue Service audited him. He said the audit showed he owed more money than he originally stated. He said they then passed the information on to the N.C. Department of Revenue." The Star notes, "In the federal case, the U.S. Department of Justice claims that Adams, along with Demetria S. Adams, prepared tax returns that understated wages and overstated credits, which resulted in excessive refunds. … The suit against the couple states they defrauded the government of $3.8 million in more than 1,600 tax returns filed between 2004 and 2005 through businesses called First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby. … A July 2 trial date has been scheduled in U.S. District Court in front of Judge Dennis Howell, said Andrew Ames, a Justice Department spokesman."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's State Of The Union To Focus On Domestic Agenda. Even as the media and the political debate in the nation continue to focus on the Iraq war, media reports this morning indicate President Bush will focus his State of the Union speech on domestic politics. The AP (1/23, Ben Feller) reports Bush will speak on "important plans for health care, education and other kitchen table topics that have little to do with Iraq." The Chicago Tribune (1/23, Silva, 617K) says the President is "planning a State of the Union address Tuesday night heavy on health care, energy and education," attempting "to get beyond a raging debate over the war in Iraq as he faces a new Democratic-controlled Congress for the first time. … The president, who plans to confront war critics in a speech starting at 8 p.m. CST and running longer than 40 minutes, also plans to spell out what the White House calls 'bold proposals' on health care, energy independence, global warming and immigration." The Tribune adds, "As Bush presses an ambitious domestic agenda for the remaining two years of his presidency, he will find himself facing a hostile new audience with a Democratic-controlled Congress unwilling to accept his stance on the war and ready to relegate him to lame-duck status as 2008 presidential campaigns get underway."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Feldmann, 59K) also says that "as he seeks to show that he is not consumed by the Iraq war and its high-profile retooling, this year's annual message to Congress takes on added significance. In an effort to grab public attention, he is promising a different type of State of the Union – not the usual laundry list of items from the forthcoming budget, but a more focused look at a few key initiatives, most of them domestic. … This year, the most extensively previewed plan centers on a tax reform aimed at making health insurance more affordable to low-income people. The proposal would also reduce the tax break for more expensive health plans."

The Washington Times (1/23, Curl, 88K) says Bush "will reach out to Democrats in tonight's State of the Union address, pursuing common ground with his political adversaries on issues such as immigration, education and energy policy." Bush "plans a broad and thematic speech that will placate Republicans while seeking a central ground with Democrats, who along with a majority of Americans oppose Mr. Bush's strategy to deploy another 21,000 U.S. troops to Iraq."

A lot of the coverage in today's newspapers portrays the President as very weakened politically as he readies for his address tonight. The New York Times (1/23, Rutenberg, Pear, 1.16M) headlines its front-page report "Bush, At Low Point In Polls, Will Push Domestic Agenda," and says "the president's advisers said they hoped Mr. Bush's address would re-energize his domestic agenda by striking a bipartisan and ambitious tone as he faces further isolation on his Iraq policy. 'The power of the ideas requires people to take notice and take seriously important domestic initiatives,' said Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor. 'There will be key signals to the American people that despite disagreements over the war, other work can be done.'"

The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Baker, Cohen, 690K), under the headline "Bush To Face Skeptical Congress," refers to Bush's expected proposals as "recycled," adding the "uproar over his decision to send more US troops to Iraq has eclipsed potential consensus on domestic policy." Bush "faces deep skepticism inside the chamber, even within the House Republican leadership. … The doubt on Capitol Hill reflects the continuing erosion of Bush's public support across the country. His approval rating is at the lowest level of his presidency."

Television coverage last night largely ignored the run-up to the State of the Union speech, once again focusing on the Iraq debate in Congress and on the presidential candidacy of Sen. Hillary Clinton. But as was the case with much of the print media, what coverage there was dealt with the President's weakened political position as he prepares to deliver his speech. The CBS Evening News (1/22, lead story, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M), at the end of a story about recent poll data showing dwindling support for the President's Iraq plan (with 59% opposing the war and only 28% approving of Bush's performance), wondered whether Bush is "going to try to use the State of the Union speech to change the subject" or "stay focused on Iraq." CBS (Axelrod) added that "he's going to try to address domestic subjects. But when we asked in our poll what is the single most important issue facing Americans, the Iraq war, 33%, by far and away number one. Everything else single digits."

On NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Bush is "not doing well. Here is the all-important favorable rating for the President: Only 35% approve of his performance as President, 60% disapprove. … Are his numbers are short term setback? 25% [say yes], a long term setback, 65%. And that includes 40% of those Republicans say it is long term difficulties for…Bush." If Congress "opposes sending the troops, should the President listen to Congress? Two out of three Americans say listen to Congress. Do not send more troops. But then this. Should Congress cut off funding? 41% say yes, 52% say no do not cut off funding for the war and that includes one half of the independent voters, one third of Democrats. People still do not want to cut off funding for the war in Iraq."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A6, Harwood, 2.04M) says "Bush tonight gets another shot at persuading Americans to support his Iraq war strategy and domestic agenda. His problem: Much of the public has stopped listening to him." The "new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll on the eve of Mr. Bush's State of the Union address underscores the extent to which he has lost the nation's ear. Just 22% of Americans say they want the president to set policy for the country, 27% express confidence in his goals, and 28% approve his handling of the Iraq war."

Florida Today (1/23, Wheeler, 81K) reports, "Florida lawmakers differ on whether President Bush heads into his sixth State of the Union address in a position to dictate the terms of his final two years in office or so weakened by events that it doesn't much matter what he says." Rep. Allen Boyd (D) said Bush's "political capital is certainly not what it was two years ago. That creates some different dynamics for him." Florida Today adds, "The once-swaggering Bush has admitted he made mistakes in Iraq." But GOP Sen. Mel Martinez "believes Bush's troop surge strategy has put the president on the offensive." Martinez said, "This is the best way for him to continue to be relevant over the next two years."

Bush's Claims That US Was "Winning" In Iraq In 2006 SOTU Noted. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Ballinger, 2.04M), on its website, "took a look back at some of the vows -- both memorable and now-obscure -- that President Bush has made in his State of the Union addresses, to see whether they made it from the rostrum to reality. The Journal notes that last year Bush said of Iraq: "we are winning. … As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels." However, the Journal notes that "after perhaps the bloodiest year for both American troops and Iraqis since the 2003 invasion, the strategy in Iraq has shifted dramatically -- as has the language used to discuss the conflict." The Journal goes on to analyze portions of each of the president's past State of the Union speeches.

DC Mayor Declines Invitation To Sit With First Lady. The Washington Post (1/23, B1, Silverman, 690K) reports, "DC Mayor Adrian M. Fenty has declined a White House invitation to sit with first lady Laura Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, deciding to attend the event as a guest of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi." Fenty spokeswoman Carrie Brooks "confirmed yesterday that the city's new mayor will sit in the gallery along with others invited by Pelosi (D-Calif.), who recently became speaker after Democrats took control of the House of Representatives." The Post adds, "Although former mayor Anthony A. Williams, like Fenty, is a Democrat, Williams sat with the wife of Republican President Bush. … During his campaign for mayor, however, Fenty pledged that he would not sit as a guest of the White House because the president had not supported the city's quest for voting representation in Congress." The Washington Times (1/23, Emerling, 88K) also reports the story.

Pelosi Invites "Cluster Of Political Stars" To Speech. In its "Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (1/23, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports, "The party's not over! Newly minted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will not only sit behind President Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, but she's filling the normally staid speaker's box with a cluster of political stars." The Post adds, "Many of Pelosi's guests, who will sit in 21 balcony seats, will be past and present celebs of the Democratic Party: former speakers Jim Wright and Tom Foley, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Washington's Adrian Fenty. Pelosi also invited two of the more influential 9/11 widows, Carrie Lemack and Mary Fetchet, and the wives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman and vice chairman, Lynne Pace and Cindy Giambastiani."

Webb Reportedly Drafting His Own SOTU Response. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Chaddock, 59K) reports Sen. James Webb "is giving the Democratic response to this year's State of the Union – an unusually high profile for a freshman. But no Democrat in the Congress is more primed to talk on the No. 1 issue in congressional politics: the endgame in Iraq. 'We have never clearly defined what a win is – never, not since 2002,' says Webb, on a brisk walk through the Capitol basement after President Bush announced an increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq. One of them will be Webb's son, Jimmy, whose Marine unit has just been extended for an additional 60 days in Iraq. A decorated combat marine, Webb knows – and can articulate – the human face of war with an authority that is rare on Capitol Hill." The Monitor notes, "Aides say he is drafting his own response to the State of the Union, working mainly in the evenings, although Democratic leaders will have a say in the final language."

Bush To Unveil Healthcare Initiative. Among the proposals President Bush is expected to be announced tonight in his State of the Union speech, his federal healthcare reform plan is getting the most media attention.

The AP (1/23, Ben Feller) reports Bush "will propose a tax deduction of $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families regardless of whether they buy their own health insurance or receive medical coverage at work. Health care insurance would be considered taxable income, and people with more generous policies could face tax increases unless they change plans. The administration says its plan will help people who buy insurance individually rather than through their employers." USA Today (1/23, Wolf, Jackson, 2.27M) says "Bush's plan would financially reward states that make basic private policies more widely available. … The president's plan would not involve any new federal money. It would redirect some of the $30 billion the government spends annually to care for people without health insurance who show up at hospitals and emergency rooms."

The Miami Herald (1/23, Fletcher, 286K) reports, "The proposal…marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans. Administration officials familiar with the plan say it reflects the new political order in Washington, where Democrats now control both chambers of Congress. They refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government."

The New York Times (1/23, Rutenberg, Pear, 1.16M) reports the "initial response to Mr. Bush's health care plans has not been positive, on Capitol Hill or among constituencies including employers and labor unions." The Times notes, "Labor leaders were outspoken in opposing the plan. … Several public health officials reacted with alarm to Mr. Bush's plan to encourage states to take Medicaid money now earmarked for public hospitals and use it for state programs to cover the uninsured."

The AP (1/23, Freking) also reports "Bush's proposed tax deduction for health insurance appears to be shaping up as a tough sell in the Democratic Congress." Rep. Pete Stark (D) said, "Under the guise of tax breaks, the president is pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based health care system through which 160 million people receive coverage." The AP continues, "Stark, who oversees a key House Ways and Means subcommittee, said he would not consider holding hearings on the proposal." The AP adds, "Insurers said the tax proposal would mostly help the nearly 17 million people who buy coverage through the individual or small group market. Their ranks include real estate agents, consultants and employees of small businesses that don't offer health coverage. Also benefiting would be those in newer industries where the workers tend to be younger and the health coverage is more basic, such as technology." The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Baker, Cohen, 690K) also reports the President "faces deep skepticism" in Congress, "even within the House Republican leadership,"

The Washington Times (1/23, Curl, 88K) quotes White House press secretary Tony Snow saying, "Americans want a [health care] system that's going to be more patient-friendly and that's going to meet their needs. … The president will talk about that. Education, always important ... Immigration has been an issue of considerable concern within this country."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Reynolds, 850K) reports that Bush "is expected to talk in more depth about an idea he floated over the weekend: that the tax code should put a limit on how much of workers' health insurance premiums are tax deductible. … The administration argues that while some Americans would have to pay taxes on some of their employer-provided insurance, that would make it easier for uninsured workers and the self-employed to buy coverage on the open market. The idea is opposed by the administration's major business allies, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce." The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) also says "the Bush approach adds to a growing list of proposals for expanding medical insurance coverage and dealing with other aspects of healthcare. Like the others, it is likely to fuel the coming debate on the issue in Congress and on the campaign trail."

Leavitt Proposes Giving Governors Greater Flexibility With Federal Healthcare Money. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "With Bush expected to address concern about rising premiums and shrinking coverage tonight in his State of the Union speech, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt offered governors greater leeway in how they use federal healthcare money for the poor if they would take the lead on offering help to the estimated 47 million now uninsured. … Leavitt, in a session with reporters, outlined what he called an 'affordable choices initiative,' which he said was the second major piece of the administration's plan, along with a proposal to tax high-value medical insurance provided by employers to some workers. Under the initiative, the federal government could reallocate as much as $40 billion a year that now goes to hospitals and other providers that treat large numbers of uninsured and low-income patients, he said."

WPost Approves Of Bush Initiative's Goals. The Washington Post (1/23, A16, 690K) editorializes, "At present, people who get health insurance from employers pay no tax on the value of the benefit. Someone with a marginal tax rate of 35 percent and a generous insurance policy worth $20,000 a year gets a $7,000 tax break. But people who buy insurance on the individual market must usually do so with post-tax dollars, so their tax break is normally zero. The administration proposes to eliminate that unfairness by giving salaried workers and freelancers the same tax deduction." The Post adds, "Rather than embracing tax deductions, which are most valuable to people in high tax brackets, Mr. Bush could have made his proposal even more progressive by recommending a refundable tax credit that would be worth the same to everyone." However, the Post says, "the president is right to go after the existing system of tax subsidies for health care. Like the deductions for mortgage interest, these subsidies are regressive and have perverse consequences. Mr. Bush has kicked off a needed discussion."

Universal Health Care Foundation Calls Plan Unaffordable. The New Haven Register (1/23, O'Leary, 82K) reports, "President Bush's plan to make health insurance affordable for more people is getting a thumbs down from one advocacy group, which has more faith in the efforts of individual states to tackle the problem. … Janet Davenport, spokeswoman for the Universal Health Care Foundation, said the fact that the president is addressing the issue recognizes there is a problem." Davenport "said individuals and families who can't afford insurance are in low-tax brackets and making premiums tax-deductible 'would be virtually meaningless.' She said while it is hopeful the issue is again on the national agenda, Connecticut has an opportunity to move forward before the federal government."

Few Enroll In Healthcare Savings Accounts. The Arizona Republic (1/23, Snyder) reports that while Bush "spotlighted health savings accounts" in his State of the Union address last year, and Congress has since "tweaked" the accounts, "enrollment in them hasn't really budged and few people know the facts about them." The Republic adds, "In comparing 2005 enrollment numbers with 2006 figures, Kaiser Family Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based health care policy group, found no statistical difference between the two."

Bush Addresses Pro-Life March, Expresses Opposition To Stem Cell Bill. The AP (1/23) reports, "President Bush marked the 34th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision Monday, telling thousands of abortion foes he shares their goal of seeing 'the day when every child is welcomed in life and protected into law.'" Bush also "signaled his unchanged opposition to a key goal of the Democrats who now control Congress: broadening embryonic stem-cell research. 'Our challenge is to make sure that science serves the cause of humanity instead of the other way around,' the president said in a telephone call piped over loudspeakers to a Washington rally of opponents of abortion rights. 'I have made clear to the Congress, we must pursue medical advances in the name of life, not at the expense of it.'" Bush "calls the rally each year, usually from distant locations. This year, he extended his weekend stay at the Camp David presidential retreat in the Maryland mountains to phone the participants from there."

The New York Times (1/23, Abruzzese, 1.16M) reports that in his remarks, Bush also "mentioned his signing the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which is before the Supreme Court in a case to be decided this term."

The Washington Post (1/23, A10, Chandler, Boorstein, 690K) estimated that "tens of thousands of abortion opponents marched through melting snow on the Mall yesterday and vowed to work harder -- since Democrats have taken control of the Capitol -- to overturn the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion in 1973." The Washington Times (1/23, Lively, Wagner, 88K) also reports the story.

Brownback, Hunter Pledge To Overturn Roe. The AP (1/23, Hananel) reports, "Two of the Republicans' most conservative presidential hopefuls promised anti-abortion activists on Monday that if elected, they would work to overturn the Supreme Court decision legalizing the procedure." Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R) and CA52 Rep. Duncan Hunter (R) "addressed the annual March for Life marking the anniversary of the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling. 'We recognize a tragedy of life in Roe v. Wade, but that tragedy will not always stand,' Brownback told thousands of cheering abortion foes at an afternoon rally." Hunter, meanwhile, told the crowd, "If we have a judicial applicant, a judicial nominee who can look at a sonogram of an unborn child and not see the value of human life…if I should become president of the United States, he will not receive a judicial appointment,' Hunter said."

McClatchy (1/23, Stearns) reports, "Dozens of blue 'Brownback for President' posters dotted the National Mall, where marchers gathered before proceeding to the Supreme Court. Well-wishers approached to urge him on. … 'God bless you, Sam! You are the next president, in the name of Jesus!' shouted a voice near the onstage microphone after Brownback's speech. A surprising response for an underfunded politician mired at 1 or 2 percent in national polls? Not in this crowd. To many marchers, Brownback isn't an asterisk, he's a hero. And that's what gives Brownback hope that his grassroots-oriented campaign could take the establishment by surprise." McClatchy adds, "And what of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, two Republican front-runners? Neither was at the march."

Portman Outlines Bush Plan For Balancing Budget. In an op-ed in USA Today (1/23, 10A, 2.27M) OMB Director Rob Portman writes, "Three years ago, President Bush established the goal of cutting the federal budget deficit by half in five years, without raising taxes. At the time, many — including USA TODAY— expressed skepticism. But it was achieved last year, three years ahead of schedule. Now is the time to build on that success and work with Congress to balance the budget in the next five years. … The president's budget will demonstrate how balance can be achieved by using cautious economic and revenue projections in line with forecasts by outside experts. On spending, the president will propose realistic restraint, while increasing funding for the global war on terror, including all costs of Iraq and Afghanistan over the next two years."

USA Today Dismisses Bush Plan. USA Today (1/23, 10A, 2.27M), in an editorial, writes, "President Bush is expected to call for a balanced budget by 2012. In other words, after turning the Clinton-era surpluses into six straight years of deficits and putting the nation almost $3 trillion deeper into debt, he now wants to see the budget balanced after he leaves office, just as the demographic tidal wave of baby boomer retirements begins to inundate the federal ledgers in red ink. Call us party poopers, but that hardly seems reason to break out the champagne."

University Of Dallas Withdraws Bush Library Bid. The AP (1/23, Brown) reports the University of Dallas "withdrew its bid for George W. Bush's presidential library Monday, citing the library site selection committee's exclusive talks with nearby Southern Methodist University. Last month SMU emerged as the apparent winner for the library with the announcement of the negotiations, putting it ahead of the other two finalists, the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco."

Methodist Activist Opposes SMU's Bush Library Proposal. Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/22) aired a segment on "where to put President Bush's library." Host Bill O'Reilly noted the "first choice is Southern Methodist University in Dallas but that is raising some controversy even though it would mean a lot of money for the school some Methodists are objecting on ideological grounds." Rev. Fred Kandeler, of the Methodist Committee for Social Action, appeared on the show and maintained, "there's been a disconnect between the Bush presidency and his positions on many issues, and the social principles or teachings of the church. … We're talking about issues on war and torture. Issues of poverty and economic justice. We're talking about issues of the death penalty and environmental protection."

Paulson, Portman Meet With New Democrat Coalition Members. The Hill (1/23, Snyder) reports the White House "reached out to Democrats last week in advance of President Bush's planned attendance at a party retreat later this month." Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman met with the New Democrat Coalition. NDC chairwoman Ellen Tauscher "said the meeting grew out of a phone conversation Paulson initiated with her over the holiday break. She described the exchange on the Hill as a 'meet-and-greet' event that lasted an hour. The two administration officials talked about trade and budget issues without getting into specifics, she said."

Gates Praised Carter In His 1996 Memoirs. The Washington Post (1/23, A15, Ricks, 690K) reports that in his memoirs Defense Secretary Gates "leaps repeatedly to the defense of Jimmy Carter, the sole Democrat for whom he worked, who was often seen as weak on the Soviet Union and taken by surprise when it invaded Afghanistan in December 1979. Gates's 1996 book, 'From the Shadows,' is now being combed for insights into the new defense secretary's thinking, how he might run the Pentagon and what he's had to say about his past bosses. When it comes to Carter, it isn't that Gates, a career Sovietologist who rose to become CIA director, is a closet dove. Rather, he thinks Carter was far tougher on Moscow than is generally recognized. … By contrast, Gates describes the first president for whom he worked, Richard Nixon, as 'by far the most liberal' of the group. (Gates also shows a bit of dovish ankle, revealing that before leaving the CIA to work in the Nixon White House, he marched in a May 1970 antiwar demonstration.)"

Byrd Among Democrats Opposed To "Modest" Line-Item Veto Bill. In an AP analysis piece (1/23) Andrew Taylor writes that the Senate "is moving toward its first vote in more than a decade on the line-item veto, and it's remarkable how much has changed — particularly the positions of many of the major players. … Put forward by Sen. Judd Gregg it's far weaker than the line-item veto power a GOP-dominated Congress gave President Clinton in 1996. Under that bill, before it was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, Clinton's line-item vetoes automatically went into effect unless overturned by a two-thirds vote of both House and Senate. Still, debate on Gregg's plan already has whipped up passions. Most adamant in opposition is Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., who assaulted the idea last week and again Monday as an attack on Congress' control over the federal purse strings."

Senate Minimum Wage Bill Exempts American Samoa's Tuna Industry. The Washington Times (1/23, Hurt, 88K) reports the Senate "took up a bill yesterday that would raise the minimum wage across the United States and its territories but exempt American Samoa, where tuna canneries pay workers $3.26 an hour." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "told reporters less than two weeks ago that she would close the loophole after coming under criticism from Republicans for what they termed a 'fishy favor' to StarKist Tuna. StarKist has lobbied for years against raising the minimum wage in American Samoa, and its parent, Del Monte Corp., is based in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district. … The House, however, passed the minimum-wage bill with the American Samoa exemption. And yesterday, Senate Democrats were moving ahead with the original legislation, which for the first time would enforce the minimum wage on the Northern Mariana Islands, another territory in the Pacific with a similarly low minimum wage."

Emanuel Works To Establish Cordial Relations With GOP Members. The Chicago Tribune (1/23, Zuckman, 617K) reports, "After mercilessly attacking the GOP for close to two years for what he called incompetence and blind allegiance to the failed policies of a failed president," Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, "acknowledged that he has some work to do in re-establishing a sense of trust on the other side of the aisle." The Tribune reports that Emanuel recently met with several GOP members of congress, including "notable moderates" Reps. Mike Castle, Jo Ann Emerson and Fred Upton, "along with a couple of conservatives—all chosen by Rep. Ray LaHood, co-host of the get-together. … LaHood organized the dinner with the understanding that Republicans could ask Emanuel anything they want." The Tribune notes that "when moderate Republicans needed a regular meeting space, Emanuel provided it for them after their own leaders declined. And he spearheaded an invitation to President Bush to address Democrats at their upcoming retreat in Williamsburg, Va., which the president accepted."

Liberal Groups Intend To Keep Pressure On Democrats. The AP (1/23, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Democratic lawmakers who stray too far from the party line could find themselves facing primary opponents financed by unions, trial lawyers and political activists eager to put the new congressional majority to the test." In addition to anti-war groups, recently "an influential group of organizers from labor and the liberal movement" created "a lobbying wing called They Work For Us and a campaign arm called Working for Us PAC — that will target lawmakers who don't support their agenda of raising wages, increasing jobs, providing more affordable health care and preventing job losses to foreign countries."

GOP Members Back Strict Congressional Ethics Reform. The Washington Times (1/23, Miller, 88K), in an article titled, "GOP Pushes For Stricter Ethics Reform," reports, "The debates on a House bill that would nix federal pensions for convicted lawmakers and a Senate measure to cut pork spending underscored how scandal-scarred Republicans are backing broader ethics reforms than the new Democratic majority is. 'We did have colleagues who violated the trust of the Congress and the public. We have to fix it,' said Rep. Lee Terry, a Nebraska Republican whose pension-reform bill was sidelined by Democratic leaders in favor of a weaker bill." The Time notes that the House "started considering a bill by Rep. Nancy Boyda, Kansas Democrat, that denies federal pensions to members of Congress convicted of bribery, perjury and conspiracy offenses related to the lawmaker's office. … Separate bills by Mr. Terry and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, would have withheld the pension from lawmakers convicted of a longer list of felonies, including some unrelated to abuse of office -- ranging from white-collar embezzlement crimes to political crimes such as securing campaign contributions by intimidation."

Senate Private Jet Restriction Would Apply To Presidential Candidates. USA Today (1/23, Schouten, 2.27M) reports the Senate's plan "to require members traveling aboard plush private jets to pay full charter fares also would force changes in travel by all presidential candidates. Under the Senate-passed ethics bill, senators extended their new rules for reimbursement of such travel to any candidate seeking federal office. … House ethics rules, approved earlier this month, ban all corporate jet travel. The Senate measure exempts senators who have their own planes or whose spouses own them. The two measures must be reconciled by Congress. Travel aboard private planes has long been a favored perk for members of Congress and presidential candidates. The practice came under scrutiny during the investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who paid for trips by members on private jets."

Van Hollen Praised For "Bundling" Disclosure Amendment. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/23, A16, 690K) says, "Last year, as the House Judiciary Committee was debating lobbying reform," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Chris Van Hollen "offered an amendment that would have required lobbyists to report not just the campaign contributions they give directly to lawmakers but also the campaign checks they 'bundle,' or solicit for or deliver to lawmakers. Astonishingly, this proposal passed the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 28 to 4. Less astonishingly, the provision had disappeared from the final version of the bill when it was brought up for debate on the House floor." Now, "with Democrats in charge of the House and Mr. Van Hollen ensconced at the campaign committee, the obvious temptation would be to let the matter drop." To his "credit, Mr. Van Hollen, along with Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), plans to introduce a measure today that would require such disclosure." Van Hollen "is right to insist that the bundlers be brought to light."

Survey Shows Managers Reluctant To Participate In Telecommuting Programs. The Washington Post's (1/23, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Concerns over employee productivity and a lack of control over employee activities make it difficult for federal managers to support telecommuting, according to a survey released yesterday. But federal managers also think telecommuting improves 'work-life balance' for employees, and makes their agencies more competitive in hiring and keeping employees, the survey found." The Post adds that the survey was sponsored by "Telework Exchange, which brings federal officials and technology professionals together to promote telecommuting, and the Federal Managers Association, which represents the interests of nearly 200,000 supervisors and managers across government" and notes that "a relatively small number" of managers "214, responded." The Post adds, "The most recent data show that only 19 percent of eligible federal workers can be considered telecommuters, and managerial resistance is seen as the reason for what some officials consider to be a relatively low participation rate, given the size of the government."

Kristof Compares Bush To Captain Ahab. Nicholas Kristof writes in his column for the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) that President Bush "has made the classics powerfully resonant today" and compares the war in Iraq with Thucydides's account of Athenian war in Sicily. After, "the war went badly" the Athenians "went with the 'surge'" but "the result was a catastrophic defeat." Kristof also compares President Bush to Captain Ahab who "abandons all rules and limits in his quest." He concludes, "Melville captures the trajectory of the Bush years." Because "Mr. Bush became obsessed by his responsibility to prevent another terror attack. This was an eminently worthy goal, but Mr. Bush abandoned traditional rules and boundaries" so "the compulsive search for security ended up creating insecurity."

OTHER NEWS:

Productivity Growth Slowest In Over A Decade. The Financial Times (1/23, Giles) reports, "The US economy last year recorded its lowest rate of labour productivity growth in more than a decade, with growth in output per hour worked falling behind the EU and Japan. The fall casts further doubt on the ability of the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates as the US economy slows." The Times adds, "Research to be published on Tuesday by the Conference Board, the international business organisation, shows that US labour productivity in the whole economy grew by 1.4 per cent in 2006 as slower economic growth was combined with a rapid rise in employment."

Stocks Down. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 9, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, the Dow was down more than 88 points [to close at 12,477.16]. NASDAQ was also down during today's trading more than 20 points [to close at 2,431.07]. USA Today/Bloomberg (1/23, 6B) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 fell 7.55 points, or 0.5%, to 1422.95."

Pump Prices Fall Another 6 Cents. ABC World News (1/22, story 7, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Some good news for drivers tonight. The government says the price of gas fell another 6 cents in the past week to a national average of $2.17 a gallon and analysts say the recent drop in crude oil prices could push gas below $2 in the next month."

Growth Said Not To Be Necessary Cause Of Inflation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/23), Robert McTeer of the National Center for Policy Analysis says, "While a weaker economy might well reduce inflation, that isn't a necessary condition. Faster growth can also reduce inflation." Supply-side economics "is out of favor at universities that don't have good football teams. But that's largely because its bar for success has been raised too high. Tax-rate cuts may not fully pay for themselves at current rate levels, but they certainly have gone a long way in that direction, as the recent sharp decline in the budget deficit despite rapid spending growth clearly indicates. Tax-rate cuts that substantially pay for themselves in higher tax revenue are clearly a good thing."

Class Of 2007 Encounters Thriving Job Market. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, B1, White, 2.04M) reports, "This year is shaping up as the strongest for college recruiting since the downturn earlier this decade, colleges report. Traditionally heavy recruiters, including management consulting firms, investment banks and accounting firms, are intensifying college recruiting efforts. They're also facing more competition from other employers in such fields as technology, consumer products, government and even nonprofits." Employers "plan to hire 17% more graduates from the class of 2007 than they got from the class of 2006, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers. That would make this year the strongest job market since 2000-2001, the association says. More than half of the surveyed employers said they planned to increase hiring; only 5% planned a decrease. Salaries were forecast to rise 4.6%, according to another survey by the same group. … Behind the increased recruiting are a relatively strong economy, growing business demands and heady corporate profits. Employers created about 1.8 million additional jobs in 2006. Average weekly earnings rose 4.5%, compared with a 3.2% increase in 2005."

Job Turnover Seen As Positive Force. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/23, A17), Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Roger Kimmitt says, "More than 55 million Americans, or four out of every 10 workers, left their jobs in 2005. And this is good news, because there were over 57 million new hires that same year. These statistics illustrate a recent and growing trend of dynamism in our job market, especially among younger workers." The data "show that each month millions of Americans leave their jobs -- most of them voluntarily -- and millions more are hired. This is what we want: an economy in which people looking to move up have as many opportunities as possible from which to choose. Promoting this dynamism, and the opportunities it creates, should be a focus of our economic policy."

NFIB Remaking Itself Into Nonpartisan Lobby. The Washington Post's "In the Loop: On K Street" column (1/23, A15, Birnbaum) reports the National Federation of Independent Business, "a bastion of Republicanism," is changing its image. New President Todd A. Stottlemyer "wants to rebrand the nation's premier small-business lobby as 'nonpartisan,' and to prove his resolve he is talking extensively to Democrats and preparing to donate more to their coffers. … With many lobbying shops scooping up Democrats after last November's elections, Stottlemyer's effort may not seem that newsworthy. But for NFIB, it is huge. Stottlemyer's predecessor, Jack Faris, was viewed as a zealous partisan. A former executive director of the Republican National Finance Committee, Faris stopped talking even to pro-business Democrats in the House after he got involved in a shouting match over dinner with a group of Blue Dogs half a dozen years ago."

Hillary Kicks Off Media Blitz With Network Interviews, Blog Chat. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 2, 2:05, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Trying to temper the Obama buzz created by his announcement last week, Senator Hillary Clinton has burst onto the campaign field. Her online announcement followed a highly choreographed and newly minted anti-war stance and now a second round of TV interviews, Webchats and appearances meant to highlight her agenda including healthcare." Sen. Hilary Clinton: "It is simply wrong for any child in America to go without health insurance." Gregory: "The early emphasis is on the softer side of Mrs. Clinton. What advisors say is a concerted attempt to firm up her support among women."

The Washington Post (1/23, A2, Kornblut, 690K) reports that with a "call to 'let the conversation begin,' Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) fielded a handful of pre-selected questions from voters on her presidential campaign's Web site last night, speaking into a video camera as she held forth on movies ('Out of Africa' makes her top three), her football-fanatic brothers and her 'nice middle-class upbringing in a suburb of Chicago.'" The "effort to 'humanize' Clinton, as her advisers have put it, was in full swing just two days into her presidential campaign." The online chat "came amid what, for Clinton, is a media blitz at the outset of her campaign for president. She appeared on all three major television networks last night, is scheduled to appear on the morning shows today, and will hold two more online discussions on her Web site tonight and tomorrow."

The New York Times (1/23, Healy, 1.16M) reports Clinton "strived for an Oprah moment yesterday night, the third of her presidential campaign, by sitting in a fake living-room set and fielding questions on a live video Webcast about her vote for the Iraq war (if she had known then), universal health care (still wants it) and her favorite movies ('The Wizard of Oz,' 'Casablanca' and 'Out of Africa')." Clinton aides "say the Webcast demonstrates her determination to speak directly to voters, in as many ways as new technology allows, instead of dealing only with a news media that has sometimes been intensely skeptical of her actions and motives." The questions "e-mailed from Linda in Pensacola, Fla., and other visitors to the Web site were vetted by Mrs. Clinton's staff and offered or elicited few surprises." Her "answers suggested various personas that she wants to convey to voters: a hometown girl, a mother, a moviegoer, a churchgoer, a standard-bearer for women and a critic of the war."

Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported that Sen. Hillary Clinton's "weekend announcement raised Democratic eyebrows as an obvious attempt to make her appear warm and likable. Polls suggest Clinton leaves voters cold. She met with families of the victims of 9/11 in New York today and will make her first campaign trip to Iowa this weekend." Billionaire activist donor George Soros "is helping [Sen. Barack] Obama – another sign the antiwar left remains unmotivated, not to say antagonistic, towards Clinton. Then there is her history. She had hoped to stay out of the harsh spotlight of scrutiny until later this spring, but now knows it will not be long before her appearances in the federal court in the 1990's and such things as Whitewater, her husband's impeachment, and her various combative and controversial statements over the years will be revisited in excruciating detail."

Clinton Does Round Of Interviews On Network News. ABC World News (1/22, story 6, 5:25, Gibson, 8.78M) interviewed Sen. Hillary Clinton, who said, "I think my experience and my understanding of the problems facing our country equip me to be the best person to take over in January 2009 when we will be facing a lot of problems at home and abroad and frankly, inheriting many of the problems that have been made worse by this Administration." Clinton said she wants to "be an instrument of bold but practical solutions, weather it is healthcare, making it universal, energy independence, finally dealing with climate change, restoring our leadership and respect for America around the world." Asked if she would "take a pledge not to sign a bill that would raise taxes," Clinton said, "Oh, I'm not going to take any pledges about any issue, because I want to be in a position to bring people together to figure out the best ideas to solve our problems and not get locked into this, you know, partisan ideological debate that's been so sterile so many years." Clinton added the Iraq war and domestic needs required making "some tough decisions."

The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 4, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Sen. Clinton. Asked why she would not support a vote "to cut off funding" for the Iraq war "so the President can't carry out this policy," Clinton said, "I am opposed to the escalation that the President has proposed. Unfortunately, the fact is he is carrying out the policy. He already had in motion the movement of troops into Iraq. What we're trying to do is send a bipartisan message, if possible, that we disapprove of this escalation." Asked to respond to those who "have questions about your electability," Clinton said, "I would say give me a chance. As a friend of mine said the other day, I'm the most famous woman that nobody really knows."

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 5, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed Clinton. Williams asked how she would "have to adjust to counter the presence of this Obama campaign, which is a surprise?" Sen. Hilary Clinton: "Well, you know, Brian, this is exactly how I intended to do this. Once I made up my mind that I was going to contest for the presidential nomination of my party, I wanted to do it on the Web, I wanted to do it before the President's State of the Union, because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office."

Clinton Disapproval At 36% In CBS Poll. On the CBS Evening News (1/22, story 5, 1:00, Couric, 7.66M), Gloria Borger said, "Hillary Clinton knows well that she is well-known. That she comes with an awful lot of political baggage. But in our poll tonight, Katie, we see that as many people approve of her as disapprove of her. It's actually a tie, 36% to 36%. But she does have one thing really working in her favor, it's her great strength. After six years as a Senator people believe in our poll by overwhelming margin that she has the credentials and leadership skills to be president."

Hillary Has Early National Lead In WPost Poll. The Financial Times (1/23, Callan) reports Hillary Clinton "has launched her race for the White House with a commanding lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential candidacy, according to an opinion poll published on Sunday." The Washington Post poll shows Clinton "was backed by 41 per cent of Democrats questioned, more than double the 17 per cent rating of Mr Obama."

Russert Says Hillary Faces "Toughly Fought Primary." On NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Hillary Clinton will "be the frontrunner because of the money, the machine, her visibility, her high poll numbers and a national perspective. But we can't forget that this race will be decided in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina. States that could be anti-war, pro-labor, high African American turnout like in South Carolina. In those four states, the race with Barack Obama and John Edwards and Hillary Clinton is very competitive. She's not yet been anointed, nor will she be. This will be a toughly-fought primary battle."

Bill Clinton Signals Wife Will Make Healthcare A Centerpiece Of Campaign. The Hill (1/23, Cusack, Young) reports former President Clinton "has signaled privately that his wife…will include aggressive healthcare proposals in her campaign for the White House, despite the debacle of what critics labeled 'Hillary Care' 14 years ago." In remarks "to Democratic operatives last month, the ex-president caused a buzz by strongly defending the substance of his wife's 1990s plan, claiming it was a moderate, private-sector approach grossly mischaracterized by its critics." Clinton's "statements, delivered during a Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) conference at the Charles Hotel in Cambridge, Mass., have been interpreted as signaling that candidate Clinton could revive aspects of her 1993-94 approach that was vilified by Republicans and health-industry groups." The Hill adds the "indications are that Sen. Clinton's strategy will be to turn healthcare, a political weakness, into a strength."

Hillary's Position On Iraq Critiqued. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/23, A17), Liz Cheney, former principal deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, says, "Sen. Hillary Clinton declared this weekend, 'I'm in to win.' Anyone who has watched her remarkable trajectory can have no doubt that she'll do whatever it takes to win the presidency. I wish she felt the same way about the war." Clinton, with "her proposal for arbitrary caps on troop levels and hemming and hawing about her vote for the war resolution, has company on both sides of the aisle. Sen. Joseph Lieberman is the only national Democrat showing any courage on this issue. We Republicans -- with help from senators such as Chuck Hagel -- seem ready to race the Democrats to the bottom." Cheney outlines the case for continuing the war in Iraq, adding, "It's time for everyone -- Republicans and Democrats -- to stop trying to find ways for America to quit. Victory is the only option. We must have the fortitude and the courage to do what it takes. In the words of Winston Churchill, we must deserve victory. We must be in it to win."

Morris Plans Hillary Clinton Expose Film. Political analyst Dick Morris, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/22), said he is "working with a group called Citizens United on a film about Hillary Clinton. It's going to be about 90 minutes long. It's going to play in real movie theaters in all of the early primary states. I'm going to go to those early primary states and give speeches introducing the film. … We are going to have about 30 different shots of her, each with a different hair color, each with a different accent, each with a different affect, each with a different approach and we are going to really showcase the inaccuracies of everything that this woman has said." Morris went on to say that Clinton's "announcement…this weekend has shown how flat-footed she is coming out of the gate which is a surprise to me. I thought she'd be in great shape. … She announces her exploratory committee on a Saturday. Saturday is the worst news day."

Clinton Announcement May Be Death Knell For Public Finance. The New York Times (1/23, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports the "public financing system for presidential campaigns, a post-Watergate initiative hailed for decades as the best way to rid politics of the corrupting influence of money, may have quietly died over the weekend." Sen. Clinton "became the first candidate since the program began in 1976 to forgo public financing for both the primary and the general election because of the spending limits that come with the federal money. By declaring her confidence that she could raise far more than the roughly $150 million the system would provide for the 2008 presidential primaries and general election, Mrs. Clinton makes it difficult for other serious candidates to participate in the system without putting themselves at a significant disadvantage." Federal Election Commission officials and campaign advisers "say they expect the two candidates who reach Election Day 2008 will raise more than $500 million apiece. Including money raised by other primary candidates, the total spent on the presidential election could easily exceed $1 billion."

In a similar story, the Washington Post (1/23, A1, Balz, Mosk, 690K) reports the "public financing system designed to clean up presidential campaigns in the wake of the Watergate scandal may have died on Saturday when" Clinton "announced her bid for the White House." What was "little noticed amid the announcement rollout was a page on her Web site in which she asked potential contributors to give her campaign checks of up to $4,200. That figure signaled not only that she plans to forgo public funds for primary season but also that, if she becomes the nominee, she will not take public money for the general election." Clinton's decision "will put pressure on other candidates in both parties to follow suit, and if they do, the 2008 campaign will complete what has been the rapid disintegration of a system designed to rein in unlimited spending in presidential campaigns."

The AP (1/23, Humbert) reports Clinton's "decision had been widely expected given her and her husband's proven ability to raise vast sums of money quickly. Her advisers have not disputed estimates that she will raise $100 million or more before the year is out." Clinton "already has more than $14 million in the bank, money left from her successful re-election campaign last year. The funds can be spent on her presidential bid."

Viable Candidates Expected To Need $100 Million. The Chicago Tribune (1/23, Dorning, 617K) reports the Iowa caucuses "that kick off the presidential campaign are nearly a year away. For the most viable contenders, make that one year and $100 million away." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has that capacity, and other contenders believe that they do as well." To "wage a serious presidential campaign in 2008, the ante is $50 million raised by Dec. 31 of this year, said one adviser to Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). And that is just to get a place at the table." The Tribune adds, "Those are daunting figures. To make the $100 million mark in a year, a candidate must bring in an average of nearly $2 million a week. That's $274,000 a day, including Sundays and holidays, all of it raised in increments legally limited to no more than $2,100 per person."

ABC World News (1/22, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Never have so many run so early, so hard. Why are we seeing so many candidates declare so early? As you might expect, one of the answers is money." ABC (Tapper) added, "The primary and caucus calendar will likely start earlier and be more front-loaded in 2008. What was typically a four- or five-month process will be condensed to two or three weeks. So candidates need to lay the groundwork in all those states now. And that costs money." Joseph Lockhart, Democratic strategist: "It used to be a candidate with a couple of million dollars in the bank could get them through Iowa, New Hampshire and hope from there. Now you have to be ready to run a full national campaign from day one, and that takes a lot of money."

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 2, 2:05, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Experts say the rush is for campaign cash, the first test of a candidate's viability." John Harwood, CNBC chief Washington correspondent: "We may see in the first quarter of 2007 at least four candidates, two in each party, raise the kind of sums that George W. Bush ran and broke records with in the year 2000."

WSJournal Says Fundraising Rules Hurt Clinton's Competitors. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Congratulations to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for acknowledging right from the start that she won't accept public money for her White House bid. Now if she'd only admit how much the current fund-raising rules hurt her competitors. Top-tier or wealthy candidates have been forgoing public financing for the Presidential primaries for some time because it limits their spending ability." Contribution limits and the matching funds system were intended to "limit the influence of special interests and make Presidential contests more competitive. The reality is close to the opposite. The system now benefits mainly well-known and well-heeled candidates and thus limits political competition. Serious Presidential contenders like Senator John McCain and Mrs. Clinton begin the race with greater name recognition, long donor lists and the ability to garner far more media attention."

Sniping Between Obama, Clinton Camps Begins. The Financial Times (1/23, Luce) reports the Democratic primary campaign "got into full swing on Monday with campaign staff for Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton already indulging in sniping contests over the relative merits of their candidates." Clinton aides "made indirect attacks on the relative inexperience of Mr Obama, who entered the race a week ago." Democratic consultants "said the campaign, which already includes five other candidates, most notably John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice-presidential candidate, was shaping up to be the most intense and long-running in the party's history." Joe Trippi, campaign manager for Howard Dean in 2004, "said both Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton had been bounced into declaring their candidacies early by the strength of the other's campaign."

Insight Report On Obama's Madrassah Attendance Debunked. The Washington Post (1/23, C7, Kurtz, 690K) reports, "Fresh doubt was cast yesterday on a magazine's allegation that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) attended a madrassah, or religious school that teaches a fundamentalist version of Islam." Hardi Priyono, "deputy headmaster of the Basuki school in Indonesia, told CNN that his institution -- which Obama attended four decades ago, beginning when he was 6 -- is not a madrassah." In an interview with CNN correspondent John Vause, Priyono said, "This is a public school. We don't focus on religion." The Post ads Insight, "a weekly Internet magazine owned by the conservative Washington Times, had reported the madrassah allegation late last week and added, citing unnamed sources, that the information had been unearthed by researchers close to the campaign of Obama's rival for the Democratic presidential nomination Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York."

Media Infatuation With Obama May Be Short-Lived. In his Christian Science Monitor column (1/23), Dante Chinni, a senior associate at the Project for Excellence in Journalism, says Sen. Barack Obama's "life story – father from Kenya, mother from Kansas – makes for compelling copy. But at this point in American political history, an African-American running for president isn't new." For "many in the media, Obama is a candidate to get excited about because he holds the promise of being interesting, different, and able to shake up Washington. And that means Obama-mania will probably be alive and well in the press for at least a few more months. But at some point that lack of a long public history could present some problems for the senator." Right now, "Obama enjoys a sweet story line. But at some point, the media will be eager to fill in the missing pages. And when they do, Obama may find that his biggest strength with the media has its problems."

Newsweek Poll Finds Edwards Fares Best Against Top GOP Candidates. The New York Times (1/23, Broder, 1.16M) reports, "Conventional wisdom may say Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is the Democrats' prohibitive front-runner. But a Newsweek poll released over the weekend, which otherwise shows the candidates tightly bunched, indicates that former Senator John Edwards, below, is the only one to beat the top two potential Republican candidates in head-to-head matchups." The Newsweek poll shows 48% would vote for Edwards, 43% for John McCain; 48% would vote for Clinton, 47% for McCain; 46% would vote for Obama, while 44% would vote for McCain; 48% would vote for Edwards, 45% would vote for Giuliani; 48% would vote for Giuliani, 47% would vote for Clinton; and 47% would vote for Giuliani, 45% would vote for Obama.

Dodd Hopeful His Experience Will Sway Voters. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Calmes, 2.04M) reports that in contrast to the media frenzy around the candidacies of Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, Democratic hopeful Sen. Chris Dodd "travels the country, a year before the first nominating votes, 'hoping someone will show up,' he quips." Dodd's "experiences are typical of the early days of a presidential campaign, which often are humbling, even demeaning, for all but the rare Clinton-like celebrities and Obama-like phenomenons." Dodd has "been in the Senate for more than a quarter-century and was in the House for six years before that. He is chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. And he is an asterisk in early 2008 presidential polls." Yet ask "many Democratic activists whom they'd personally most like to see as president, and Mr. Dodd's name comes up often -- including from some committed to other candidates, notably Mrs. Clinton. Frequently described as witty, smart, and one of the most qualified figures in the party, Mr. Dodd enjoys goodwill beyond

Washington from his mid-1990s stint as national party chairman." Despite the "current 'Obama-mania' for his less-seasoned colleague, Mr. Dodd argues that with the nation roiled by war, terrorism and economic globalization, he can persuade voters that his experience is an asset."

Non-Senators Among 2008 Field Seen As Underrated. In his USA Today column (1/23, 11A), Dewayne Wickham says that with "neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney seeking the presidency next year, and foreign policy again the cause of great discontent, a growing number of senators are lining up for the job. And journalists are treating them as though they have the inside track." But in the "current campaign, there's no shortage of governors who have entered — or are poised to enter — the race. Among Democrats, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack have thrown their hats in the ring. And three Republicans who recently left their statehouse jobs — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, and George Pataki of New York — have set up exploratory committees." Don't "let the pundits and the early polls fool you. One of these governors could turn out to be a dark horse candidate, especially if Clinton and Obama split the Democratic Party's liberal base during the primary elections."

Busy Week Ahead For Presidential Candidates. The New York Times (1/23, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports unusual "number of stages" where the 2008 presidential race is "being played on at once." In Washington, there is "a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, a platform that could display the sharply contrasting views on Iraq of" Sens. John McCain and Clinton. Next comes President Bush's State of the Union address, "which many Democrats — notably Mrs. Clinton — view as providing an opportunity to tee off to advance their own presidential campaigns." For the "rest of the week, attention in the Senate will be focused on resolutions critical of President Bush's Iraq policy, giving a platform to other presidential hopefuls, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois, Joseph R. Biden of Delaware, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska." And "at week's end, Mrs. Clinton is making her first trip to Iowa since creating her presidential exploratory committee; it seems fair to surmise that this will not be the kind of small living-room chats — with 10 Democrats and a local reporter or two — that have put the state on the political map." Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani "will be competing for attention by heading for New Hampshire."

Websites Said To Offer Window Into Campaigns. In his Washington Post column (1/23, A17), Eugene Robinson rates the Internet presences of the leading three Democratic candidates: "So what do the Web sites HillaryClinton.com, BarackObama.com and JohnEdwards.com tell us about their namesakes? At first glance, they seem to confirm what we think we already know. Clinton's site evokes a super-competent juggernaut, with every base covered and every hair in place. Obama's is very much a work in progress. And Edwards's Web site suggests the patience, attention to detail and willingness to take risks that you would expect from a trial lawyer who rose from nothing to become a self-made millionaire." The "real difference is depth and ambition. Both Clinton and Obama (he on his Senate campaign Web site) say they want to have a dialogue with the American people about how best to solve the nation's problems. But Edwards has already started his conversation with the nation. His Web site is an exercise in social networking that includes not only a blog, where surfers can post their thoughts, but also cyber-diaries written by Edwards's family members."

Casino Mogul Donates $1 Million To Gingrich 527. The Washington Post (1/23, A4, Solomon, 690K) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "jump-started his new political group with a check for $1 million from a source many in his conservative base would shun -- the gambling industry. Gingrich's American Solutions for Winning the Future reported to the Internal Revenue Service that it collected a $1 million check from Las Vegas Sands Corp. Chairman Sheldon G. Adelson shortly after the November elections. … The contribution dwarfed the other checks, totaling just $60,000, gathered for the group's start-up. Gingrich announced the group late last fall, setting it up as a '527' organization." The post notes Adelson "was listed by Forbes magazine in 2006 as America's third-richest man, with assets of more than $20 billion."

Jindal Seeking Louisiana Governorship Again. The New York Times (1/23, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports Rep. Bobby Jindal will enter the 2007 Louisiana governor's race. … Jindal will be running against a weakened incumbent, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat. Ms. Blanco defeated Mr. Jindal in 2003, but her standing was damaged after Hurricane Katrina." The Washington Times (1/23, Hudson, 88K) reports Jindal "has a significant edge in early polling over" Blanco. A poll by the Southern Media and Opinion Research "shows Mrs. Blanco's support among voters is 35 percent, compared with 59 percent for Mr. Jindal."

Planned Demolition Of New Orleans Projects Draws Opposition. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Simmons, 850K) reports that "with inhabitable housing of any kind at a premium here, the fate of New Orleans' four largest public housing complexes — St. Bernard, C.J. Peete, B.W. Cooper and Lafitte — is at the center of another battle in the city's turbulent efforts to reshape its future. The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Housing Authority of New Orleans have approved plans to demolish these complexes, landmarks in their neighborhoods, and replace them with lower-density apartment clusters for mixed-income residents. Their decision has brought relentless opposition from former tenants who insist they want to restore their lives in their old homes."

State Farm Hit By Katrina-Related Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Pleven, 2.04M) reports, "Nearly a year and a half after Katrina, the legal storm spawned by the deadly hurricane is coming to a head in Mississippi. At its center is the nation's largest home insurer: State Farm. The Bloomington, Ill., firm is the only insurer, so far, to face a major judgment against it in a Mississippi court over a disputed homeowner's claim related to Katrina. T he judgment came two weeks ago when a federal judge ordered it to pay a Mississippi couple $232,292, and a jury awarded the couple $2.5 million in punitive damages. On Friday, State Farm settled another case about to go to trial, and the insurer faces lawsuits from hundreds of other Mississippi homeowners."

Motherhood Increasingly Seen As An Asset For Politicians. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "It probably wasn't chance that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first public event after announcing her interest in running for president — a stop at a New York health center named for the Chelsea and Clinton neighborhoods — echoed the name of her daughter. Nor was it chance that the new speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, took up her gavel for the first time earlier this year surrounded by children, including some of her grandchildren. … Whether being a woman is an asset or liability in national politics may be an open question, but being a mother — or a grandmother — appears to be a sure winner. Strategists say that talking about motherhood is reassuring to voters, some of whom are still uncomfortable with women in powerful jobs. It also helps create a narrative for their lives that connects them to mainstream and traditionalist voters."

Arab Divisions Abroad Reflected In Dearborn. The New York Times (1/23, MacFarquhar, 1.16M) reports that after the death of Dearborn Mayor Michael A. Guido in December, "a flock of Arab-American candidates stepped forward in the hopes of claiming City Hall. But despite the fact that roughly one in three Dearborn residents is of Arab origin, most of the Arab-American candidates had dropped out by mid-January. Poll numbers showed that none of them could win." The existence of "internal rivalries echoing those that beset the Arab world, along with the general electorate's lingering unease about Muslims, combined to derail what many here had hoped would be the chance to prove that Arab-Americans had arrived politically — at least in Dearborn, their unofficial capital in this country."

WSJournal Pans Massachusetts, California Healthcare Reform Plans, Calls Them Illegal. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.04M) says that "state schemes that feature 'pay or play' employer taxes or mandates" – such as the Massachusetts healthcare program and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's (R) recently proposed healthcare program -- "are probably illegal" under a decision in the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. That case "said that Maryland's 'Fair Share' health legislation -- otherwise known as 'the Wal-Mart tax' -- violates a federal employee-benefits law known by the acronym Erisa." The Journal continues, "Leave aside that the plan muscled into law by Maryland's Democratic legislature was far less ambitious. The basic similarity is that all three plans feature employer mandates or taxes aimed at changing employee-benefit plans -- in this case by requiring employers to provide health insurance. … There were sound reasons that Congress decided to create a uniform national regulatory framework when it wrote the Erisa law way back in 1974. To wit: Freeing employers from the administrative burden of having to comply with a multitude of state and local requirements leaves them with more money to spend on actual health care and other benefits." The Journal concludes, "We're all for state policy experiments, but these ballyhooed health care reforms are policy blunders that won't stand scrutiny in court, much less in the marketplace."

WSJournal Warns Spitzer On Financial Industry Competitiveness. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.04M) says in an editorial that as New York's Attorney General, Democrat Eliot Spitzer "was the scourge of the financial industry. And in a final rhetorical flourish in that job, he was among the first to denounce last month's report by the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation pointing to a decline in American financial industry competitiveness." Now, however, "Mr. Spitzer is New York's Governor, and it will be fascinating to see if he assumes a more statesmanlike pose toward the same industry. Both the New York state budget, and Mr. Spitzer's own political future, depend on the financial industry's prosperity, as the same Capital Markets Committee report made clear."

Administration Said To Provide "Scant Evidence" To Back Iran Claims. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, A1, Zavis, Miller, 850K) reports on its front page, "If there is anywhere Iran could easily stir up trouble in Iraq, it would be in Diyala, a rugged province along the border between the two nations. … But even here, evidence of Iranian involvement in Iraq's troubles is limited." US troops have found "mortars and antitank mines with Iranian markings dated 2006, said US Army Col. David W. Sutherland, who oversees the province. But there has been little sign of more advanced weaponry crossing the border, and no Iranian agents have been found." The Times notes that in his speech this month outlining the new US strategy in Iraq, President Bush promised to "seek out and destroy" Iranian networks that he said were providing "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies," and is expected "to strike a similar note in tonight's State of the Union speech." However, the Administration "has provided scant evidence to support those claims. Nor have reporters traveling with US troops seen extensive signs of Iranian involvement." The lack of "publicly disclosed evidence" has "led to questions about whether the Administration is overstating its case," and some even "suggest Bush and his aides are pointing to Iran to deflect blame for US setbacks in Iraq."

Bush Address May Hint At Direction Of US Policy On Iran. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "With evidence mounting that international pressure on Iran is getting results, President Bush prepares to deliver a State of the Union speech Tuesday night that could provide signs of where efforts against Tehran and its nuclear program will go next." Some analysts and "a few prominent foreign diplomats -- including Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov -- have said they see unsettling parallels between US action and rhetoric on Iraq and America's Iran policy." Since early 2005, the US "has opened a diplomatic track, primarily with European powers, to stop Iran short of acquiring nuclear weapons through international pressure," but "the question now may be how long Bush…will be willing to stick with an approach whose steering wheel is not solely in American hands."

Iran Bars IAEA Inspectors. The AP (1/23, Karimi) reports Iran has barred 38 nuclear inspectors on a United Nations list from entering the country, the foreign minister said Monday "in what appeared to be retaliation for the UN sanctions imposed last month." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told the official Islamic Republic News Agency, "The act of rejecting some inspectors is legal and in accordance with the agency's regulations," noting that others on the agency's list remain eligible. AFP (1/23) reports the IAEA "said it was discussing with Iran its demand to withdraw some nuclear inspectors but was confident it could continue monitoring the country's nuclear facilities."

The New York Times (1/23, A7, Fathi, 1.16M) notes the announcement "came only days after Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, Iran's most senior dissident cleric, criticized President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiant stance against the West on the nuclear issue in a speech on Friday, calling it provocative." The two developments "suggest an increasingly open debate within Iran over how forcefully to confront the West over Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as its government continues to defend them."

Similarly, the Washington Times/AP (1/23, Dareini) says Montazeri joined "a chorus of criticism that has included even the hard-line leader's allies" and "reflected a growing feeling among many that Mr. Ahmadinejad has concentrated too much on fiery, anti-US speeches and not enough on the economy."

Iran Begins Short-Range Missile Tests. Under the headline "Iran Tests Missiles As Fear Of Attack Grows," the Financial Times (1/23, Smyth) reports Iran began "military maneuvers in its central desert on Monday, testing short-range missiles at a time of rising tension with the US and as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad faces continuing criticism at home." Iranian state radio reported that Revolutionary Guards were test-firing "both the 350km-range Zelzal-1 missile and the 70km range Fajr-5 near the town of Garmsar, 80km south-east of Tehran." Mohsen Rezaei, "an influential conservative politician and former Revolutionary Guards commander," told state television at the weekend that Washington had opted for "serious confrontation" with Iran, in which it "intends to resolve its problem in the Middle East." The Times says Rezaei' comments represent "a rare glimpse for the Iranian public of the seriousness with which leading officials view the situation, especially in his acknowledgment that America or Israel might attack Iran's atomic sites."

Seoul Asks Washington To Ease Sanctions On Pyongyang. AFP (1/23) reports Seoul "has told the United States that some of the frozen North Korean accounts in a Macau bank are from legitimate business and should be unblocked," South Korean news reports said Tuesday. The nation's Chosun Ilbo newspaper quoted an unidentifed high-ranking source in Washington as saying that South Korea asked the United States to consider unfreezing at least five of the 50 accounts with Banco Delta Asia (BDA). The source was quoted as saying, "Releasing money in those accounts from the freeze is aimed at saving North Korea's face in order to encourage it to proceed with the six-party talks."

Ban Announces Audit Of North Korean Fund. The AP (1/23, Bergman) reports UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon announced Monday that an external audit would be conducted of the UN Development Program in North Korea "after the US alleged the program had funneled millions of dollars to Kim Jong Il's regime." The audit will "initially focus on UNDP spending in North Korea and then be expanded to other UN agencies, though details have yet to be finalized," said Ban's spokeswoman, Michele Montas. The audit will be conducted by the U.N.'s Board of Auditors, which is comprised of accountants from eight U.N. members, she said.

The Washington Times (1/23, Pisik, 88K) says the audit, which is expected to be completed within three months, "will specifically look at hard-currency transactions, the independence of locally hired staff, and the agency's ability to monitor ongoing projects."

Korean Envoys Meet In China. The AP (1/23) reports nuclear envoys from North and South Korean met in Beijing as part of the latest efforts to restart six-nation talks, the South Korean Foreign Ministry said Tuesday. The South's Chun Yung-woo met North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan in Beijing, the Foreign Ministry said, "without giving any further details."

Separately, the AP (1/23, Herman) reports envoys to the six-party talks "are sounding rare notes of optimism, raising hopes for progress after their expected return to the bargaining table in coming weeks." Russian nuclear envoy Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov said Monday after meeting over the weekend with North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan, "On the whole, the impression is developing that the North Korean side has interpreted the results of the talks in Berlin with a certain optimism." For his part, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Monday in Beijing that there was "a basis for making progress" when the negotiations resume. The AP reports that "several envoys have said they expect the nuclear talks to resume before mid-February."

Hill Says Chinese Missile Test Will Not Affect Six-Party Talks. The Washington Times (1/23, Lanfranco, 88K) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "said yesterday that the resumption of six-party talks in Beijing should not be affected by US concerns over China's test of an anti-satellite missile." Hill told reporters, "My government's position on that is pretty clear. We've certainly conveyed [concern] to the Chinese, but I would say the six-party talks are on a different track."

Top Somali Militant Surrenders In Kenya. The New York Times (1/23, A8, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports the second in command of Somalia's Islamist forces "has surrendered to the Kenyan authorities and is staying at a hotel in Nairobi," Western diplomats and Somali officials said Monday. Sheik Sharif Ahmed, the head of the Islamist Courts Union executive council, "was part of a group of Islamist leaders being hunted down by American and Ethiopian troops in southern Somalia." Described as "a moderate Muslim and potential peacemaker," he "surfaced at the Kenya-Somalia border in the past week, Somali officials said, and now the Kenyan immigration authorities are deliberating on what to do with him." Several Western diplomats "said American officials…were instrumental in arranging Mr. Ahmed's safe passage to Kenya." However, On Monday, an American

Embassy official "denied that the United States played any role in bringing him to Kenya."

The Washington Post (1/23, A14, McCrummen, 690K) says US officials "are hoping he can help subdue a rising insurgency among the movement's supporters" on the streets of Mogadishu.

China Says Test Does Not Signal Intent To Militarize Space. The AP (1/23) reports Chinese Foreign ministry officials told Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill that China's successful test of an anti-satellite weapon earlier this month "should not be seen as a threat and does not signal the beginning of a race to militarize space," the State Department said Monday. Hill raised the issue with Chinese officials over the weekend in Beijing, urging the Chinese to "be more forthcoming about their military activities and their defense budget."

AFP (1/23) reports State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday, "The bottom line is we encourage them to be more forthcoming, more transparent with respect to not only this test but also their space program."

Zoellick Urges Greater US, Chinese Economic Cooperation. Former US trade representative and current vice chairman at Goldman Sachs Group, Robert Zoellick, writes in the Financial Times (1/23) that "America and China need to develop an agenda as mutual stakeholders in the world economy." To date, Zoellick says "the media focus has been on the appreciation of China's currency," but stresses that "the Sino-American agenda needs to be broader." A "successful strategy," he notes, "will need to open doors for the US and others to benefit while supporting China's development and encouraging China to help sustain the international economic system to which its growth is linked." Zoellick concludes, "If the US and China recognize the strategic stakes in guiding this transition, they can develop an agenda that builds confidence and support in both countries and beyond."

Rice To Unveil "Substantial" Aid Package For Lebanon. AFP (1/23, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday will announce "a substantial aid package for Lebanon at a donors conference in Paris" aimed at "bolstering the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. The offer "will come on top of more than $230 million already pledged by Washington to help rebuild Lebanon following the devastating war between Israel and the Islamic militia Hezbollah last July and August. McCormack would not provide details of the US aid proposal, other than say it was "substantial." But another "senior official" said it would be "an equivalent vigorous effort" in comparison to the $230 million pledged by Washington at a donors conference in Stockholm shortly after a UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the war. While insisting the Paris conference was "about helping all Lebanese and not just Siniora," the US officials said it would "also highlight the failure of Hezbollah and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, to repair the war damage."

The AP (1/23, Gedda) says the expected $230 million package "would be a major increase over the $30 million to $40 million that Washington had pledged for aid to Lebanon in recent years." The package is likely to include funds to rebuild "a vital bridge on the Beirut-Damascus highway, which is expected to cost about $20 million." Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns said in Israel on Sunday that the assistance will be part of a world effort to defend Lebanon "from that axis of countries, Iran and Syria, and organizations like Hezbollah, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and others."

Diplomatic Activity Picks Up Ahead Of Mideast Summit. The AP (1/23, Teibel) reports, "After months of inaction, a flurry of diplomatic activity toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking is under way." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is planning a summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, top Israeli officials are floating peace initiatives and the moderate Palestinian president says he is ready to discuss the outlines of a final settlement. But with Hamas militants dominating the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, and weak leadership on all sides, no one expects a deal any time soon." In the past few weeks, the Israeli and Palestinian leaders "held their first substantive meeting, and Israel followed up by transferring $100 million in frozen tax revenues to Abbas." However, "Sharp differences have emerged between the Israeli and Palestinian positions." The Palestinians "oppose an Israeli proposal for a provisional Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, believing Israel could use it to usurp land while the sides negotiate endlessly over so-called final status issues." The AP notes that "it is precisely the big-picture issues -- final borders, the status of disputed Jerusalem and the Palestinians' demand to repatriate refugees and their descendants -- that have caused past peace talks to collapse."

Palestinians To Resume Unity Talks. AFP (1/23, El Oun) reports Palestinians are "preparing to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after inconclusive talks" between Hamas' Khaled Meshaal and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. A statement issued Monday said a meeting would take place in Gaza City on Tuesday between representatives of Fatah and Hamas, but gave no further details.

Palestinian Father Seeks Peace With Israelis After Death Of Daughter. The New York Times (1/23, A3, Myre, 1.16M) profiles Bassam Aramin, whose 10-year-old daughter was killed last week during a clash between stone-throwing Palestinian youths and the Israeli police and now "says he wants to talk to Israelis about making peace." With his Israeli partner, Zohar Shapira, a former member of an elite commando unit, Aramin "has been speaking to students and community groups in Israel and the West Bank."

Israel Names New Army Chief Of Staff. The New York Times (1/23, A3, Myre, 1.16M) reports Gabi Ashkenazi, a former infantry officer who commanded Israeli troops against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, was appointed Monday as the Israeli military's new chief of staff. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz agreed on the appointment at a meeting on Monday evening, the prime minister's office said. The nomination must still be approved by the cabinet and a government committee.

US Seeks Polish Approval For Missile-Shield Site.

USA Today (1/23, 5A, 2.27M) reports Washington "is asking Poland to allow ground-based interceptor missiles on its territory as part of a missile-defense system," the US Embassy in Warsaw said Monday. Polish Defense Minister Radek Sikorski "indicated a willingness to discuss the issue" with "our most important ally" but said nothing had been decided.

US Plans Raise Concerns. The AP (1/23, Gera) reports the "prospect of sophisticated US radar and interceptor systems in formerly communist Eastern Europe has led Russian military leaders to warn of a new arms race." The system "would create a clear threat for Russia," Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, the chief of Russia's Space Forces, warned Monday. Washington has "repeatedly sought to reassure Russia it has nothing to fear from the system -- a message Andrew Schilling, a spokesman for the US Embassy in Warsaw, echoed Monday." He told The AP a US missile defense system in Europe would be solely aimed at countering "the evolving Middle Eastern ballistic missile threat."

Poll Shows Global View Of US Worsened In 2006.

The New York Times (1/23, A11, 1.16M) reports the "global view of the United States' role in world affairs deteriorated significantly again last year," according to a poll of more than 26,000 people in 25 countries. Negative feelings about the war in Iraq "were prevalent, and nearly 7 in 10 people polled said the American military presence in the Middle East provoked more violence than it prevented," according to the poll done for the BBC World Service by GlobeScan and the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland. In 18 countries previously polled, "an average of 29 percent of those surveyed saw the United States as having a mainly positive influence, down from 36 percent last year."

The Washington Post (1/23, A14, Sullivan, 690K) notes the survey of 26,381 people was conducted from November to January in Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Britain, Chile, China, Egypt, France, Germany, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Italy, Kenya, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, the Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Russia, South Korea, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and the United States. The Post notes that "views of US foreign policy are also becoming more negative among US citizens, the poll found. Of the 1,000 Americans surveyed, 57 percent said the United States is having a mainly positive influence in the world. That is down from 63 percent last year and 71 percent two years ago."

Armenian Journalist's Death Leads To Conciliation.

The New York Times (1/23, A6, Fowler, Arsu, 1.16M) reports the killing of an Armenian-Turkish journalist in Istanbul last week "and the sorrow it has generated within Turkey are leading to rare conciliatory gestures between Turkey and Armenia, historic enemies, and to calls for changes in laws here defending Turkish identity." On Monday, Armenian "political and spiritual figures accepted an invitation from the Turkish government to attend the funeral of Hrant Dink." Despite "the fact that the Armenian-Turkish border has been sealed since 1993 and diplomatic relations severed," Armenia is sending a deputy foreign minister, Arman Kirakossian, to the funeral, and the archbishop of the Armenian Church of America, Khajag Barsamian, also accepted the government's invitation to the ceremony.

The Washington Times (1/23, Birch, 88K) reports on the reaction in the Turkish town of Trabzon to news that "a local youth confessed over the weekend" to the shooting Dink.

Schwab Says No Breakthrough On Doha Round Likely. USA Today (1/23, 5B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports trade negotiator Susan Schwab "said Monday there is no prospect of an imminent breakthrough in long-stalled global trade talks." Schwab leaves Wednesday for the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, "where she plans to meet with counterparts from Europe and key developing nations in hopes of reviving the flickering Doha Round negotiations." But in an interview with the newspaper, Schwab said, "We're still not close, I would say, to being able to sit down as trade ministers to talk about closing a Doha Round deal or to talk about a Doha Round breakthrough in substance." She said ongoing "technical" talks are "advancing and could pave the way for an eventual deal," but "major disagreements remain."

Reflecting Schwab's assessment, the New York Times (1/23, Bilefsky, Dougherty, 1.16M) reports the European Union's chief trade negotiator "said Monday that efforts to restart stalled global trade talks were showing new vigor. But he sought to discourage expectations that a breakthrough could come during a meeting of trade ministers this week" in Davos. EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson said, "We are in the endgame, but we are not in a situation where we have the outlines of an agreement."

Report Cites British Collusion In N. Ireland Killings. AFP (1/23, Mallie) reports British police "colluded with paramilitaries behind at least 10 murders in Northern Ireland in the 1990s, a damning report said, triggering outrage in Dublin and Belfast and remorse in London." The report about Protestant militants "threatens to cloud current efforts to restore self-rule in the long-troubled British-run province, in which Catholic lack of confidence in policing is a key stumbling block." Irish premier Bertie Ahern responded, "Today's ombudsman's report is deeply disturbing. Its findings are of the utmost gravity."

Serbia Vote Could Lead To Coalition Of Democrats. The New York Times (1/23, Wood, 1.16M) reports, "Two leading democratic parties emerged Monday as the groups most likely to form a government in Serbia, despite a first-place showing for a nationalist party in the parliamentary elections on Sunday." The "prospect of slow negotiations to secure a coalition," however, "complicates international efforts to find a solution for the disputed province of Kosovo, which are approaching a turning point." Meanwhile, the formation of a coalition also "will not be easy," because the two main democratic parties "have longstanding rivalries, and the prime minister, Vojilsav Kostunica, seems unwilling to negotiate his job away, though his Serbian Democrats came in third."

Russia Seeks To Limit Foreign Labor In Crackdown On Illegal Immigration. On its front page, the Washington Times (1/23, A1, Mainville, 88K) reports, "Thousands of migrant workers from the Caucasus, Central Asia and China are leaving Russia as the government institutes tough new measures aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration." Campaigners against illegal immigration are "welcoming the measures, saying low-paid migrants were distorting the job market and taking work from Russian citizens. But critics say the moves are ill-advised because they will drive up retail prices and create a labor shortage that could hurt Russia's booming economy."

Author Criticizes China's New Adoption Rules. Beth Nonte Russell, author of the forthcoming "Forever Lily: An Unexpected Mother's Journey to Adoption in China," writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) in response to a recent announcement by the Chinese government that it "had prepared strict new criteria for foreign adoption applications because the country claimed it lacked 'available' babies to meet the 'spike' in demand." Russell questions whether, "as China increasingly asserts itself on the world stage and prepares to host the 2008 Summer Olympics, allowing Westerners to adopt thousands of infants each year would fit the image it wanted to project. I suspect not, and China's new restrictions lead me to believe that national pride is more important than getting these children into loving homes." She notes that the "issue of abandoned and institutionalized children remains a taboo subject in China, a problem the government does not even acknowledge exists. … But the answer is not to stop the foreigners from adopting; it is to put an end to their reasons for doing so."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Captured Documents Show Iraq Al Qaeda Plotted Attacks In US. ABC World News (1/22, story 3, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "American officials have long feared that insurgent and terrorist activity in Iraq could spill over into this country, and now it appears those fears were justified. For the first time, American officials uncovered a plan by al Qaeda in Iraq to strike inside the United States." ABC (Thomas) added that "highly-classified incident documents" were "captured in a raid on an al Qaeda in Iraq safe house," and "sources tell ABC News the documents show al Qaeda in Iraq was developing a plan to slip terrorists into the US using student visas, the same technique used by the 9/11 hijackers. … The plot was discovered six months ago, around the time Zarqawi was killed by coalition forces." The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 3, :30, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "CBS News has learned al Qaeda wanted to use student visas to get terrorists into this country. Intelligence officials say all of those involved have either been captured or killed."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Meyer, 850K) reports, "The plot appeared to be little more than an informal list of Al Qaeda-affiliated operatives and initial plans…said one official. But it was deemed serious enough to alert the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security, which mobilized agents in the United States to look for possible terrorists and for signs of attempted infiltration, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss classified details of the case."

D'Souza Says Radical Muslims Hate US Popular Culture, Not Freedom. In a USA Today (1/23, 2.27M) op-ed, author Dinesh D'Souza writes that Americans "are still under the illusion that America is fighting a war against the enemies of modernity. … In President Bush's words, 'They hate our freedoms.'" On the contrary, D'Souza notes, "Radical Islam's main charge against America is that we are a decadent, immoral society that is projecting its culture and values throughout the world and threatening their faith." D'Souza adds that the Bush administration "should stop calling for democracy worldwide," and "show the rest of the world the face of traditional America. … And America should promote traditional family values, not feminism and homosexual rights, in international forums like the United Nations. If traditional Muslims realized that there are millions of Americans who go to church, take care of their families and live by traditional values, they would be less likely to view us or our leaders as the Great Satan, and fewer of them will be tempted to join the camp of the Islamic radicals."

Prosecutors Claim Padilla Defense Leak Could Taint Jury. The AP (1/23, Anderson) reports, "The leak of transcripts of Jose Padilla's intercepted telephone conversations by a defense lawyer to The New York Times violated a court order and could jeopardize selection of an impartial jury, federal prosecutors said Monday. … 'There is no question that the disclosure was calculated and deliberate, with the effect of exposing potential jurors to evidence before it is introduced at trial when both sides will have the opportunity to argue its significance,' prosecutors said in court papers." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke has scheduled a hearing Wednesday on the issue, the latest in a string of complications to arise in the case of the alleged al-Qaida operative." The AP adds, "Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and former Chicago gang member, is charged with being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremists. Originally accused of plotting a radioactive 'dirty bomb' attack after his 2002 arrest, Padilla was designated an enemy combatant by President Bush and held without criminal charge at a Navy brig for 3 1/2 years. … He was added to an existing Miami terrorism-support case in late 2005 during a legal battle over the president's wartime detention powers. The dirty bomb allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment. … Three Miami-based public defenders representing Padilla - Michael Caruso, Anthony Natale and Orlando do Campo - admitted in court papers that 'one of Jose Padilla's counsel' provided the transcripts to a Times reporter for a story published Jan. 4. The lawyer responsible was not identified."

Administration's Change Of Surveillance Policy Sparks Commentary. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/23) reports, "Just watching Alberto Gonzales being grilled over the Bush administration's new, classified domestic-surveillance agreement with the FISA court was an exercise in frustration. One can only imagine what it was like for the senators doing the grilling; they were simply trying to figure out whether the deal undermines or meets the intent of their own law to protect Americans' privacy." The Tribune continues, "They didn't get very far. In Thursday's Judiciary Committee hearing, the ever soft-spoken, ever genial attorney general would neither describe FISA orders that ended the warrantless wiretap program nor agree that senators had a right to see them. … That stance is untenable. Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to prevent unlawful eavesdropping by government, and it cannot determine whether to give congressional blessing to the new rules or amend the FISA law unless its members -- who are accustomed to receiving sensitive, classified material -- know how the rules work. Congress must press the White House until it gets the information." The Tribune adds, "Talks between the executive branch and the FISA court reportedly accelerated after the November elections. According to the Los Angeles Times, government officials said the negotiations 'centered on securing an agreement that would allow the administration to seek warrants on groups of people in certain circumstances, rather than being required to obtain separate court orders for every individual under suspicion.' The Times said the changes 'appear to require individual warrants when the target is a U.S. citizen or has permanent legal resident status.' … But senators heard no such explanation from Gonzales. They must persevere until they do."

The Staten Island Advance (NY) (1/23) editorializes, "Late last week U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in a two-page letter to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, announced the death of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the super-secret program authorized by the president to eavesdrop on phone calls and e-mails of Americans believed to be communicating with suspected terrorists. … Mr. Gonzales' announcement ended a 13-month brewing battle over the constitutionality of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the warranteless wiretapping conducted by the Bush administration, which had vehemently defended its right to conduct super-secret eavesdropping on phone calls and e-mails of Americans without going through the well-established legal channels before doing so." The Advance adds, "Democrats are crowing that the Bush administration could no longer -- in the face of widespread criticism from scholars and some Justice Department lawyers -- defend its actions. … But one senior Justice Department official said: 'Obviously, this issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny ... considering all of these circumstances, the president determined that this was the appropriate course.' … So, has the administration actually backed down on one of its key interpretations of executive power? … Already some are speculating that the Gonzales letter is really a Trojan Horse. They claim that a closer reading of the letter provides a major, unresolved loophole the administration plans to exploit. … Regardless, of which side of this debate readers fall, the program raised troubling questions, not the least of which is the extent and depth of presidential powers even in the time of war. … That fact is the most worrisome about this whole affair, that the White House, having publicly announced its compliance, would behind the scenes still do just the opposite."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (1/23) editorializes, "'The truth of the matter is we looked at FISA, and we all concluded there's no way we can do what we have to do to protect this country under the strict reading of FISA.' … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week … The element of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that likely caused such consternation? The one that said eavesdropping on Americans should occur with a warrant. And the all-too-typical administration response? Ignore the law." The Sentinel adds, "FISA actually is abundantly clear on this matter of warrants. Nonetheless, the administration had some choices. It could have asked Congress to change the law. It might have noted another part of FISA that allowed warrantless surveillance on an emergency basis for 72 hours before the warrant was requested. … Instead, the Bush administration followed the now familiar script - it ignored the law until it looked as if it would be forced to comply. Last week, the Justice Department announced that it would put its surveillance program under FISA court supervision. This occurred weeks after Democrats assumed control of Congress, just before Gonzales was to appear before the Senate committee and two weeks before a federal appeals court in Cincinnati was going to hear arguments about whether the program is legal. The administration's change of heart was clearly no coincidence. … Congress must continue its oversight of this program. The court cases challenging it must also proceed. There are simply too many unanswered questions."

In an op-ed for the Washington Times (1/23), Bruce Fein writes, "George Orwell had his 'Animal Farm,' and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has his version of the Constitution. … According to the attorney general, the three branches of the government are equal, but President Bush is more equal than Congress or the Supreme Court. Thus, the president is constitutionally empowered to open mail, conduct electronic surveillance, break and enter homes, or torture detainees in defiance of federal statutes. Congress is impotent to check the president's national security powers to prevent the massive intelligence abuses disclosed by the Church Committee, including the gathering of political intelligence under a false foreign intelligence banner. Mr. Gonzales further lectures that the president is authorized to sign bills passed by Congress but to disregard those portions he asserts are unconstitutional, which is tantamount to a line-item veto power rejected by the Supreme Court in New York v. Clinton (1998). … He adds that President Bush, like British kings, can do no wrong in national security matters. Thus, the Supreme Court improperly rebuked the commander in chief over indefinite detentions of alleged unlawful enemy combatants, habeas corpus and military commissions by disputing Mr. Gonzales' doctrine of presidential infallibility doctrine." Fein adds, "The Founding Fathers, in contrast, believed the three branches of government should be equal in the Constitution's checks and balances. Since men were not angels -- even saintly President George Washington -- ambition must be made to counteract ambition to forestall the tyranny of 'Animal Farm.' Judicial review of presidential actions was enshrined in the expectation the White House would chronically seek to usurp or misuse power to boost its political standing, especially in times of conflict." Fein concludes, "Notwithstanding the attorney general, the equilibrium of power among the legislative, executive and judicial branches has proven the best way to preserve an enlightened democratic dispensation for the ages."

The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (1/23) editorializes, "A year ago, when the program of warrantless wiretapping of overseas calls came to light, the Bush administration argued strongly that the surveillance was outside the purview of the courts. … By virtue of the president's executive powers on behalf of national security, the White House said, the administration already had the power to monitor those communications. … And aside from the inherent powers that gave the president the right to monitor those calls, the kind of massive electronic eavesdropping that was being done by the National Security Agency simply made the Carter-era Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court an outmoded tool for dealing with the threat of terrorism." The Caller-Times continues, "Trust us, the White House said reassuringly: The program has all the necessary constitutional protections built into its system without any courts. … Then the November elections happened. And last week, in a quiet turnabout, the Bush administration announced that it was discontinuing the program of warrantless wiretaps and said that any future wiretaps would be done under the authority of the FISA Court. … It was a welcome change of method, even if it did not represent a change of heart on the part of the Bush White House." The Caller-Times adds, "The warrantless wiretapping program was an abuse of presidential powers and its dismantling should be welcomed by Americans. The program, while it operated, overrode one of the basic constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures by the power of the state. That abuse fit the Bush administration's view that national security trumps all other concerns, when in fact the need to preserve our way of life in times of crisis demands that we uphold those constitutional protections then more zealously than ever."

US To Keep Syrian-Born Canadian On Terrorism Watch List. The New York Times (1/23, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "Despite a Canadian inquiry that cleared a Syrian-born Canadian citizen of any terrorist ties, the Bush administration has formally refused a Canadian government request that it remove the man, Maher Arar, from the terrorist watch list, saying that the United States has secret information justifying his inclusion." In a letter sent last week to Canadian public safety minister Stockwell Day, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that "their departments and American intelligence agencies 'have re-examined the materials in the possession of the United States regarding Mr. Arar.'" Sen. Patrick Leahy, who last week "angrily pressed Mr. Gonzales about the case," said in a statement yesterday, "This abhorrent practice stains America's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights, and I hope this administration will renounce it at long last."

CNN.com (1/23) reports, "American officials said Monday that a Canadian should remain on a U.S. terrorist watch list despite the Canadian government's conclusion otherwise and its apology after the designation led to his detention in Syria." CNN continues, "In a joint letter, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff informed Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety, that they had again looked at intelligence in their possession concerning Maher Arar. … 'Based on this re-examination, we remain of the view that the continued watch listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate,' the U.S. officials said. … 'Our conclusion in this regard is supported by information developed by U.S. law enforcement agencies that is independent of that provided to us by Canada regarding Mr. Arar.'" CNN adds, "In 2002, U.S. officials detained Arar at a New York airport as he was trying to return home to Canada from a vacation in Tunisia. Canada had placed Arar, a Syrian native, on a terrorism watch list. He said the United States arrested him and eventually sent him to Syria, where he allegedly was tortured and held for 10 months. … In September, a Canadian report concluded that Arar wasn't a terrorism suspect. Gonzales has said the U.S. legally deported Arar and didn't send him to Syria to be tortured. Syria defends its handling of the case, saying a Canadian diplomat visited Arar twice and found he was treated well. Human rights groups widely criticize the Damascus government for torturing prisoners"

AFP (1/23) reports, "On Monday, the US Center for Constitutional Rights, which is supporting Arar in his legal efforts, denounced the US keeping Arar on its watch list. … 'It is now crystal clear that the US has shown everything it has on Mr. Arar to Canada, and that there is no reason for him to be on a watch-list,' said center attorney Maria LaHood."

Cohen Urges Stimson's Firing. Washington Post (1/23, 690K) columnist Richard Cohen writes about Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense Cully Stimson, "I, for one, do not accept Stimson's apology. I think it is insincerely offered and beside the point. ... By now, any other administration would have fired Stimson, apology or not. His words show that he is unfit for government service, not to mention membership in the bar." Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) corrects an error from last Friday's editorial, noting Stimson "is a deputy assistant secretary of defense, not state."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Continental Airlines Flight In Texas Delayed By Bomb Threat. The AP (1/23) reports, "A Continental Airlines Inc. commuter flight was delayed without incident for about an hour Monday after its scheduled landing at George Bush Intercontinental Airport because of a bomb threat, authorities said. The flight…was diverted to a taxiway, where local, state and federal authorities took about an hour to determine the plane and its passengers were safe, said Marlene McClinton, spokeswoman for the Houston Airport System." The AP adds, "FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap described the incident as a 'nonspecified bomb threat' that apparently started in Tyler," Texas, where the flight originated.

United Airlines Passenger Faces Federal Charges For Flight Disruption. The AP (1/23) reports, "A United Airlines passenger faces federal charges for allegedly making statements about a hijacking, trying to open a cabin door and fighting with flight attendants while aboard a flight from Boston to San Francisco. Erin Callahan Lambert, 28, who apparently was intoxicated during Flight 179 on Sunday, was taken into custody after the plane landed at San Francisco International Airport, authorities said. She was charged Monday with assaulting a flight attendant and interfering with the performance of duties of flight crew members." The AP notes, "Lambert, a Bay Area resident, was turned over to San Francisco airport police upon arrival at SFO, where she refused to be interviewed by the FBI and requested an attorney, the affidavit said."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Pass Chemical Plant Security Law "With Teeth." The New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) editorializes, "The new Democratic leadership in Congress has a chance to finally do what the Republican Congress and the Bush administration failed to do after Sept. 11: to protect the nation's chemical plants from an attack. Lawmakers should stop the Homeland Security Department from adopting new regulations that would block state and local governments from doing more to protect their residents and should finally pass a federal law with teeth." Though supporters of the "pre-emption" of local rules "always claim that they just want a uniform standard," in cases "like this one — where the federal law is absurdly weak — it is obvious that the real agenda is to block serious safety measures at every level of government."

WAR NEWS:

Warner Comes Out Against Surge Plan. GOP Sen. John Warner, the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, yesterday expressed his opposition to President Bush's new Iraq strategy. The CBS Evening News (1/22, lead story, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) said last night "some key Republican senators are calling for the President to abandon this idea of a troop surge. Led by…Warner, the message was clear." Warner: "Mr. President, that level, 21,500, directly into the face of ever increasing polls that say the Iraqi people want us to go home." This "underscores the increasing likelihood that a majority of Congress, including a significant number of Republicans will go on the record opposing Mr. Bush's plan." GOP Sen. Susan Colins: "So I don't think this will work. I think it's a mistake to ask thousands of additional American GIs to go into the midst of a sectarian battle whose solution is political." NBC Nightly News (1/22, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) also led its broadcast announcing that Warner, "a prominent Republican senator from Virginia, staunch on defense, today came out against the President."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Levey, 850K) calls Warner "one of the White House's most powerful supporters of the Iraq war," and calls the development "a serious setback for President Bush." Warner is "a widely respected onetime Navy secretary" and "had been largely restrained in his criticism of the president's plan until Monday." Warner's "decision to introduce a nonbinding resolution — co-sponsored by…Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, along with Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- deals a blow to a White House that has been struggling to contain a revolt on Capitol Hill." The Times goes on to compare the Warner resolution with that introduced by Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden. The Biden resolution, "unlike Warner's, calls Bush's proposal an 'escalation,' a word criticized by some Republicans as politically loaded because of its association with Vietnam. It also does not include wording that acknowledges the president's constitutional authority to direct the war."

USA Today/AP (1/23, 7A) notes the action taken by Collins, Coleman and Warner "raised the number of Senate GOP publicly against Bush's plan to five. Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine have said they back the Democrats' resolution."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "In an interview last evening, Mr. Hagel said that…Warner had allowed him to preview the language on Friday and found it to be, in some instances, more detailed than his own in specifying what course the administration should follow. 'The bottom line is this is a pretty significant piece of legislation,' Mr. Hagel said. 'In no way is this good news for the administration.'" Biden "has called a meeting tomorrow on the matter and signaled a willingness to accept changes to broaden support. 'What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war,' said a Biden aide. … Nonetheless, the situation is complicated by the growing rivalry among would-be Democratic presidential candidates, including Mr. Biden himself. The Delaware Democrat has to navigate through this thicket, and if the various camps aren't careful, the whole debate could degenerate into the sort of political word games and posturing that so often bring ridicule on the Senate."

But the New York Times (1/23, Zeleny, Hulse, 1.16M) reports Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, "the Massachusetts Democrat who has proposed a resolution to block spending for any increase in troops, said the terminology in a final resolution may be less important than gaining Republican support for it." The Washington Times (1/23, Hurt, 88K) quotes Kennedy saying, "The opposition to the President's misguided escalation of the Iraq war is growing louder and louder."

In fact, the Washington Post (1/23, A6, Weisman, 690K) reports that "by last night, Warner had already met with Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), and the two camps were negotiating a single resolution likely to be approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday."

The Financial Times (1/23, Sevastopulo, Negus) runs a similar report under the headline "GOP Delivers New Blow On Troop Surge," noting "the intensified opposition to the surge came the day before General David Petraeus, the incoming US commander in Iraq, was to face tough questions on Capitol Hill on whether Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his promise to crack down on sectarian militias."

House GOP Wants Monthly Reports From Bush On War Progress. Meanwhile, said ABC World News (1/22, story 2, :30, Gibson, 8.78M), "House Republicans drafted strategic benchmarks for US and Iraqi forces to meet and want to require the Administration to issue monthly status reports on the war."

Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported House Minority Leader John Boehner "emphasized the support for the President among rank-and-file Republicans on Iraq is no longer rock-solid." Boehner: "There are a lot of members of our party who are skeptical that the plan will work because of its dependence on the new Iraqi government stepping up its activities."

The Washington Post (1/23, A6, Weisman, 690K) reports "the House Republican benchmarks…represented a clear break from administration policy. Under the proposal, every 30 days the White House would have to present Congress clear measurements showing the Iraqi government's progress in purging insurgents and terrorists from its security forces, identifying the level of combat experience for Iraqi army battalions, tracking expenditures on Iraqi army equipment and measuring the effectiveness of the police force in Baghdad. The administration would also have to measure Iraqi government efforts to breed tolerance among its country's warring sects." The Post adds, "Some Republican aides saw both the Senate and House developments as positive for Bush, because they give Republicans eager to voice their opposition to the president's Iraq policy ways to go on record without siding with the more forthright statements of opposition drafted with more Democratic support. But Democrats characterized the development as strong evidence of Bush's eroding support."

McClatchy (1/23) reports, "Combined with near-unanimous Democratic opposition to Bush's war policy, the Republican stands show a broad bipartisan lack of confidence in the president's course."

Rockefeller Says "Iraq Adventure" Draining Domestic Security Funds. The AP (1/23, Shrader) reports, "The new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee said he fears the government will not have enough money for homeland security and other domestic priorities because of President Bush's 'Iraq adventure.'" In an interview, Sen. Jay Rockefeller "criticized almost every major facet of the Bush administration's national security course since Sept. 11, 2001. 'The president has in a sense walked away from the war on terror,' Rockefeller said."

Growing Number Of Lawmakers With Relatives In Iraq Noted. USA Today (1/23, Kiely, 2.27M) reports Montana Sen. Max Baucus (D) "lost his nephew, Philip, in Iraq. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., says his son, Alan, had two close calls: one from an improvised explosive device, the other from a sniper. Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., credits his nightly prayers with his son Perry's narrow escape from a mortar attack in Fallujah." USA Today adds, "Almost four years into the war, the conflict in Iraq has begun to touch some of the lawmakers who authorized it in a very personal way. That reality -- which stands in stark contrast to the popular stereotype of Congress -- will be embodied tonight by Sen. Jim Webb, the Virginia Democrat delivering the response to President Bush's State of the Union address. Webb's eldest son, Jimmy, is a Marine in the combat zone. He can't bring himself to talk about his son -- not even to the president -- but others speak eloquently of their loved ones' sacrifices." Sen. John McCain "faces the possibility that his youngest son, Jimmy, will go there this year." Other lawmakers with family in Iraq include Rep. Kenny Hulshof, Sen. Kit Bond and Rep. Duncan Hunter.

Poll Finds Bush Approval At 28%, With 59% Opposed To Iraq War. The CBS Evening News (1/22, lead story, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Opposition to President Bush's new Iraq strategy is growing in a new CBS News poll out tonight, and in Congress where more members of his own party are coming out against it. … Opposition to the war has driven the President's job approval rating to an all-time low, 28% on our CBS News poll." These numbers, added CBS, "are not good. And they come at a bad time for the President." CBS (Axelrod) added, "They come on the eve of the President's State of the Union address. And not only are his approval ratings at an all-time low, opposition to the war in Iraq is 59%, an all-time high."

Al Qaeda Mocks "Surge" Plan. The New York Times/AP (1/23, Press) reports, "Al Qaeda's deputy leader on Monday mocked…Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, challenging him to send the 'entire army' and vowing that insurgents would defeat them, according to a new videotape released by an American group that tracks messages from Al Qaeda." The group, the Washington-based SITE Institute, "said it had intercepted the video from Ayman al-Zawahri, which had not yet been posted on militant Islamist Web sites, where his messages usually appear. SITE, which assesses and analyzes intelligence related to terrorism, did not elaborate on how it had received the message."

ABC World News (1/22, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that in the tape, "Zawahiri criticizes President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq. And in remarks addressed to the American public he says, 'If you continue the policy of Bush and his gang, you will never even dream of peace.'" The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 3, :30, Couric, 7.66M) also noted Zawahiri "challenged the President to send the whole US Army, vowing the insurgents will defeat them."

Surge Expected To Curtail Violence In Short Term. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Ricks, 690K) reports, "The battle for Baghdad will start in mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods chosen by military strategists as being the least likely to offer stiff resistance, raising the odds of early success, according to military planners and officials familiar with the thinking of the incoming Iraq commander, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus." But "that could be followed by a sharp increase in violence as insurgents learn US and Iraqi tactics, military officials said." Pretraeus "plans to send all 17,500 additional US troops ordered by President Bush into Baghdad, regardless of whether Iraqi army units join the fight as planned, according to officials familiar with his thinking. Anticipating an uneven performance by the Iraqi army, military planners are advocating using American force and funding quickly to establish early victories, both in improving security and showing economic progress." Petraeus "will require his troops to operate and live among the population, hoping to safeguard security and economic gains for neighborhoods cleared of violence. Military experts say that violence could decrease through April and May but that once insurgents get a feel for US and Iraqi army tactics, a new 'fighting season' could begin in late spring -- triggering potential political problems for U.S. public support of the operation."

Petraeus Claims Iraqi Elections Created Instability. The Washington Post (1/23, A13, Ricks, 690K) reports Petraeus "believes that the US government has made a host of serious mistakes there, according to written testimony he submitted yesterday to the Senate Armed Services Committee. Among the errors he cites are inadequate planning for the occupation, failing to recognize the emergence of the insurgency, not having enough troops in certain areas and holding elections in such a way that they deepened Iraq's sectarian divisions." Petraeus is quoted as saying, "There was the feeling that elections would enhance the Iraqi sense of nationalism. Instead, the elections hardened sectarian positions as Iraqis voted largely based on ethnic and sectarian group identity."

Ahead Of US-Iraqi Security Push, Insurgents Continue Campaign of Violence. The AP (1/23, Gamel) reports, "A suicide bomber crashed his car into a central Baghdad market crowded with Shiites just seconds after another car bomb tore through the stalls where vendors were hawking DVDs and used clothing, leaving 88 dead Monday in the bloodiest attack in two months." The bombings, "along with a double bombing that killed 12 people in the town of Khalis, battered Shiites during one of their holiest festivals. The attacks were the latest in a renewed campaign of insurgent violence in advance of a US-Iraqi security operation."

ABC World News (1/22, lead story, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Iraq theater of war is getting evermore dangerous and new US troops soon to arrive in Iraq are coming onto a bloody stage. … It almost seems as if the attacks are timed to taunt President Bush."

The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 2, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With all the talk about the troop buildup, we want to show you what it is like on one of Baghdad's most violent days." CBS added that "based on today's attacks," US troops "have their work cut out for them." NBC Nightly News (1/22, lead story, 3:30, Boettcher, 9.87M) said the violence "provides a grim backdrop as US troops arrive here, more reinforcements" who "find that they are in the middle of a civil war."

The New York Times (1/23, Santora, 1.16M) reports that "in the past such Sunni aggression has been met by swift reprisals by Shiites, a cycle of violence that left some 34,000 Iraqis dead last year. Monday's bombings, directed so specifically at civilians, seemed intended to elicit a reprisal, much like the bombings in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City one day last fall, which killed 144 people." The Times adds, "Late Monday, a Sunni mosque in the Dora section of Baghdad was blown up. There were no reports of casualties." The Washington Post (1/23, A12, Partlow, Nouri, 690K),

Washington Times/AP (1/23, Salaheddin) and Los Angeles Times (1/23, Daragahi, 850K) also report the story.

Al Qaeda Claims Responsibility For Downing US Helicopter. The AP (1/23, El-Magd) reports, "An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed Monday that its fighters shot down an American military helicopter in a crash that killed 12 US soldiers. The US military has said the cause of the crash has not been determined."

US Soldiers Clearing Baghdad Serve As "Stationary Targets" For Militias. The New York Times (1/23, Santora, 1.16M) reports, "Two blocks from the new American outpost in Ghazaliya, one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, a fight was raging. … On Friday morning, it became an American fight, too, after a few rounds whizzed by Sgt. Sergej Michaud's head, and he and three other soldiers returned fire. The battle would rage for nearly an hour, with mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades exploding near the soldiers, who in turn laid down heavy fire, eventually driving the attackers away. Previously, that would have been the end of it, with the soldiers moving on to their next patrol area and eventually returning to their base. But this time, the Americans were staying, defending their new home in a neighborhood where the rule of law had been driven out by the reign of the gun." The Times describes this effort as "a test case for President Bush's new Baghdad security plan. … In the week since the Americans arrived, however, the troops have seen the truth of what their commanders warned in announcing the plan: it leaves Americans more exposed than ever, stationary targets for warring militias."

White House Praises Maliki's Move Against Sadr Militia. Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported, "It does appear that Prime Minister Maliki has taken to heart US criticism of his failure to crack down on the militia led by cleric Muqtada al Sadr. But even as the militia reduced some of its threatening public appearances there was major bloodshed today. … One military analyst said it is possible that Sunni insurgents are trying to strike a blow before more US forces arrive in the capital." Fox noted, "One Iraqi government official said that U.S. Intelligence reports convinced Maliki that the Mahdi army included death squads targeting Sunnis. The crackdown was a move welcomed by the White House." White House Spokesman Tony Snow: "You are seeing a clear signal that the Maliki government is very serious about addressing, on a nonsectarian basis, the problem of those who are trying to operate outside the law."

Sunni Sheik Declares War On Insurgency. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Perry, 850K) reports from Ramadi, Iraq, on "Sheik Sattar Bazeaa Fatikhan, [who] projects the aura of power and seriousness that comes to a man who has taken a stand. After Sunni insurgents killed his father and four of his brothers last year, Fatikhan declared war against the insurgency. He convened a summit of about a dozen prominent sheiks. From that meeting came a document called 'The Awakening,' in which Fatikhan persuaded all but one sheik to join him in opposition to the insurgency." Since then, "Fatikhan said, the sheiks have 'eliminated' a number of insurgents. U.S. officials regularly visit Fatikhan, seeking his counsel, showing him the kind of deference one might expect for a leading government official. ... For U.S. forces, Fatikhan's stand is a significant boost in a bitter fight with insurgents who, until recently, controlled large segments of Ramadi, the provincial capital." Army Col. Sean MacFarland "credits Fatikhan and other sheiks for an increase in police enrollment, a decrease in insurgent recruitment and new courage among Iraqi forces."

Insurgents Seize Baqouba's Mayor As US Officials Report Progress. The AP (1/23, Mroue) reports, "Many residents of Baqouba say they live hunkered down in cold, dark houses afraid to go out, that the once mixed Shiite-Sunni neighborhoods are riven by sectarian cleansing, that the police force has virtually collapsed." However, US and Iraqi military officials "paint a different portrait. They insist the city is not nearly as dangerous as 'rumors' put it. According to them, Baqouba is improving and violence is down. Events Monday seemed to contradict those assertions. A car bomb and mortar bombardment in nearby Khalis killed at least 12 people, and state television reported that gunmen in Baqouba proper attacked the mayor's office, ransacking the building and setting off explosive charges that damaged the structure. Police said the Sunni mayor was kidnapped, a report U.S. officials said they could not immediately confirm." Col. David W. Sutherland, 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, is quoted as saying "terrorists…would have you believe schools and markets are closed and people are afraid to go out of their homes. Again, in reality, markets are open with fruits, meat, and produce readily available."

The Washington Post (1/23, A12, Londono, Shammari, 690K) reports Maj. Brett G. Sylvia said, "Families are starting to move back into the area. A sense of normalcy is attempting to be reestablished in this area." However, "Minutes before the news conference began, armed men kidnapped the mayor of the provincial capital, Baqubah, blew up his office and stole six government cars, including three new Chevrolet police pickup trucks, officials in the province said. The near-simultaneous scenarios played out like a tale of two Iraqs, one inching toward stability, the other engulfed in chaos. After seizing Mayor Khalid al-Sanjari, one of the armed men grabbed a loudspeaker from a police car and taunted the chief of police, the officials said.

Suicide Bomber Kills 10 In Afghanistan Today. The AP (1/23, Shah) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a US military base in eastern Afghanistan on Tuesday, killing 10 people and wounding 14 others, an Afghan official said. The bomber approached a group of Afghan men who were waiting outside the base in the city of Khost, in Khost province, before triggering an explosive strapped to his chest." The provincial governor "said the men were daily workers, lining up to get into the base at the time of the blast. Suicide attacks have increased as Taliban militants intensify their insurgency against Afghan government forces and foreign troops."

AFP (1/23) also reports the blast, saying, "No one immediately claimed responsibility for the blast but suicide attacks are a hallmark of the Taliban-led insurgency that kicked off when the hardline Islamic movement was driven from power in 2001."

Suicide Bomber Killed Four In North Waziristan Yesterday. The New York Times (1/23, Khan, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "rammed his explosive-laden car into a military convoy near Mirali in the restive North Waziristan tribal region on Monday, killing 4 people and wounding 23, witnesses said. … The attack occurred at a checkpoint about a mile east of the town of Mirali when a joint convoy of the army and paramilitary was heading from a garrison in Bannu to Miramshah, the restive region's administrative headquarters."'

Pakistanis Say Omar Likely In Afghanistan. The AP (1/22) reports, "Taliban leader Mullah Omar is likely based in southern Afghanistan and leading the resurgent Islamic militia from there, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said Monday. A spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry said that Omar's exact whereabouts remain unknown." The ministry's "comments follow claims by Afghan officials that a captured spokesman for the Taliban militia told interrogators that Omar was living in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta and that he was protected by Pakistan's ISI intelligence service. ... Pakistan vehemently denies backing the militants."

US-Led Forces Kill Pakistani Soldier By Mistake. The AP (1/22, Jan) reports, "U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan mistakenly fired at a Pakistani border post and killed a soldier, Pakistan's military said Monday after lodging a protest over the death. A US military spokesman said four precision-guided bombs were dropped on four suspected militants who were firing rockets at a U.S. military outpost at Bermel in Afghanistan's Paktika province, near the Pakistani border. ... But the Pakistani military said in a statement the post that was hit is located near Shawal, a mountainous area close to the Afghan border in Pakistan's North Waziristan tribal region."

NYTimes Says Pakistan's Government "Perhaps Sponsoring" The Taliban. The New York Times (1/23, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "To learn why a resurgent Taliban is fighting American and NATO troops to a military draw in Afghanistan, you have to go to the frontier region on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. Our colleague, Carlotta Gall, did just that last month and what she learned led to a physical assault on her by Pakistani intelligence officials and five hours in custody for her photographer, Akhtar Soomro. … We now know why. Ms. Gall's reporting has determined that Quetta is an important rear base for the Taliban, and that Pakistani authorities are encouraging and perhaps sponsoring the cross-border insurgency. That is a role that Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, denies. But residents of the border area, opposition figures and Western diplomats point to specific cases of Pakistani involvement. Americans need to know more about this collusion and to demand better answers from General Musharraf."

IED "Jammers" Also Disrupt US Radio Communication. USA Today (1/23, Brook, 2.27M) reports the Pentagon "has launched an urgent effort to develop radio systems immune to the jamming signals that troops use to foil homemade bombs planted by insurgents in Iraq. The jammers, which block signals that detonate improvised explosive devices (IEDs), have become so powerful they can 'cause the loss of all communications' for U.S. troops, a Pentagon solicitation to contractors says. It calls for information on devices that will allow troops to use jammers and radios at the same time."

DOJ:

Ensign Mum On Reasons For US Attorney Dismissals. The Las Vegas Sun (1/23, Skolnik, Mascaro) reports, "The Justice Department briefed Nevada Republican Sen. John Ensign last month on plans to replace Nevada's top federal prosecutor, but Ensign has decided that whatever the reasons, the public need not know them." The Sun continues, "U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas is one of at least seven top federal prosecutors being removed by the Bush administration, five from other Western states. All were appointed by Bush. … As is true with Bogden, the reasons for the departures remain mysterious." The Sun adds, "Absent explanations, Democratic lawmakers and lawyers across the West are speculating. They wonder if the prosecutors pursued cases that displeased Washington, or if the Justice Department wants to choose replacements under a new Patriot Act provision that allows the appointments without the customary review by the U.S. Senate. … 'If you ask me if my suspicions are aroused, they are,' said Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif. Her state lost two U.S. attorneys. … During his five-year reign as the highest-ranking federal prosecutor in Nevada, Bogden has scored some notable successes. His office boosted firearms prosecutions, secured the convictions of dozens of violent gang members and oversaw the cases against four former Clark County commissioners convicted of taking bribes." The Sun notes, "Even defense lawyers, Bogden's frequent courtroom opponents, speak highly of his straightforward style and fair play. … So why did Bogden suddenly announce his resignation Wednesday, after days of speculation that he was forced out of office by the Justice Department? … Officials in Nevada and Washington, D.C., are only providing hints as to why he and the other prosecutors are leaving. … The sudden bloodletting involved U.S. attorneys up and down the West Coast, as well as New Mexico, and one in Arkansas. The new interim U.S. attorney in Arkansas had been a political operative who worked for powerful White House aide Karl Rove. … No potential replacements have yet been named for Bogden, although a Justice Department source confirmed that officials have talked to both Ensign and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid in recent days regarding a replacement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, SEC Officials Question Jobs In Apple Options Probe. Bloomberg (1/23, Gullo, Guglielmo) reports, "Apple Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs was questioned by U.S. government investigators about backdating of employee stock options grants at the company, lawyers familiar with the matter said." Bloomberg continues, "Jobs met with officials from the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department last week in San Francisco, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the interviews are confidential. The company said last month that it found 'no misconduct' by Jobs or current management after an internal investigation of the stock-option backdating." Bloomberg adds, "The meeting, which took place the same week Apple announced record sales of its best-selling iPod music player, shows the U.S. government is still seeking information about Jobs's role in the backdating even after the company's report clearing him and others, said Nell Minow, editor at the Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm in Portland, Maine. … 'It is after all the SEC's view on his culpability that matters, not the internal investigation at Apple,' Minow said. … The people wouldn't disclose specifics about what Jobs was asked, what he told investigators and whether there would be additional meetings."

Jobs Waited Months Before Filing Options Disclosure. The Washington Post (1/23, D1, Sipress) reports, "With federal prosecutors investigating the granting of stock options by Apple, the actions of its iconic chief executive, Steve Jobs, are being more closely examined." The Post continues, "A review of how Jobs handled his stock options from 2001 shows that he waited about two-thirds of a year to report the receipt of 7.5 million options that the company admitted last month were improperly backdated. The board meeting at which they were reportedly approved never took place." The Post adds, "The timing of Jobs's filing was not illegal and beat the deadline. But it broke with the practice common among other Apple officers and directors of submitting the report, in this case a Form 4, within weeks, not months. … Jobs filed his statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission in August 2002, reporting that he had received the stock options on Oct. 19, 2001. Apple now says the options were actually finalized in December 2001, when the value of the options was significantly less because of changes in the stock price. Jobs filed his personal disclosure about eight months later." The Post notes, "In contrast, three other directors who filed within days of Jobs had waited only four weeks to disclose their options. In fact, the filings of 53 other Form 4s by Apple officers and directors between the start of 1999 and late August 2002 -- when new disclosure requirements came into force -- took just under four weeks, on average. When Jobs received a previous grant of 10 million stock options in January 2000, he filed his Form 4 in just under three weeks."

US Attorney Shakeups Cloud Apple Probe. The California Recorder (1/23, Scheck) reports, "Two things set the investigation of Apple Inc. apart from the hundreds of other stock option backdating probes: the indispensability of the company's CEO, and the fact that while both in-house lawyers and HR staff were involved with options grants, it's the lawyers who are getting the most scrutiny." The Recorder continues, "With Apple's fortunes tightly linked to its leader, Silicon Valley titan Steve Jobs, anything seen as jeopardizing his role at the company strikes intense fear into stockholders. That helps explain why Jobs took the risky step last week of talking to federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers to convince them of his innocence. … But with turmoil in the U.S. Attorney's Office, and no joint defense agreement among potential targets of the investigation, the probe looks more uncertain now than at any time since it launched last fall." The Recorder adds, "Lead prosecutor Christopher Steskal announced Friday that he's leaving government for Fenwick & West. Earlier that week, his boss, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan was sacked, and has hired legal placement company MLegal to find him his next job. … Ryan's No. 2, Eumi Choi -- the other prosecutor on the Apple case -- has had her resume floating around Silicon Valley for weeks. … That means that every aspect of the probe -- including whether it even turns into a criminal case -- will remain uncertain until at least two key prosecutors are replaced."

Foundry Networks CEO To Remain Despite Role In Options Backdating. The San Jose Mercury News (1/23, Schwanhausser) reports, "Foundry Networks

said Monday that Chairman and Chief Executive Bobby Johnson Jr. will surrender his role as chairman -- but will stay on the board and continue to run the company -- even though he personally picked the dates for a 'substantial' number of tainted stock options." The News continues, "The Santa Clara company said Johnson was not advised that such practices could violate accounting rules and cause the company to overstate its profits. Foundry said Monday it faces a pretax accounting charge that could mount to as much as $205 million because of misdated options it gave directors, officers and rank-and-file employees from 2000 to 2003. … Johnson received no misdated options, the company said." The News adds, "Foundry, which makes computer networking hardware, also stripped Timothy D. Heffner of his title as chief financial officer. But it shifted him into a new executive job that has no accounting or financial responsibilities. … Foundry's case is noteworthy because of the similarities to the high-profile case involving Apple CEO Steve Jobs. Though Apple acknowledges that Jobs recommended favorable grant dates, the company said he did not understand the accounting implications. Unlike Johnson, Jobs received tainted options. But Apple said he did not benefit from the options, which he later exchanged for restricted stock. … Foundry's decision to keep two central players despite acknowledging their roles in the options abuses is both rare and risky, said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues. Most companies have fired or forced out implicated executives and directors, he said."

US Charges 13 In Alleged Foodservice Fraud. The AP (1/23, Gordon) reports, "Federal regulators have accused an additional 13 people of aiding an alleged massive accounting fraud at U.S. Foodservice Inc., a subsidiary of Dutch grocery retailer Ahold NV, in a scandal that brought the resignation of top executives and criminal probes in the United States and the Netherlands." The AP continues, "The Ahold affair was one of Europe's biggest accounting scandals, and the Dutch company skirted bankruptcy in 2003. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission in 2004 accused Ahold of fraudulently overstating sales by billions of dollars and fabricating hundreds of millions of dollars of earnings." The AP adds, "The civil charges filed last Thursday by the SEC bring to 30 the number of people the agency has accused of aiding the alleged fraud by signing false audit statements that enabled a $1 billion overstatement of Ahold's earnings in 2001-02. The SEC announced the new charges on Monday. … All 13 of those charged most recently in federal court in Washington were employees of or agents for vendor companies that supplied Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice, which sells food in bulk to restaurants and cafeterias. … Nine of the 13 have each agreed to pay a $25,000 civil fine to settle the SEC's allegations, which they neither admitted nor denied, the agency said. They are: Carl Allen, Donald Childers, John Crowder, Chris Jakubek, John King, Steve LeBarron, Patrick Penderghast, Frank Riggio and Richard Vecchia. … The cases remain pending against the other four, whose titles at the time were: Gary Bell, vice president for business development at Hunt-Wesson Foodservice; Joseph Grendys, the owner of Koch Poultry; Anthony Holohan, sales representative for C.F. Sauer Foods Inc., and Michael Smith, corporate accounts manager for Citrus World."

Report Finds Take Two Allowed Former CEO To Backdate Options. USA Today (1/23, 5B, Iwata) reports, "Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of Grand Theft Auto and other popular video games, failed to monitor stock-option grants, including a significant number that were backdated over a six-year period, according to an internal report released Monday by the company." USA continues, "The report found that Take-Two's compensation committee abandoned its responsibilities and allowed former CEO Ryan Brant 'to control and dominate the granting process' and engage in 'a pattern and practice of backdating options' from 1997 to 2003. .. Brant resigned as CEO five years ago and as chairman last October." USA adds, "The investigation, by the BDO Seidman accounting firm and the law firm Kasowitz Benson Torres & Friedman, found no evidence that Take-Two's current executives engaged in misconduct, or that the company's former or current directors 'engaged in willful misconduct or other dishonest acts.' … However, the report found that three former Take-Two executives — a former controller and two former chief financial officers that the report did not name — 'appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process' and declined to appear for interviews with investigators."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A17, Kingsbury) reports, "The New York-based videogame maker disclosed in July the Securities and Exchange Commission was investigating its options-granting process, and Take-Two said last month that independent investigators found improprieties in the company's granting processes. Take-Two's review began with the company's April 15, 1997 initial public offering. … The company noted the outside law firm which conducted the options review said three former executives who 'appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process, declined to appear for interviews' and limited to some extend the information collected. The trio was Take-Two's former controller, who was fired last month, and the two chief financial officers Larry Muller and James David Jr. The pair served in that post from 1999 through 2001. Take Two's filing with the SEC on Monday didn't disclose the officials' names."

The New York Times (1/23, News) reports, "The restatement will be the second time Take-Two has revised earnings to fix accounting irregularities. In 2005, the company paid a $7.5 million fine in settling a Securities and Exchange Commission suit over how it booked sales. Take-Two is among at least 200 companies that are being investigated on suspicion of changing the date of options grants to inflate their value. … 'They're very familiar with the S.E.C.,' said Paul-Jon McNealy, an analyst with American Technology Research in Boston who rates the shares neutral. 'It's not finished yet.'"

Suspects In Siemens Probe Finger Finance Head. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Crawford, Esterl) reports, "Two key suspects in a fraud investigation roiling Siemens AG have told German prosecutors that Chief Financial Officer Joe Kaeser has known for years about an alleged scheme to pay bribes to win overseas telecommunications contracts, according to witness statements reviewed by The Wall Street Journal." The Journal continues, "One suspect also told prosecutors that two other senior executives at the German conglomerate knew since at least early 2005 about the alleged bribes-for-business scheme: current management board member Rudi Lamprecht and Lothar Pauly, who headed the telecom division before leaving the company in late 2005." The Journal adds, "The revelations come at a sensitive time for top managers at Siemens, who have been fending off criticism ahead of an annual holders' meeting Thursday that they didn't do enough to stop corruption. Evidence of wrongdoing could cause some countries to ban Siemens from participating in big infrastructure projects that generate much of its revenue. … The investigation also could complicate the conglomerate's efforts to jettison its telecom business, merging much of it into a venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland. The testimony alleges that bribes took place in Siemens's wireless-telecom business, and weren't confined to the fixed-line unit, which was the original focus of the criminal investigation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

IG Report Criticizes FBI Response To Foley Emails. The AP (1/23, Margasak) reports, "The FBI should have acted to protect teenage House pages when it initially learned last July that Rep. Mark Foley had sent disturbing e-mails to a former page," according to a review released yesterday by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine. Fine's report also "said that bureau spokesmen wrongly asserted that the decision was influenced by a congressional watchdog group's failure to provide information missing from the e-mails. … 'We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the Congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley,' Fine reported." The AP adds, "The inspector general, however, found no misconduct by FBI officials, who at the time were aware only of e-mails to a former Louisiana page that were not sexually explicit and gave no indication of criminal activity."

The Miami Herald/McClatchy (1/23, Clark) reports the FBI "should have interviewed the page or alerted the House page program or, 'at the very least,' told the whistle-blower agency that provided it with the messages that it was declining to investigate, said the 31-page report." The Herald adds, "The FBI, in a statement issued late Monday, noted that the inspector general's report concluded that the agency had 'acted within the range of its discretion' in not opening a criminal investigation. And it noted that the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia later reviewed the same messages 'and agreed that no further investigation was warranted.'"

With the exception of the Washington Times (1/23, Seper, 88K), which reports the story under the more positive headline "No Misconduct Found In FBI Decision On Foley," other news coverage of Fine's review takes a negative tone toward the FBI, echoing the AP and McClatchy reports. USA Today (1/23, Johnson, 2.27M) titles its story "FBI Should've Followed Up On Foley's E-Mails," noting, "In a written response, the FBI said it would review its internal policies. But the bureau said Foley's most explicit communications with pages were not part of its initial evaluation of the case. The FBI said internal 'misunderstandings' contributed to the release of inaccurate information to reporters." However, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington Executive Director Melanie Sloan "said the government's release of inaccurate information amounted to a 'coverup' of the FBI's 'shocking inaction.'"

Under the headline "FBI Faulted For Inaction In Foley Scandal," the Washington Post (1/23, A4, Eggen, 690K) reports that after the scandal broke, "Several officials at the FBI and Justice Department" said to "reporters that the messages supplied by CREW had been 'heavily redacted' and that the group had refused to provide further information. Fine's review found, however, that the only thing removed from the messages was the identity of the person to whom the communications had been forwarded" and "that a chronology prepared by the FBI's Washington Field Office contained inaccuracies that were likely repeated to the press." The Post notes, "The FBI, in a prepared statement, attributed the erroneous statements about CREW to 'inaccurate information' that led to 'misunderstandings on the part of FBI and DOJ spokespersons.'"

Under the headline "FBI: We Flubbed Foley E-mails," ABC News' The Blotter (1/22, Ryan, Ross) noted, "In effect, the report finds the FBI's inaction contributed to the failure of officials to detect Foley's inappropriate behavior, which eventually led to his resignation when ABC News revealed more sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages to current and former pages. While finding no official misconduct on the part of FBI officials, the inspector general said 'the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face' to have warranted follow-up steps." The Palm Beach Post (1/23, Crowley) reports, "The supervisory special agent for the Public Corruption Squad told Fine that after reading the e-mails, he thought, 'What a freak,' but he decided they did not fall into his jurisdiction. He passed them to Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity. … The agent in charge of Cyber Crimes called the e-mails 'odd' but also 'did not see any evidence of wrongdoing,' Fine said. … She told Fine that the e-mails, which were not sexually explicit, were 'not the job of the FBI. This is a parental job.'"

Under the headline "Report Faults FBI Handling Of Foley Case," the Los Angeles Times (1/23, Schmitt, 850K) reports at the end of its story, CREW's Sloan "said: 'Not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming' the advocacy group. The FBI said it would study the report. 'The FBI shares the [inspector general's] interest in ensuring that information regarding potential criminal activity is evaluated objectively and in conformance with established policies and practices,' the bureau said in a statement. 'Accordingly, the FBI will carefully examine the … review for any changes to existing policies or procedures that may be warranted.'"

CNN.com (1/22), CBS News.com (1/22, Lambidakis), Government Executive (1/22, Mandel) and Bloomberg (1/23, Roland) similarly report on Fine's analysis, noting the yesterday's FBI statement in response. CNN's The Situation Room (1/22, Costello) and Fox News' Special Report with Brit Hume (1/22) also briefly noted Fine's report.

Boston Herald Says FBI "Flubbed" Investigation. Under the headline "FBI Flubbed Foley Probe," the Boston Herald (1/23, 184K) editorializes, "The Department of Justice yesterday concluded that the FBI should have investigated Foley and the inappropriate e-mails he had sent to a former House page when the agency was informed of them back in July." The Herald adds, "It appears that like everyone else tainted by this scandal, the FBI passed the buck until Foley resigned and the sordid details were reported by the media. Now the new Congress has revamped the board that oversees the page program and has pledged regular meetings. But unless every agency, every individual with an interest in protecting these young people understands their duty, that will be of little comfort.

Libby Trial To Begin Today After Arduous Jury Selection. Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported, "Lawyers in the trial of former White House aide Scooter Libby wrapped up the first stage of jury selection. It has not been easy to find an unbiased panel of 36 people in Washington D.C., from which the final jury can be chosen." Libby's lawyers have "spent a week trying to find jurors whose views of the administration or the war in Iraq would not interfere with their ability to render a fair verdict. … Though it is unusual to ask potential jurors about their political views, much of the questioning has focused on Iraq, especially the decision to go to war and the reasons for it, which are an inescapable aspect of this case."

The Washington Post (1/23, A4, Goldstein, 690K) reports the jury is "a largely apolitical, educated group. … The nine women and three men selected for the jury -- as well as four alternates -- are scheduled to hear Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald and one of Libby's attorneys, Theodore V. Wells Jr., lay out opposing portrayals of the celebrated case in opening statements today. Over the next four to six weeks, testimony in the case will expose the inner workings of the Bush White House shortly after the Iraq war began and confidential conversations between well-known journalists and their sources in the administration."

The New York Times (1/23, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "In addition to the 12 jurors, Judge Reggie M. Walton seated four alternates to replace any of the 12 who may fall ill or have other problems. All 16 jurors will hear the case, unaware who are alternates, to ensure that they pay attention. The lawyers on both sides and reporters covering the case do know which jurors are which. … The jury includes a former reporter for The Washington Post who said his editor was Bob Woodward, a Post journalist who is expected to be a witness in the trial. The former Post reporter also said that until recently he was a neighbor of Tim Russert of NBC News, who is also expected to be a witness."

The New York Times' guest columnist Stacy Schiff (1/23) writes, "It is true that what began as a search for a leak ended — after much collateral damage — with an indictment for a lie. At this juncture it can be difficult to grasp what, precisely, is on trial. Some of us seem viscerally to wish something else were."

GOP Lawmakers Seek DOJ Polygraph Of Berger Over 9/11 Documents. Fox News (1/23) reports, The Justice Department should administer a polygraph test to former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger to find out what documents he took from the National Archives in 2002 and 2003, Rep. Tom Davis wrote in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dated Monday." Fox continues, "Davis, ranking Republican on the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, is leading a group of 18 lawmakers who say the Justice Department has been 'remarkably incurious' about Berger's decision to remove documents relating to the Sept. 11 commission's inquiry into his role in helping prevent terror attacks during the Clinton administration. … 'It is extraordinarily important that the Justice Department avail itself of its rights under the plea agreement and administer a polygraph examination to Mr. Berger to question him about the extent of his thievery. This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead up to the terrorist attacks on the United States,' Davis wrote. … The letter was signed by all Republican members of Congress." Fox adds, "Berger admitted to taking documents on two of the four occasions he went to the National Archives to bone up on his responses for the Sept. 11 commission on his inquiry into how intelligence and law enforcement communities failed to prevent the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks on the United States. He said he hid some of them at a construction site near the archives building in Washington. … Berger agreed to take a polygraph test as part of a plea deal reached in September 2005. As part of the guilty plea, he was also sentenced to 100 hours of community service, two years probation, three years of lost security clearance and a $50,000 fine plus court costs. … At the time of the report, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department 'has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter.'"

FNC Special Report with Brit Hume (1/22, 6:16 p.m.) broadcasted, "Virginia Republican Congressman Tom Davis was the ranking member of the House Ethics Committee has asked Alberto Gonzales to order a lie detector test promptly for Sandy Berger. The lawmakers remind the agreement that Berger who pleaded guilty of taking high the cost by dark documents from the National Archives had entered a plea, but the test was never administered. It is essential to National security to find out if he's hiding anything else about the case."

State Department Official Sentenced To Prison In Classified Documents Case. The Washington Post (1/23, A3, Markon, 690K) reports, "A former high-level State Department official was sentenced to a year in prison yesterday for keeping more than 3,500 classified documents at his Fairfax County home and concealing his relationship with a Taiwanese intelligence agent. Prosecutors said Donald W. Keyser possessed far more unauthorized classified documents than any government employee ever prosecuted by the Justice Department." The Post adds, "The sentencing did little to resolve the lingering mystery surrounding the downfall of Keyser, which stunned the Washington diplomatic establishment. When he was first charged in September 2004, the FBI said he had passed documents to Taiwanese agents during covert meetings in the Washington area. But court papers filed with Keyser's guilty plea in December 2005 did not mention passing any documents, and law enforcement and diplomatic sources said at the time that the case did not involve espionage but rather a government employee who became careless."

The AP (1/23, Barakat) reports, "At his sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court, Keyser admitted to egregiously bad judgment in striking up a personal relationship with 35-year-old Isabelle Cheng, a known intelligence officer with Taiwan's National Intelligence Bureau whom he first met in 2002. But Keyser rejected any accusation that he was acting as an agent of Taiwan or that he compromised U.S. interests." The AP notes, "Prosecutors never charged Keyser with disclosing classified information to Taiwan, but it was clear from Monday's hearing that they remain suspicious of his activities. Court records indicate that Keyser failed polygraph tests when he was quizzed about a secret trip he took to Taiwan in September 2003 to meet Cheng." The New York Sun (1/23, Gerstein) adds, "Keyser's sentencing was delayed repeatedly after prosecutors accused him of failing to keep his promise to cooperate in debriefings with the FBI."

"Girls Gone Wild" Producer Sentenced, Fined. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Hoffman) reports, "The community service is piling up for 'Girls Gone Wild' mogul Joe Francis. … The producer of racy videos featuring young — and often naked — women was sentenced today to 200 hours of community service over two years by a federal judge in Los Angeles and was placed on two years probation for failing to adequately document the ages of his subjects. The amount of time was double what Francis' lawyers had sought." The Times continues, "The heavier-than-expected sentence is the second time that a federal judge has come down hard in sentencing Francis. In December, in Panama City, Fla., a federal judge sentenced Francis' company Mantra Films Inc. to serve 32 hours of monthly community service for 30 months. … The sentencing stems from a plea agreement Francis made with the Department of Justice in September, when he admitted to shooting underage women in his videos and pleaded guilty to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws. … Those laws govern the way in which producers of adult material document the ages of performers in sexually explicit videos and are intended to hinder the sexual exploitation of children. … In addition, Francis has greed to pay $500,000 in fines in California, with his company paying an additional $1.6 million in fines in Florida in a related case."

Justices Strike Down California Sentencing Law. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Savage, 850K) reports the U. Supreme Court yesterday "struck down a part of California's 30-year-old sentencing law, which allows judges to add several years to a criminal's prison term. The ruling could mean new sentencing hearings for several thousand state prisoners who were recently given longer terms. If their sentences are still being appealed, they can take advantage of today's ruling." But "the decision does not necessarily mean they will get lighter sentences. Indeed, the Supreme Court's interest was not in whether prison terms are too long or too short, but rather how they are decided." The New York Times (1/23, Steinhauer, 1.16M), in an analysis titled "Ruling's Effect On California Inmates Is Probably Limited," makes the same point.

The court made its ruling after a 6-3 split. USA Today (1/23, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports that dissenting from the majority ruling were Justices Anthony Kennedy, Stephen Breyer and Samuel Alito. The New York Times (1/23, Greenhouse, 1.16M) says the decision "will require the California courts to reconsider thousands of sentences as the Legislature contemplates its options for amending the statute to meet the justices' objections. While no other state is directly affected, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's forcefully worded majority opinion demonstrated that the Roberts court is committed to carrying out the full implications of the revolution in criminal sentencing that the court began seven years ago in Apprendi v. New Jersey."

The Washington Post (1/23, A10, Barnes, 690K) reports Alito "argued that California's law met the standards the court had set for the federal system. 'The California sentencing law that the court strikes down today is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect' from the remedy the court offered in 2005, Alito wrote. From the beginning, Kennedy and Breyer have opposed the court's resistance to systems that allow judicial discretion."

The Legal Times (1/23, Mauro) reports, "The 6-3 ruling in California v. Cunningham may throw into uncertainty a segment of recent sentences imposed in California under the state's 1977 sentencing law. … 'California has some work to do, but it should not cause havoc in the courts,' says Stanford Law School professor Jeffrey Fisher, who wrote a brief in the case for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and is a key strategist in challenges to sentencing laws. Fisher said defendants on direct review should get a 'fresh look' at their sentences as a result of the ruling Monday." The Times adds, "The decision also signals that the newly constituted Roberts Court is committed to the Apprendi line of cases, which, since 2000, have recalibrated the balance between judges and juries in the sentencing process and upended both state and federal sentencing laws. In Apprendi v. New Jersey, the Court held that any fact that increases a sentence beyond certain parameters set forth in the sentencing statute must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt."

The AP (1/23, Sherman) reports, "It is the latest in a series of high court rulings over the past seven years that limit judges' discretion in sentencing defendants. The court has held repeatedly that a judge may not increase a defendant's sentence based on factors that were not determined by a jury. … 'This court has repeatedly held that, under the Sixth Amendment, any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by the jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence,' Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the court, referring to an article in the U.S. Constitution. … Several states have changed their sentencing laws to require prosecutors to prove to a jury aggravating factors that could lead to longer sentences."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/23, 850K) writes, "Much as Californians may resent this ruling, which comes in a heinous case and could potentially trigger challenges to thousands of sentences, we should have seen it coming. … Like its previous recent decisions on judicial sentencing, the ruling leaves both legislatures and judges considerable leeway. Legislatures can still establish minimum and maximum sentences, and judges (if state law allows) can choose a particular sentence based on characteristics of the perpetrator, including previous convictions." But "it is clearer than ever that if sentencing depends on the particular facts of the crime, then it is up to the jury, not the judge, to make that call."

Oregon Prison Official Allegedly Took Bribes From Contractors. The Oregonian (1/23, Green, 318K) reports, "Federal agents found more than $450,000 in cash in the home and safety deposit box of an Oregon prison official accused of taking bribes from companies that sell food for inmates' meals and snacks. Farhad 'Fred' Monem, who earns $75,500 a year as the food service administrator for the Oregon Department of Corrections, was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his home and office Jan. 10. A federal judge Friday unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme and detail what agents discovered during their searches." The Oregonian notes, "No charges have been filed against Monem or others allegedly involved. Federal prosecutors declined to discuss a timeline for arrests in the bribery scheme, which they allege included Monem's wife, Karen, and officials from food distributors and brokers in California, New York and Maryland."

Opening Arguments Made At Coke Formula Theft Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/23, Stanford, 379K) reports, "Prosecutors opened their case in the Coke secrets trial Monday by vowing to prove that former secretary Joya Williams conspired with two accomplices to try to sell product samples and confidential documents for more than $1 million. 'This case is about greed and poor choices,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Chartash. But Williams' defense attorney, Janice Singer, said her client was taken advantage of by two lying ex-cons. She said Williams copied and took home various work materials for innocent reasons and never intended for them to fall into the hands of the alleged accomplices." WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/22, Shirek, King) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, Chartash "showed the jury surveillance photos of Joya Williams at her desk at Coke's headquarters in Atlanta last year -- taken after the FBI began investigating her -- showing Williams filling her personal bag with company documents, and with bottles of brand new Coca-Cola drinks that were in development."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/23, Weber) reports Williams "was angry at her employer for not treating her well and hatched a plan to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker to sell to rival PepsiCo Inc., a co-defendant testified Monday. Edmund Duhaney, "who pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to testify, told jurors that…Williams said the documents and product samples -- which include information about the company's new coffee-infused drink, Coca-Cola Blak -- could be worth a lot of money to a competitor. 'She made a statement, "This happens all the time in corporate America" -- that Pepsi, the rival company, would be interested in this,' Duhaney said, recalling an April 2006 meeting with Williams and another co-defendant, Ibrahim Dimson."

Cunningham Probe Spurs Questions On House Subpoena Response. The Hill (1/23, Crabtree) reports, "A flurry of subpoenas issued late last year to three powerful House committees and two staffers are raising new questions about House policies on document retention as well as internal House rules governing response to subpoenas. A U.S. district court in San Diego sent subpoenas to the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees late in the year, according to notices in the Dec. 27 and Jan. 4 editions of the Congressional Record. Elizabeth Phillips, an Appropriations staffer, and Rebecca Kuhn, who formerly worked as ex-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham's (R-Calif.) executive assistant, were also subpoenaed to testify, according to letters they submitted to then-House Speaker Dennis Hastert as required by House rules. … The U.S. attorney's office in San Diego first requested thousands of pages of documents from the panels last spring through a letter to the House general counsel. The subsequent subpoenas are an indication that federal prosecutors were concerned late last year that the committees were not voluntarily handing over the previously requested files, which, according to media reports, include classified documents relating to secret CIA contracts and a 59-page classified report into Cunningham's activities produced last fall by an investigator working on an internal probe for the House Intelligence panel."

Judge Reduces Sentence For Former Michigan School Official. The Macomb (MI) Daily (1/23, Hotts) reports, "Disgraced educator John Gardiner was placed in a wheelchair to be returned to prison Monday after a judge refused a plea for home confinement but did slice five months off Gardiner's original sentence." The Daily continues, "Gardiner, the former superintendent of East Detroit Public Schools, had sought a reduced sentence for his conviction in what has been called the largest public corruption scandal in Macomb County history. … However, U.S. District Court Judge Patrick Duggan issued a new sentence of 41 months in a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va., reduced from the original sentence of up to 46 months for convictions on racketeering and extortion. … 'Dr. Gardiner has maintained he is not guilty and he has the right to feel that way, but a jury has found him guilty,' Duggan said." The Daily adds, "Monday's sentencing hearing was ordered after the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Duggan made an error at Gardiner's original sentencing because of confusion over mandatory sentencing guidelines. … At Monday's hearing, it was possible for the judge to add another year onto the original sentence. Instead, Duggan's new calculation resulted in a range of 37 to 46 months, and he opted for five fewer months. … Gardiner, who has been in prison for 22 months, will likely now be released from prison in March of 2008 instead of August 2008." The Daily notes, "The 74-year-old Gardiner was among 20 people named in a 35-count indictment handed down by the U.S. Justice Department. They were charged with accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts, vacations, cash, and home improvements financed by contractor William Hudson Jr. … In return, Gardiner and others helped arrange lucrative contracts for school bond work to Hudson, who also is in prison for his part in the scandal."

CDC Adviser Arrested On Public Indecency Charges. The AP (1/23) reports, "A prominent public health expert who is a top adviser to federal health agencies was arrested on suspicion of public indecency in an airport men's room. Dr. Hugh H. Tilson, 67, was arrested Jan. 16 at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport after a plainclothes police officer said he saw Tilson masturbating at a urinal while watching other men urinate. … Tilson recently co-chaired a task force advising the Atlanta-based federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on setting agency priorities and goals. He was visiting Atlanta last week for a senior leadership retreat with CDC Director Julie Gerberding and others."

Former Connecticut Church Official Pleads Guilty In Child Pornography Case. The AP (1/23, Christoffersen) reports from Bridgeport, CT, "The former music director of a church where former President Bush once worshipped pleaded guilty on Monday to possessing child pornography." The AP continues, "Robert F. Tate, 64, of Greenwich, admitted possessing between 150 and 300 pornographic images of children, some engaging in sexually explicit conduct. Prosecutors said some children in the images were younger than 12 years old. … Tate was the longtime music director of Christ Church in Greenwich, where former President George H.W. Bush attended while growing up. Funeral services for his parents, Prescott Bush Sr. and Dorothy Walker Bush, were held there." The AP adds, "At his last hearing in December, President Bush's aunt and other members of the church attended to support Tate. .. .Tate faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced April 12."

Judge To Review Federal Probe Of Pellicano Documents Leak. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "A federal judge Monday said she would personally review the government's investigation into the disclosure of confidential documents in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping case, amid claims that the latest leak was triggered by a previously unreported FBI interview of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian. U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer's decision followed an acrimonious hearing at which attorneys for Pellicano and for Kerkorian's longtime attorney, Terry Christensen, complained that the leaks to the New York Times had severely hurt their clients' rights to a fair trial. The defense attorneys also pointedly questioned why authorities had not identified the source of the leaks after nine months of investigation." Christensen lawyer Terree Bowers "suggested that the government, fearing that the tapes might be ruled inadmissible, had decided to leak them," but US Attorney's office spokesman Thom Mrozek "said he would not comment on what he called 'the latest conspiracy theory being floated by people associated with the defense.'"

Pellicano Attorney Seeks Subpoenas Of NYTimes Reporters. The New York Times (1/23, Seelye) reports, "A defense lawyer in the case involving Anthony Pellicano, the Hollywood private eye accused of masterminding a long-running wiretapping ring, called yesterday for two New York Times reporters to be subpoenaed to find out who leaked them recordings of conversations and other evidence in the case." The Times continues, "On Jan. 11, The Times printed excerpts of 33 recorded conversations that Mr. Pellicano had with Terry N. Christensen, a lawyer for Kirk Kerkorian, the billionaire Hollywood mogul. The newspaper also put audio excerpts of the conversations on its Web site. Mr. Christensen has also been charged in connection with the wiretapping." The Times adds, "In papers filed last week in federal court, Mr. Christensen called on the judge, Dale S. Fischer of United States District Court, to force the two reporters, David M. Halbfinger and Allison Hope Weiner, to reveal their sources. … In a hearing yesterday in Los Angeles, Terree A. Bowers, the lawyer representing Mr. Christensen, told the judge that the reporters might be 'criminally liable' for their actions. He said in a telephone interview after the hearing that he told the judge that their posting of the conversations on the Internet violated his client's presumption of innocence. … The judge asked Mr. Bowers to spell out specifically what relief he is seeking and how he would like her to deal with the case. In a statement, Catherine J. Mathis, a spokeswoman for The New York Times Company, said: 'We believe it is critically important for reporters to be able to protect their confidential sources of information and will continue to advocate for their ability to do so.'"

Probe Finds Suspect Was Handcuffed Before Shooting LAPD Officer. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Blankstein, Winton) reports, "A suspect who was handcuffed by police during an early morning arrest in the Westlake district managed to reach for a gun hidden in his pants and open fire, seriously wounding a veteran officer, several LAPD sources familiar with the investigation told The Times today." The Times continues, LAPD Rampart Division training Officer Andy Taylor, 37, was rushed by ambulance to Cedars-Sinai Medical Center in Los Angeles, where he was treated for a gunshot wound to his shoulder and chest. … The 12-year veteran, who was listed in stable condition, also was hit in his bullet-proof vest. Chief William J. Bratton said that the officer could be released from the hospital as early as Tuesday." The Times adds, "Bratton said he would withhold comment on the specifics of the shooting until he is presented with a full preliminary briefing by investigators with the LAPD's Force Investigation Division. … Department officials said Taylor was one of several officers who responded to an apartment building in the 600 block of Coronado Street about 5 a.m. today after a report of an assault there. .. .According to the LAPD sources, who spoke to The Times on the condition on anonymity, the officers questioned several men in a second floor residence at the multi-unit complex."

Former Mississippi County Official Pleads Guilty To Katrina Kickbacks. The AP (1/23) reports, "Former Bolivar County (MS) Administrator Adrian Brown pleaded guilty Monday to receiving a cash kickback from Hurricane Katrina relief funds." Brown "remains charged with witness tampering," although he "was not taken into custody and will continue under his current $20,000 bond and supervised release until sentencing." The AP notes, "Brown was arrested by FBI agents at his office on June 6 for requesting and accepting kickbacks from David Spikes, as well as witness tampering. Spikes, who owns Nternet

Solutions in Pace, was hired to develop and maintain a Web site for the county to assist displaced Katrina residents who evacuated there. … The indictment also charged that Brown used intimidation and threats to try to influence the testimony of Spikes' wife, Monique Spikes, to a federal grand jury."

Three In Louisiana Plead Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The Lafayette (LA) Daily Advertiser (1/23, Jackson) reports, "Two Morgan City residents and one New Iberia man pled guilty Monday after attempting to defraud FEMA. … Richard Hufnagel, 40, of New Iberia, admitted to applying for emergency benefits following Hurricane Katrina, claiming that he lived in a warehouse in New Orleans during the storm. Hufnagel received $55,000 in FEMA aid for flood damage he claimed to have suffered. … Morgan City resident Shannon Sylvester, 19, received $2,000 in disaster relief funds shortly after Hurricane Katrina in 2005, claiming she had to evacuate her New Orleans residence as a result of the storm. … Ashley Clark, 22, also of Morgan City, received $4,665 worth of FEMA aid after filing a claim for damages done to her residence as a result of Hurricane Rita."

Mississippi Woman Sentenced To Probation For FEMA Fraud. WLBT-TV Jackson (1/22) reported on its Web site, "A Ridgeland woman pled guilty and was sentenced for FEMA fraud related to Hurricane Katrina Monday. Tabuthia Bell was sentenced to three years of probation with forty hours of community service. Bell was accused of submitting a false claim to FEMA for Hurricane Katrina disaster assistance funds."

Immigrants Said To Keep Cockfighting Culture Alive. USA Today (1/23, 3A, Bazar) reports, "Immigration has helped fuel the popularity of cockfighting, a common practice in some countries that is illegal in most of the USA." USA continues, "Statistics are hard to come by, but law enforcement officials and animal rights groups in places such as Denver, Houston and Santa Barbara County, Calif., say they've seen a surge. Others question whether there's just more attention on the activity because police are cracking down. … Cockfighting is illegal in every state except Louisiana and New Mexico. … 'It's definitely on the rise,' says Wayne Pacelle, head of the Humane Society of the United States. Pacelle says the Internet has helped connect cockfighters. He also cites increased involvement of immigrants from countries such as Mexico and the Philippines. 'It's legal in a lot of places where there's significant immigration to the United States,' he says. 'You're seeing participation from people of those nations.'" USA notes, Mark Kumpf of the National Animal Control Association acknowledges there can be a cultural link. He doesn't think cockfighting is on the rise, though. What's up, he says, is enforcement. … Police are aggressively busting cockfighting operations, from fights to bird smuggling, because crimes such as drug dealing, assault and gambling often are associated, he says."

Maryland Couple, Company Settles Federal Contracting Fraud Charges. The AP (1/23) reports, "A Potomac (MD) couple and the company they run will pay $1.55 million to settle allegations that they submitted false claims on federal contracts, a case that involved a whistle blower who worked for the company." The AP continues, "Robert Yin and Karen Kaufman-Yin, along with their Bethesda-based company COSMOS Corp., allegedly submitted the claims for contracts with the National Science Foundation, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Justice Department." The AP adds, "Yin is the president of COSMOS while Kaufman-Yin is the vice president and chief financial officer. The company provides research, analysis and other services to government agencies and private organizations. … According to federal prosecutors, COSMOS improperly charged government contracts for costs that dealt with the company's operations, including marketing, bid proposals and administrative labor. The company is also accused of shifting labor costs from private contracts to its government contracts."

Wrongful Imprisonment Case Against FBI Nears End. The AP (1/23, Lavoie) reports from Boston, "Two men who spent decades in prison for a 1965 gangland slaying they didn't commit wept on the witness stand as they recounted what the years behind bars did to them and their families. … But Justice Department lawyers made it clear Monday that theirs will not be the kind of emotional case presented by the men who are suing the government for wrongful imprisonment and malicious prosecution." The AP continues, Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said the government will not offer testimony from a single live witness. Instead, the government will rely on depositions from several people involved in the 1965 murder case. … The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and two other men who died in prison after they were convicted in the 1965 killing of Edward 'Teddy' Deegan. They say the FBI cannot be held liable for the results of a separate state investigation." The AP adds, "Attorneys for the men, however, say the FBI knew the men had been framed for Deegan's killing, but hid evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men to protect a Mafia hitman and FBI informant, Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza. … Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the

Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza. … The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi."

NYTimes Calls For FDA Regulation Of Tobacco Products. The New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Any doubts that the tobacco industry has surreptitiously raised the nicotine content of cigarettes should be laid to rest by a study from researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health. They confirmed last year's discovery of the nicotine increase by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health and went on to identify how the tobacco companies designed their cigarettes to accomplish this." Their "continued bad behavior makes it imperative for Congress to grant the Food and Drug Administration the authority to regulate tobacco products, including the power to reduce nicotine levels and demand extensive data from the companies."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mississippi Voting Intimidation Case Resumes. The AP (1/23) reports from Jackson, MS, "The federal trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County entered its second week Monday with more testimony anticipated from whites who claim their right to participate in the election process has been violated." The AP continues, "Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. … Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population." The AP adds, "On Friday, two white witnesses said Brown had threatened to challenge their right to cast ballots in the party's 2003 primary. In addition, an unsuccessful white candidate for Noxubee County supervisor told the federal judge he was unfairly treated by the defendant as to how absentee ballots were counted in a close race against the eventual black winner. … Federal prosecutors want U.S. District Judge Tom Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped. … Cheri Anne Eaves and Kari Hardy testified on Friday that Brown accused them of being disloyal Democrats and had threatened to try to deny their right to vote in the 2003 Democratic primary. Brown allegedly had put them on a list he circulated of 174 white voters he would challenge as ineligible to participate in Democratic Party election because they were closet Republicans."

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/23, Gates) reports, "A black Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee official said she was going to follow her own law in counting absentee ballots during a 2003 primary election, a white candidate's son testified Monday. … 'I was not allowed to make challenges,' said Richard Heard, whose father was a candidate for county sheriff." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters. … A trial on the lawsuit is in its second week in U.S. District Court in Jackson. District Judge Tom S. Lee will decide the case. … The Justice Department is still presenting its side." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Wil Colom, attorney for the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and Chairman Ike Brown, said his clients believe the complaints are imagined. Colom said most of the charges regarding election discrepancies are normal election errors and miscues that happen every year in every county in America. … Heard testified that he remembered seeing one absentee ballot where the signature didn't match the name on the application and questioned pollworkers about it. … But Heard said the woman in charge at the polls eventually said 'We aren't going by state law but my law today.' … Heard said he also was concerned that an absentee ballot he notarized for a white voter was rejected."

Unanimous Supreme Court Strikes Down Prisoner Lawsuits' Hurdles. The New York Times (1/23, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "ruled unanimously that a federal appeals court had overstepped its bounds by making prisoner lawsuits even harder to file than Congress intended. The barriers the lower court had put in place 'cannot fairly be viewed' as a correct interpretation of the law, the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said for the court. Unless Congress explicitly provided otherwise, Chief Justice Roberts explained, courts should apply to prisoners' lawsuits the same procedural rules they apply to any other lawsuit and 'should generally not depart from the usual practice under the federal rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns.'"

The AP (1/23) reports, "In an opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts, the court overturned procedural obstacles in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that led to dismissal of civil rights complaints brought by three Michigan inmates. … The appeals court in Cincinnati covers the states of Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky. Federal courts in the circuit allowed just 18 of nearly 500 inmate civil rights suits to proceed, a recent American Civil Liberties Union study concluded, making the circuit the most restrictive in the country for such lawsuits." The AP adds, "The Republican-controlled Congress passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act in 1995, seeking to slow a flood of federal lawsuits. … The law requires prisoners to go through a lengthy administrative grievance process before they may sue in court. … The law worked – too well, according to critics. Nearly 42,000 civil rights petitions were filed in 1995 before the law took effect. Five years later, the number was down to 26,000, according to the Justice Department. … 'Today's decision will at least help to ensure that the courthouse door is not completely shut,' ACLU legal director Steven Shapiro said in a statement."

Long Beach, CA, Uneasily Awaits Hate-Crime Verdict. The Washington Post (1/23, A3, Geis) reports from Long Beach, CA, "A crowd of black teenagers and three young white women stood on a street corner on Halloween night. A male voice cried, 'I hate [expletive] white people!' The crowd surged, and someone cracked one of the whites in the head with a skateboard, dropping her to the ground. That much is not in dispute. … Who is responsible and how this could happen in the port city of Long Beach, which prides itself on its diversity and tolerance, has been the subject of arguments in court, civic forums and private living rooms here ever since." The Post continues, "Ten defendants -- nine female and one male, ages 12 to 18 -- were charged with assault for allegedly beating and kicking the women, giving one 12 facial fractures and another a concussion. Eight of the teenagers are also charged with a hate crime. Their trial has dragged on since early November." The Post adds, "This week attorneys are expected to finish closing arguments and a judge will render verdicts. The city is waiting uneasily to find out whether it will live up to its self-image as a unified, tolerant community or dissolve into racial hostility. … City leaders have reacted to the racial flare-up with alacrity, sending out volunteers to the victims and organizing community forums to denounce racism. … Yet some African Americans express frustration that city leaders have not been more visible in their community. Some are also angry at the local newspaper, which initially covered the victims' story that they were attacked, without reporting that some witnesses called it a mutual fight, or that the arrested teenagers have no criminal history and are accomplished athletes on a local high school track team."

Former California Executive Claims He Was Dismissed For Religious Reasons. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Goffard) reports, "A former executive of an Irvine car wax manufacturer alleges in a lawsuit that the company fired him because he had not pursued 'a Christian lifestyle' and wasn't 'on fire for Jesus.'" The Times continues, "Atticus O. Firey, 34, of Newport Beach contends Meguiar's Inc. committed religious discrimination when it fired him in July after nearly 10 years with the company. Company president Barry Meguiar repeatedly urged Firey, then the chief operating officer, to attend church, the suit alleges, and told him he was 'robbing this company of the blessing of God by not being on your knees and on fire for Jesus.' … Meguiar, who is host of a cable TV and radio program called 'Car Crazy,' did not return a call seeking comment. His lawyer, Richard Ruben, said religion had nothing to do with Firey's firing. He said the company's senior management decided to terminate Firey because his job performance was sub-par, with a management style that was 'demeaning' and 'negative.' … He added that the company's management includes 'people of all religions' and characterized the lawsuit as a 'publicity stunt.' He said he expected a judge to throw out the suit, because Firey had previously agreed to submit to arbitration, rather than go to the courts, should such a dispute arise. … The suit, filed Friday in Orange County Superior Court, says Meguiar sat in Firey's office and read to him from the Bible, thrust Christian books on him and demanded he read them and forced managers to attend prayer meetings. When Firey asked about a promised bonus, the suit says, Meguiar said he would not give it to him until Firey joined a Christian church."

Virginia Delegate Makes Amends For Controversial Comments. The Washington Post (1/23, B1, Gardner, 690K) reports Virginia GOP Del. Frank Hargrove, "who caused an uproar last week by questioning the need for a state apology for slavery, proposed a measure Monday that would commemorate the freeing of the last U.S. slaves in June 1865." Hargrove "said he has been deluged with at least 4,000 phone calls and e-mails at his home and office since he inflamed the House of Delegates by saying that blacks should 'get over' slavery and that apologizing for slavery was no more necessary than asking Jews to apologize for 'killing Christ.'"

ANTITRUST:

Georgia State Lawmakers Urge DOJ To Reject Delta Bid. The AP (1/23, Bluestein) reports, "Georgia's legislative leaders signed a letter Monday urging the Justice Department to reject a takeover bid facing Delta Air Lines, the Atlanta-based carrier locked in a corporate battle to remain a stand-alone company." The AP continues, "The lawmakers said in the letter that a merger between Delta and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. would result in skyrocketing air fares and reduced competition. … 'The tremendous amount of overlap between the route networks of these carriers will drive significant consolidation, reduce flight choices, increase fares for our consumers, affect jobs and have a negative impact on our region,' the legislators said in the letter, which was addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." The AP adds, "The ceremonial signing by House Speaker Glenn Richardson and Senate President Pro-tem Eric Johnson drew a gaggle of reporters and lawmakers. It represents the latest attempt by Delta to bring its boardroom struggle into the public. … The airline, the nation's third-largest, has reached out to Atlanta's business and civic leaders and organized public rallies to protest the takeover bid launched by its archrival in November 2006."

The Athens (GA) Banner-Herald (1/23, Eckenrode) reports, "Legislators also on Monday introduced resolutions in the House and Senate voicing support for Atlanta-based Delta. .. US Airways is offering Delta's creditors more than $10 billion in cash and stock to accept the merger. … Delta is fighting the offer and wants to emerge from bankruptcy this year standing on its own." The Banner-Herald adds, "Delta's creditors have not yet weighed in on the bid. But if it is approved, the deal still will have to receive approval from the Justice Department because of antitrust questions. … A U.S. Senate committee on Wednesday also is expected to look at how the proposed merger would effect competition and air service on routes where the two airlines overlap."

WAGA-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/22, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "A high-level show of support for Delta Air Lines as it tries to fight off a hostile takeover bid. Georgia's top legislative leaders signed a letter to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez asking for 'a full and careful review' of the takeover bid by Us Airways. Delta has said it wants to emerge from bankruptcy as a standalone airline. With this great company and ensuring that they stay here in Atlanta and they are vie Brant for the future." WSB-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/22, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "This is an ad that the Delta pilots took out in USA Today outlining why they think the bid is a bad idea, this on the same day that Delta got support from Georgia's legislative leaders. From the Lieutenant Governor to Georgia's Speaker of the House, all signing a letter to Attorney General, Alberto Gonzalez reviewing the takeover bid for Delta. The lawmakers' letter saying that overlap between the two airlines will affect jobs and have a negative impact on Georgia's economy. I'm convinced that delta's standing alone will be in the best interest of all the citizens, not only just here in Georgia, but abroad. WXIA-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/22, 7:00 p.m.), and other cities also broadcasted this story. Some examples are: WAWS-TV, Jacksonville, FL (1/22, 4:00 p.m.), WTVQ-TV, Lexington, KY (1/22, 5:30 p.m.), and WAGT-TV, Augusta, GA (1/22, 11:00 p.m.) and Chattanooga, TN.

US Air's Delta Offer Loses Creditor Support. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A2, Dade, Carey, Trottman) reports, "As a Senate committee prepares to take testimony tomorrow on consolidation in the airline industry, US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile $10.1 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. appears to be losing traction among creditors who will determine the fate of the Atlanta airline, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "After digging into the details of the US Airways offer -- which was sweetened 20% less than two weeks ago -- and hiring former Continental Airlines Inc. Chairman Gordon Bethune to help analyze its prospects, the Delta creditors' committee has grown skeptical of the proposed merger, these people said." The Journal adds, "Separately, talks about a possible merger between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. have been put on hold, without a framework for a deal and without specific plans for further negotiations, according to people familiar with the thinking of both sides. … Delta creditors encouraged the talks, which culminated in a series of 'detailed, specific conversations' among senior managers from the companies regarding potential structures, processes and timetables for a transaction, according to a person knowledgeable about the matter. A combination of Delta and Northwest remains 'a very viable option,' according to one person close to the situation, but isn't likely to be pursued until both airlines emerge from bankruptcy protection this year, if ever. Delta intends to leave Chapter 11 proceedings in April and has made its own proposal to creditors to emerge as a stand-alone company. Northwest hopes to emerge from bankruptcy-court protection in the second quarter."

Cemex Extends Bid For Rinker. Bloomberg (1/23, Steffens) reports, "Cemex SA, the world's third-largest cement maker, extended its $11.7 billion hostile takeover bid for Australia's Rinker Group Ltd. by two months while it waits for U.S. regulatory approval." Bloomberg continues, "Cemex's $13-a-share offer for Australia's biggest building materials company will now end March 30, the Monterrey, Mexico-based company said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today. … Cemex wants to buy Rinker because of its business in the U.S., which is focused on Florida, Arizona and Nevada, the fastest-growing states. The deal would make it the world's biggest cement maker. Cemex Chairman Lorenzo Zambrano said today the offer is ``compelling'' while Rinker has described it as 36 percent too low." Bloomberg adds, "Cemex is offering to pay Rinker's shareholders in U.S. dollars, saying they can choose to be paid in Australian dollars at the exchange rate prevailing at the time of settlement. … U.S. antitrust regulators on Nov. 30 said they needed more information from both companies before being able to make a ruling on the proposed deal."

3M Poised To Clear Books On Antitrust Suits. The Legal Intelligencer (1/23, Duffy) reports, "With a proposed settlement worth nearly $40 million, office supply giant 3M is poised to close the books on more than a decade of litigating antitrust suits." The Intelligencer continues, "In a series of suits, a competitor and purchasers accused 3M -- the maker of Scotch tape and Post-It Notes -- of abusing its monopoly power in the market for transparent tape by driving a competitor out of business." The Intelligencer adds, "The $39.75 million settlement in Bradburn Parent/Teacher Store Inc. v. 3M -- a class action brought by direct purchasers and retailers -- comes on the heels of a trio of settlements reached last year. … In court papers filed last week, plaintiffs lawyers asked U.S. District Judge John R. Padova to grant final approval of the settlement and to award them attorney fees of $13.9 million and nearly $1 million in litigation costs for their 11,000 hours of work over four years. … In August, Padova approved a $28.8 million settlement in Meijer Inc. v. 3M, a class action brought on behalf of large-volume retailers who were excluded from the Bradburn case. … And court papers show that 3M also struck deals with two big retailers that had opted out of the Meijer case -- Kmart and Publix Supermarkets Inc." The Intelligencer notes, "All of those suits stemmed directly from a 1997 suit, LePage's Inc. v. 3M, which resulted in a $68 million verdict in 1999 and a finding that 3M had set out to monopolize the market for transparent tape. … LePage's, a competing supplier of tape, had accused 3M of using illegal tactics to drive it out of business."

Qantas Suitors Seek To Reassure Unions. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, C9) reports, "The buyout group bidding for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. met with union officials yesterday, promising not to cut services or send maintenance operations offshore, amid fears about jobs and working conditions. … However, unions said they wanted legally binding guarantees to protect staff and would continue talks with the buyout consortium, Qantas and the Australian government." The Journal continues, "The Airline Partners Australia consortium, which includes Macquarie Bank Ltd., Allco Finance Group Ltd., Allco Equity Partners Ltd. and North American private equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Onex Corp., said it talked with representatives from the Transport Workers Union and the Australian & International Pilots Association."

Equity Officer Properties Considers Another Takeover Bid. The New York Times (1/23, Pristin) reports, "Equity Office Properties, which agreed in November to be bought by a private equity company, the Blackstone Group, for $36 billion, including debt, said yesterday that it would begin discussions with a rival group that has offered to top that price." The Times continues, "Equity Office, the nation's largest office landlord, with 585 buildings in 24 metropolitan areas, also said it would open its books to the challengers, a consortium led by Vornado Realty Trust." The Times adds, "Raising the stakes in what was already the largest buyout battle ever, Vornado and its partners, Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital, proposed last week to pay $52 a share for Equity Office, or 7.2 percent more than what Blackstone has offered. Vornado, a real estate investment trust that owns more than 100 million square feet of office, retail and showroom property, said its offer would include about $10.6 billion of its stock. … Setting a Jan. 31 deadline for the Vornado group to submit a formal proposal, Equity Office said it continued to recommend approval of the Blackstone merger."

Record Industry Mulls Unrestricted Digital Music. The New York Times (1/23, Shannon) reports, "As even digital music revenue growth falters because of rampant file-sharing by consumers, the major record labels are moving closer to releasing music on the Internet with no copying restrictions — a step they once vowed never to take." The Times continues, "Executives of several technology companies meeting here at Midem, the annual global trade fair for the music industry, said over the weekend that at least one of the four major record companies could move toward the sale of unrestricted digital files in the MP3 format within months." The Times adds, "Most independent record labels already sell tracks digitally compressed in the MP3 format, which can be downloaded, e-mailed or copied to computers, cellphones, portable music players and compact discs without limit. … The independents see providing songs in MP3 partly as a way of generating publicity that could lead to future sales. … For the major recording companies, however, selling in the MP3 format would be a capitulation to the power of the Internet, which has destroyed their control over the worldwide distribution of music." The Times notes, "Until last year, the industry was counting on online purchases of music, led by Apple's iTunes music store, to make up the difference. … But digital sales in 2006, while 80 percent ahead of the year before, grew slower than in 2005 and did not compensate for the decline in physical sales, according to an industry report released in London last week."

ENVIRONMENT:

President To Link Energy Security, Global Warming In State Of The Union. In an analysis, the Financial Times (1/23, Daniel) writes, "In his quest for a defining legacy beyond the Iraq war, tonight a chastened President George W. Bush in his State of the Union address will put energy security - reducing US dependence on foreign oil - at the heart of his political agenda for his final two years." In tonight's speech, Bush "will make an explicit link between the demands of energy security and the environment, says Tony Snow, White House spokesman." The "fact that Mr Bush is even talking about his actions on climate change, and will set out how his own policy helps address it, marks a profound departure from the past. Yet there remain doubts about whether the White House is willing to embrace more radical energy efficiency initiatives, or abandon its policy of the first six years of seeking to expand the supply of domestic oil." The Times adds, "Senior aides say he has been frustrated by the barrage of leaders admonishing him on global warming, from Tony Blair's constant solicitations to interventions by Angela Merkel, the German chancellor."

Corporate Leaders Urge Bush To Support Carbon Dioxide Caps. The Washington Post (1/23, A6, Mufson, 690K) reports, "On the eve of the State of the Union address, the chief executives of 10 major corporations urged President Bush to embrace mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in order to stem climate change. But yesterday White House spokesman Tony Snow said that binding caps on carbon dioxide emissions would not be part of the president's proposals tonight." There "has been widespread speculation about what Bush might say about climate change tonight." The Post adds, "Major corporate leaders have been changing their position on climate change for the past year or two, and many of them are convinced that some form of regulation of or tax on carbon emissions is inevitable. With many states talking about coming up with their own laws, corporate leaders have started to urge the federal government to establish a nationwide standard."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Ball, 2.04M) reports, "[S]ome of the country's biggest industrial companies are acknowledging that fossil fuels are a major culprit" in global warming and that their "emissions should be cut significantly over time. ... Some see a lucrative new market in clean-energy technologies. Many figure a regulation is politically inevitable and they want to be in the room when it's negotiated, to minimize the burden that falls on them." The "broadening, if incomplete, consensus that fossil fuels are at least a big part of the global-warming problem signals real change in the environmental debate. The biggest question going forward no longer is whether fossil-fuel emissions should be curbed. It's who will foot the bill for the cleanup -- and that battle is heating up."

Speech Expected To Boost Ethanol. The New York Times (1/23, Barrionuevo, 1.16M) reports, "After three decades of surviving mostly on tax subsidies," the ethanol industry "is poised tonight to get its biggest endorsement from on high that it has a long-term future as a home-grown alternative to gasoline. In his State of the Union address, President Bush is expected to call for a huge increase in the amount of ethanol that refiners mix with gasoline, probably double the current goal of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012." Although "the details of the proposal are not known, 15 billion gallons of ethanol would work out to more than 10 percent of the country's current gasoline consumption, and is far beyond the current capacity of about 5.4 billion gallons." The Times adds, "For an industry once dominated by the will of a single powerful producer, Archer Daniels Midland, ethanol has come a long way, joining the oil industry and producers of major agricultural commodities as an entrenched political force in Washington."

The Washington Post (1/23, A6, Mufson, 690K) reports, "The energy agenda in Washington has been long dominated by oil interests, but in a reversal of political fortunes, these days it is Big Oil fighting to preserve its tax incentives and the ethanol industry that is adding new ones. President Bush may up the ante tonight in his State of the Union address, many analysts think, by setting new targets for ethanol use or encouraging automakers to shift to engines capable of handling E85." The "ethanol industry is already on a roll" and "investors drove up the stock prices of ethanol companies yesterday in anticipation of Bush's speech." But "an increasing number of economists and energy experts are questioning whether the benefits of producing ethanol -- especially ethanol made from corn -- have been oversold."

Pelosi Plan For Climate Change Committee Meets Resistance. The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Eilperin, Grunwald, 690K) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's "power play" in creating a select committee on energy independence and climate change, "demonstrated her seriousness about climate, a complex issue that may be as legislatively difficult and politically treacherous as health care was in the 1990s. But it also reflected her seriousness about imposing discipline on her caucus and preventing a return to the days when long-serving Democratic chairmen ran their committees as independent fiefdoms." Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell, "a legendary defender of his committee's prerogatives as well as the carbon-emitting auto industry of his home state -- had made it clear that he expected to lead the party's global-warming debate in a rather leisurely fashion. Pelosi was end-running him." Dingell "saw Pelosi's new committee as a recipe for duplication, incompetence and the suppression of democracy." And California Rep. Henry A. Waxman, chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, "warned that Pelosi might be scheming to write bills out of her own office. 'That's the way the Republicans did it,' Waxman said. Those are fighting words in the new majority, and some Energy and Commerce Democrats are willing to fight."

The Hill (1/23, Snyder) reports Dingell "found an unlikely ally in his spat" with Pelosi "over a new climate-change panel: former committee chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas). While Barton and Dingell have butted heads on energy policy, the two were like-minded in their opposition to a select committee on climate change that would operate outside the bounds of their own committee." The "spat threatened to draw energy lobbyists, who largely had sat on the sidelines this session, into an awkward intra-caucus fight between two people — Dingell and Pelosi — it doesn't pay to upset."

The Hill (1/23, Kaplan) reports New York Rep. Anthony Weiner and other Democrats on the House Energy and Commerce Committee "were disgruntled" about Pelosi's "plan to take away some of their turf by creating a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming" with Massachusetts Rep. Edward Markey at its head. The Hill adds, "Some liberal Democrats are said to be frustrated with [Dingell], who is closely allied with the auto industry and opposes some measures, such as increasing gas mileage standards, to reduce greenhouse gases. But a cross-section of members are frustrated with Markey."

Energy Self-Sufficiency Goal Called Unrealistic. In a Wall Street Journal (1/23, A19, 2.04M) op-ed, Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, writes, "With geopolitical turmoil, volatile prices and continuing reminders of the international political power of oil, the concept of energy independence is compelling and deeply appealing." But "if energy independence is presented as self-sufficiency, it will likely fall flat. And, as prices run through their cycles, disappointment will undermine the longer-term commitments that are required for a sound energy future. Today, quite simply, cutting ourselves off from global energy markets is not realistic." However, "if the goal of energy independence is understood differently, to mean energy security -- resilience, robustness, reduced vulnerability -- then it is much more useful." This kind of definition "emphasizes the central goal of diversification -- encouraging investment and higher levels of research and development in both alternative and conventional energy sources. It means a new push for energy conservation, higher energy efficiency, lower energy intensity." It also "requires an understanding that this kind of energy independence -- as measured in energy security -- actually requires interdependence with other nations, both consumers and producers of energy."

Ford Introduces Hydrogen Hybrid As Industry Hopes For More Research Funding. The Washington Post (1/23, D1, Freeman, 690K) reports on Ford's introduction of the HySeries Edge, "a plug-in hybrid with an electric drive powered by a battery and a hydrogen fuel cell." The car's "arrival intensifies the competition to manufacture a mass-market electric hybrid that reduces reliance on gasoline and curbs the emission of greenhouse gases. But the futuristic Edge vehicle is Ford's only one, and it cost $2 million to build." The Post adds, "To get a car like this into the showroom for sale to the public will require the automotive and energy industries to leap high technological hurdles. The infrastructure to deliver alternative fuels such as hydrogen is in its infancy, and engineers are puzzling over how to mass-produce a lightweight, inexpensive and safe electric battery." The "industry is hoping President Bush will announce his intention to increase research funding during his State of the Union speech tonight."

Judge Moves Hearing On Nevada Bomb Test To January 31. The AP (1/23) reports, "A federal judge has pushed forward by one day a scheduled hearing on a proposed non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would generate a mushroom-shaped dust cloud in the Nevada desert." The AP continues, "Judge Lloyd George cited a scheduling conflict in moving the date of the telephone conference call to January 31st. A Justice Department lawyer from Washington is due to provide an update of the federal Defense Threat Reduction Agency proposal. No date has been set for the blast. … It would involve detonating a 700-ton ammonium nitrate and fuel oil bomb at the Nevada Test Site -- about 85 miles northwest of Las Vegas." The AP adds, "Government officials call the test important for gathering data about penetrating hardened and deeply buried targets. Critics have called it a surrogate for a low-yield nuclear 'bunker-buster' bomb. … They say it'll scatter dust contaminated nuclear weapons tests at the test site. The explosion has been postponed since Western Shoshone tribe members and 'downwinders' in Utah and Nevada filed suit last year."

Utah Land-Use Plan Revisited. The Salt Lake Tribune (1/23, Baird) reports, "The federal government and environmental groups got a do-over Monday in their bid to dismiss a lawsuit filed by Kane and Garfield counties that seeks to overturn the Grand Stair- case-Escalante National Monument's land-use plan." The Tribune continues, "U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart originally heard arguments to dismiss the suit last fall, then recused himself. Judge Bruce Jenkins replaced Stewart, and opted to hear the arguments for a second time at the Moss Courthouse in downtown Salt Lake City. … But where Stewart seemed skeptical of the government's contention that the counties could show no harm from the monument plan - and thus had no standing to bring the suit - Jenkins appeared dubious that the counties could make their claims stick without laying out more specifics." The Tribune adds, "Jenkins also challenged the counties' argument that they have been permanently tied to the decisions made by the Bureau of Land Management in 1999 that regulated travel, water diversions and other land uses in the monument. … 'What statute do you point to showing that this is a final agency action?' Jenkins asked Shawn Welch, the counties' attorney, during the nearly two-hour hearing. … The counties have claimed that there is a large network of county-owned roads that criss-cross the 1.8 million-acre monument that the BLM has refused to recognize. … Justice Department attorney Tom Snodgrass once again argued that the counties have failed to prove any road ownership claims beyond four routes that were recognized in the land-use plan - and thus could show no harm."

NRC Commissioner Says Efforts To Build New Reactors Hampered By Budget Delay. Under the headline, "Lack of Budget Could Hurt Nuclear Energy

Revival, Official Says," the New York Times (1/23, Wald, 1.16M) reports, "The senior member of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission warned on Monday that the failure of Congress to pass a detailed budget for the current fiscal year could damage the nuclear renaissance that the government tried so hard to encourage with the energy bill of 2005." The Times adds that Commissioner "Edward McGaffigan Jr., said that if the commission received applications this year, 'we basically are going to have to put them on the shelf, because we're not going to have the folks to work on the applications until well into calendar year 2008.'" Having passed only "two of the 11 spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, 2006," much of the "government has been operating under a 'continuing resolution,'" and "Democrats say they plan to extend that resolution through Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year." Commissioner "McGaffigan said that if the commission could not process applications, some companies wanting to build would decide to wait."

Greater Oversight Of US Oil, Gas Leases Urged. Karin Lissakers, director of the Revenue Watch Institute, writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) that during the "last six months, media coverage, Congressional hearings, lawsuits by private citizens and a scathing report by the Interior Department's inspector general have exposed a litany of failures in the department's management of oil and gas leases on public lands and waters." In fact, Lissakers says the failures "have become so glaring, in fact, that there is even speculation that the President, a good friend to the energy industry, might speak about them in his State of the Union address tonight." She urges Congress, "with the president's encouragement," to "insist that the United States practice at home the transparency it preaches abroad," by "enact[ing] a requirement that all companies extracting oil, gas and other minerals from federal lands publicly report all of their production on those lands and all royalties and other payments made to the federal government from that production." Only then, she concludes, "can the American public have confidence that the taxes owed by those who have benefited from the use of our public lands are being properly accounted for and fully collected."

WPost Urges Cleanup Of Anacostia River. The Washington Post (1/23, A16) editorializes, "The promise of massive redevelopment in the District -- new neighborhoods, office buildings, parks, retail complexes, and baseball and soccer stadiums, with the Anacostia River as an urban centerpiece -- could wind up mired in muck. As reported in distressing detail by staff writer David A. Fahrenthold, the river is disgracefully dirty, brimming with trash, toxic chemicals, dead animals, diseased fish and raw sewage. At least the Potomac River and the Chesapeake Bay have constituencies pressing for improvements in those waters; but without a groundswell to revive the Anacostia, potential developers may hold their noses and turn away." The Post continues, "One revolting source of pollution is the District's sewer system, designed more than 100 years ago to dump raw sewage into the river during rainstorms. The D.C. Water and Sewer Authority has a plan to dig huge tunnels under the city to store this flow and then treat it to remove the sewage. But the agency's chief of staff, Johnnie Hemphill, told The Post that the project could take close to 20 years and $2 billion. This month, the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court's ruling that set stricter caps on the amounts of pollutants dumped into the Anacostia. Jerry N. Johnson, the water and sewer authority's general manager, said the new rules may slow the project while officials figure out how to adapt. But the cleanup must go faster, not slower. … No single pollution solution exists, but until federal, state and local officials develop a sense of emergency, the Anacostia River will continue to dampen the chances of economic vitality in the core of this region."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Disagrees With Attorneys On Timing Of Arellano Felix Trial. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/23, Soto) reports, "The federal judge overseeing the possible death-penalty trial of accused drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Felix sharply disagreed with lawyers for both the defense and the prosecution over when a jury would hear the case." The Union-Tribune continues, "Prosecutors and defense lawyers told U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns Monday that they could be ready to take the case to trial in June 2008. … Burns disagreed and refused to put the case off that far. … He has been pushing the lawyers to get the case before a jury quickly, at first saying that it should go this spring, but now insisting it can get started this year." The Union-Tribune adds, "The lawyers say that's impossible, given the voluminous evidence gathered against Arellano and the fact that before the case can go forward, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty. … Arellano is accused of racketeering and conspiracy, and could face the death penalty if convicted of operating a continuing criminal conspiracy that has led to several murders. … Also accused in the case is Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who prosecutors say was a top Arellano Felix henchman who ordered the beheadings of Rosarito Beach police officers last year."

Extradited Mexican "Drug Lords" Appear In US Court. There are now more than 400 media references to the extradition and U.S. court appearance of several Mexican "drug lords" and others. For example, the AP (1/23) reports four "drug lords who had been serving time in Mexican prisons were brought shackled into an American courtroom Monday to face drug and intimidation charges. Among them was Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, believed to be one of the kingpins most responsible for violence along the Texas-Mexico border in recent years, said Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. 'This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership,' Tandy told reporters by teleconference from Washington." The AP adds, "Besides Cardenas-Guillen, the group includes Hector Palma Salazar, the suspected former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana."

In a separate story, the AP (1/23) reports from Mexico City that President Felipe Calderon "pledged Monday to wage a permanent war against organized crime by coordinating more closely with local police and giving all law enforcement better training, equipment and intelligence work. … His comments came three days after his administration extradited four alleged drug lords and 11 other suspects to the United States. He said he wouldn't give up the battle." Tandy "described the extraditions as 'an enormous leap forward.' 'Most were major drug traffickers. Many were long-term targets of the United States. All now face their worst fear: U.S. justice,' Tandy said in a media conference call Monday. 'On behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives.'"

The AP (1/22) also reported that more than a dozen leaders and workers in Mexico's "most brutal and powerful drug cartels were brought before a federal magistrate in Houston Monday before being shipped to several states to face charges. They face various drug-related charges in different states, including New York, Colorado and California, officials said." News outlets that used a version of the AP story include CBS News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, Dallas Morning News, San Diego Union-Tribune, Miami Herald, Fort Worth Star Telegram, and Forbes.

USA Today (1/23, Leinwand) reports a "suspected Mexican drug lord whose cartel allegedly smuggled more than four tons of cocaine a month over the U.S. border will stand trial in Texas. Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, the alleged kingpin of the Gulf Cartel, and three other alleged drug lords appeared in a Houston court Monday. Mexican authorities delivered Cardenas-Guillen and 14 other alleged Mexican drug dealers and criminals to Houston late Friday and early Saturday, the Drug Enforcement Administration said." Cardenas-Guillen "was charged in Texas in December 2000 with drug trafficking and threatening to kill federal agents, Tandy said. Cardenas-Guillen and his cohorts allegedly attempted to kidnap and kill a DEA agent and an FBI agent during a confrontation in November 1999, the indictment said."

The Dallas Morning News (1/23, Corchado) reports President Calderón "called on the political opposition Monday to share 'co-responsibility' for fighting the drug war, and senior U.S. officials praised Mr. Calderón's 'stunning' leadership in extraditing alleged Mexican drug lords to the U.S." John Walters "said the Bush administration is prepared to 'look at added resources' to help strengthen Mexican security." Karen Tandy said, "This past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico took an enormous leap forward, particularly with the extradition of Mexican drug kingpin Osiel Cárdenas-Guillén. … For the past eight years, he commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world." The Myrtle Beach Sun News, San Luis Obispo Tribune, and Contra Costa Times used the Dallas Morning News story.

On its Web site, KHOU-TV, Houston (1/22) reports federal agents in Mexico who "transported reputed kingpin Osiel Cardenas Guillen shot video that appeared on a Web site of the Mexican newspaper El Universal. It shows Osiel Cardenas on a flight to Houston where he was handed over to DEA agents."

KHOU-TV, Houston (1/23) also reports on its Web site that Karen Tandy said, "This is the first time that the Supreme Court of Mexico has extradited cartel leaders and leadership." KHOU adds that Cardenas "is considered to be one of the most dangerous drug kingpins in recent history who, according to DEA agents, transported up to six tons of cocaine per month to the U.S."

Suspects Won't Face Death Penalty. The Houston Chronicle (1/23) reports Cardenas "is also charged with leading an ambush of U.S. federal agents in Matamoros, across the border from Brownsville, in November 1999. Brandishing his trademark gold-plated .45-caliber pistol, Cardenas and a dozen of his henchmen surrounded a car carrying two agents from the DEA and the FBI and threatened to kill them if they didn't turn over an informant, Tandy said." Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said none of the suspects will face the death penalty, a punishment that does not exist in Mexico. 'We have to make the assurances necessary for a successful extradition,' McNulty said. John Walters...agreed, calling it 'a watershed event.'"

Mexico's Attorney General Plans More Extraditions. The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Enriquez, Martinez) reported, "On the heels of the extradition of four top drug cartel leaders, Mexico's attorney general said Sunday he planned to send more suspects to face U.S. trials, tacitly acknowledging that corruption had allowed drug kingpins to direct operations even while in maximum-security Mexican prisons. … Aggressive extradition is emerging as the second prong of Mexican President Felipe Calderon's get-tough approach to the drug gang violence that killed more than 2,000 people nationwide last year. In January, 17 Mexican suspects have been handed over to U.S. authorities, a pace that would easily surpass last year's record 63 extraditions."

Gonzales Praises Calderon. CNN Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/22, 6:14 p.m.) broadcasted, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says we recognize the bold stance of President Felipe Calderon. Some of those most directly affected remain skeptical including US border sheriffs. The corruption is almost out of control. And it would be hard for anyone, including the President of Mexico, to come in and try to clean up the problem. In fact, US officials expect a short-term increase in violence. Many kingpins run their business prisons and some of those cartels are now leaderless. The DEA held a rare conference call to its reporters today. That the cooperation from Mexico President Calderon is both extraordinary and significant. And also one Justice Department official praised the Mexico government for showing what it called courage in taking on drug trafficking organizations."

Alabama Drug Ring Busted After Two-Year Probe. The Tuscaloosa News (Alabama) (1/23, Taylor) reports, "More than 20 people have been accused of taking part in a sophisticated operation that brought illegal drugs from the West Coast to West Alabama." The News continues, "A two-year investigation by dozens of federal agents and local law enforcement officers resulted in federal drug trafficking charges against 21 people from Tuscaloosa and Greene counties." The News adds, "A 37-count indictment unsealed Monday charges them with distribution of powder and crack cocaine. Twelve of them were arrested over the weekend. … The men allegedly used several drivers who used 18-wheeler freight trucks to haul drugs from California to a location in Greene County where it was then distributed to lower-level dealers, said Jill Ellis, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Birmingham. … David Smith, 58, of Boligee was described as the organizer of the operation." The News notes, "The first count of the indictment charges Smith with operating a continuing criminal enterprise. Other charges included using a telephone or computer to facilitate drug trafficking, conspiracy to posses with the intent to distribute and distribution of cocaine and crack. … 'Smith's drug trafficking organization was a major distributor of powder and crack cocaine to high- and mid-level dealers throughout West Alabama,' U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said in a written release. … The men arrested over the weekend were described as 'lieutenants' within the organization, or distributors who use 'runners' to get the drugs to street-level buyers."

The Birmingham (AL) News (1/23) reports, "Dozens of federal, state and local law enforcement officers on Saturday rounded up the first dozen of those indicted, including David Smith, 58, of Boligee, whom U.S. Attorney Alice Martin described as the organizer of the ring. … Gregory Borland, assistant special agent in charge of Alabama's Drug Enforcement Administration, called the investigation one of the most significant he has been involved in Alabama."

Mike Tyson Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges In Arizona. In Phoenix, the AP (1/23) reports former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson "pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of drug possession and driving under the influence of drugs. … Tyson was indicted earlier this month on felony drug possession and paraphernalia possession counts and two misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence of drugs. If convicted of all four charges, he could be sentenced to up to 7 1/2 years in prison."

Researchers Tie Gun Ownership Rate To Homicide Rate. The New York Times (1/23, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "States with the greatest number of guns in the home also have the highest rates of homicide, a new study finds. The study, in the February issue of Social Science and Medicine, looked at gun ownership in all 50 states and then compared the results with the number of people killed over a three-year period. The research, the authors said, 'suggests that household firearms are a direct and an indirect source of firearms used to kill Americans both in their homes and on the streets.'"

Report Examines Problems With Philadelphia Gun Dealers. The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/23, Moran) reports, "Gun-control advocates joined Philadelphia Police Commissioner Sylvester M. Johnson yesterday in calling for more prosecutions of gun dealers who sell to the gun-traffickers and straw purchasers fueling the violence plaguing Philadelphia and other cities." The Inquirer continues, "At City Hall, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a national report, 'Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers,' that highlights more than two dozen cases - including nine in Pennsylvania - of dealers who sold guns that wound up in the hands of criminals. The criminals were prosecuted but the dealers were not. … 'The recent upsurge in criminal gun violence places renewed importance on the question: Where do criminals get their guns?' the report states." The Inquirer adds, "The report identified, among others, Abington Gun Sports in Willow Grove, which allegedly sold to female straw buyers working for a man who authorities say then went on a rampage in Philadelphia in 2003, holding up fast-food restaurants, carjacking a Lexus, and robbing a bank of nearly $60,000. … The guns the women bought included an AK-47 SAR assault rifle, two 12-gauge shotguns, a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle, and a Marlon 30-30 rifle, according to the federal indictment of Andre Henry, three other men and three female straw purchasers. The case is pending."

US Launches Program To Curb Illegal Gun Sales. KTVT-TV, CBS 11, Dallas-Fort Worth (1/23) reports, "The U.S. Attorney's Office, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the firearms industry are joining forces to stop the illegal purchases of firearms." KTVT-TV continues, "Monday they unveiled a campaign called 'Don't Lie for the Other Guy.' The program hopes to raise public awareness and educate firearms dealers about 'straw' purchases. … A straw purchase is when someone buys a firearm for someone who cannot legally buy one for themselves." KTVT-TV adds, "A spokesperson for the ATF said, 'This program is an important tool for ATF as we pursue our mission of preventing terrorism, reducing violent crime and protecting the public.' … It is a federal felony to purchase a gun for someone who can't, punishable up to 10 years in jail and up to a $250,000 fine. … In 2005, ATF arrests led to over 1440 individuals being convicted of illegal firearms trafficking. That's up 14 percent from the previous year. … The group will display flyers in all gun stores and distribute materials about illegal firearms transactions. Several public service announcements about the program are also planned to hit the airwaves."

Los Angeles County Sheriff Traces Guns' Path To Compton. The Los Angeles Times (1/22, Garvey) reports, "To crack down on gangs and stem soaring violence in Compton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca asked his deputies and detectives not just to investigate crime but to also probe where gang members were getting their guns." The Times continues, "So sheriff's officials embarked on unprecedented census: tracking down the origins of nearly 900 weapons confiscated there last year. The results, released Monday, offer a glimpse into the complex and unexpected ways guns get into the hands of gang members." The Times adds, "Sixteen guns recovered in or near Compton were traced to a single store in Sparks, Nev., through databases of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. That same location, officials said, accounted for more than more than 350 weapons recovered nationwide by law enforcement officials last year, including 65 in the Los Angeles area. … The bureau is investigating the store and law enforcement officials declined to identify it, Baca said." The Times notes, "The bulk of the weapons confiscated in Compton were originally sold in California. But scores of others came from Arizona, Nevada and Colorado. Nine weapons were registered in Connecticut and a few others were registered in Ohio. … Several of the weapons were traced to murders."

Villaragosa Meets With Gonzales, Mueller About Gang Violence. CNN Paula Zahn Now (1/22, 8:18 p.m.) broadcasted, "Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaragosa: "It's bad enough that we believe we need to get a handle on it now. This approach has to be a comprehensive, multi-agency approach. About a couple weeks ago I met with Alberto Gonzales, the Attorney General, talked to him about the gang problem in Los Angeles. I spoke and met with the FBI director, Mr. Mueller, where we talked about providing more Federal FBI assets in our fight against gangs, and I've also met with and spoken with Governor Schwarzenegger."

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Immigrant Charged With Sexual Assault Seeks Deportation. Fox News (1/23) reports from Woodstock, IL, "Not many illegal immigrants ask to be deported. But Jose Vallejo of Mexico did, rather than face a potential prison term of 30 years for sex assault here in the United States. And he nearly got his wish." Fox continues, "Prosecutors in Illinois say Vallejo, who is now a 17-year-old Mexican national, pinned a 4-year-old girl down on a bed, then molested her on April 12, 2006. Even though Vallejo was only 16 at the time of the alleged crime, he is being charged as an adult because of the age of the victim. He faces three counts, including aggravated criminal sexual assault, one count of unlawful restraint." Fox adds, "Originally, bond was set by a state judge at $150,000 but Vallejo's family posted the cash. So, Vallejo was released by the state, but soon after, was taken into custody by federal agents for illegally entering the country three years ago. .. While in federal custody, Vallejo asked a federal immigration judge to deport him. The request was granted during a Jan. 4 deportation hearing in Chicago. … But before Vallejo was sent back over the border, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials alerted prosecutors in McHenry County, Ill., and that agency took custody of him."

Administration Blasted Over Immigrant Raids. The AP (1/23, Talhelm) reports, "The Bush administration is taking heat from lawmakers for the harm done to a company during last month's largest-ever immigration raid." The AP continues, "Immigration officials on Dec. 12 arrested 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in Texas, Colorado, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska and Utah. … After a closed-door meeting Monday with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, senators from the affected states said the raid exposed flaws in the federal government and in a program designed to help employers screen for illegal immigrants." The AP adds, "Among the concerns, senators reported, were that agencies can't share information about stolen identities and that programs designed to catch illegal immigrants allow many lawbreakers to slip through the cracks. … Chertoff acknowledged some of the problems, and said his department's programs are not "the perfect cure." Senators said they wanted Chertoff to enforce the laws, but they needed to assure companies that working with the government would not ultimately hurt them. … Swift participated in a program called Basic Pilot, which screens employees for illegal Social Security numbers. The system doesn't snag stolen Social Security numbers or numbers that are being used in multiple locations . … Since the arrests, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has announced the indictments of 148 illegal immigrants, who used other peoples' Social Security numbers and other personal information to get jobs at Swift. Local prosecutors are bringing state charges against the immigrants, including 80 in Cache County, Utah, and 18 in Weld County, Colo."

Judge Closes Suit Against US Over Immigrant Raids. The AP (1/23, Kohler) reports from Denver, "A judge closed a lawsuit against the federal government Monday after federal officials disclosed the whereabouts and status of 262 workers arrested during last month's largest-ever immigration raid at Swift & Co. meatpacking plant in Greeley, Colorado." The AP continues, "Attorneys for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, which filed the suit, said it should not have taken a lawsuit to get the information. The lawsuit alleged the U.S. government had violated the Greeley workers' constitutional right to due process." The AP adds, "The people arrested in Greeley were among 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in six U.S. states who were taken into custody on Dec. 12, most on illegal immigration charges. The union lawsuit did not cover workers in the other states. … U.S. District Judge John Kane terminated the lawsuit after union and federal lawyers agreed that all the arrested workers had been accounted for and given a chance to seek bond. … The government released the information to the union last week under orders from Kane." The AP notes, "A total of 74 of the Greeley workers remained in federal custody in Denver and El Paso, Texas, and 75 voluntarily returned to Mexico, according to federal officials. Another 18 face state identity-theft charges in Weld County, Colorado, where the Greeley Swift plant is located."

Rohrabacher Blasts Bush On Illegal Immigration. Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported, "The problem of illegal immigration is so large in Orange County, California that the local jails are full of illegal aliens arrested for local crimes. So, the jails therefore are a great place to find illegal aliens. The local sheriff knows this and would like to see the opportunity exploited. But there is a problem. … While responsibility for getting [criminal aliens] off the street typically calls to local police, when it comes to getting them out of the country, most cops can't get the training to do that. Letting local police enforce immigration law is controversial. Even in Orange County California where Sherriff Mike Carona wants his deputies cross-trained in immigration law with access to the federal immigration database. … 10 years ago, congress changed the law to allow local police agencies to enforce federal immigration statutes and it appropriated money to help. Yet when Carona asked Immigration and Customs Enforcement to train 500 of his deputies, the feds said it would cost too much. So he tried to hundred 200 – still too expensive. He got 12." Rep. Dana Rohrabacher: "We've authorized a great deal of help for these local people to help and enlist them in the battle to get control of illegal immigration and this administration turns around and gives them a pittance. … President Bush is not committed to stopping this flow of illegals into our country."

TAX:

Former North Carolina Tax Preparer Pleads Guilty To State Tax Charges. The Shelby (NC) Star (1/23, DeLea) reports from Raleigh, NC, "Former Shelby tax preparer Jerry O. Adams III, who still faces federal charges on defrauding the U.S. Department of Treasury of more than $3.8 million, pleaded guilty to failing to file and pay the state individual income tax last week in state court." The Star continues, "Judge K. Dean Black issued Adams a 45-day suspended sentence and placed him on supervised probation for two years. The sentence will be reduced to unsupervised probation after he pays $3,675 in court costs and restitution to the state. … 'It's the department's responsibility to make sure everyone pays their fair share of taxes,' said Kim Brooks, director of public affairs for the Department of Revenue. 'That's what we did here.'" The Star adds, "Adams said he's innocent but wanted a quick resolution. He said he's working on a settlement on the federal charges. … He said the state case started when the U.S. Internal Revenue Service audited him. He said the audit showed he owed more money than he originally stated. He said they then passed the information on to the N.C. Department of Revenue." The Star notes, "In the federal case, the U.S. Department of Justice claims that Adams, along with Demetria S. Adams, prepared tax returns that understated wages and overstated credits, which resulted in excessive refunds. … The suit against the couple states they defrauded the government of $3.8 million in more than 1,600 tax returns filed between 2004 and 2005 through businesses called First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby. … A July 2 trial date has been scheduled in U.S. District Court in front of Judge Dennis Howell, said Andrew Ames, a Justice Department spokesman."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's State Of The Union To Focus On Domestic Agenda. Even as the media and the political debate in the nation continue to focus on the Iraq war, media reports this morning indicate President Bush will focus his State of the Union speech on domestic politics. The AP (1/23, Ben Feller) reports Bush will speak on "important plans for health care, education and other kitchen table topics that have little to do with Iraq." The Chicago Tribune (1/23, Silva, 617K) says the President is "planning a State of the Union address Tuesday night heavy on health care, energy and education," attempting "to get beyond a raging debate over the war in Iraq as he faces a new Democratic-controlled Congress for the first time. … The president, who plans to confront war critics in a speech starting at 8 p.m. CST and running longer than 40 minutes, also plans to spell out what the White House calls 'bold proposals' on health care, energy independence, global warming and immigration." The Tribune adds, "As Bush presses an ambitious domestic agenda for the remaining two years of his presidency, he will find himself facing a hostile new audience with a Democratic-controlled Congress unwilling to accept his stance on the war and ready to relegate him to lame-duck status as 2008 presidential campaigns get underway."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Feldmann, 59K) also says that "as he seeks to show that he is not consumed by the Iraq war and its high-profile retooling, this year's annual message to Congress takes on added significance. In an effort to grab public attention, he is promising a different type of State of the Union – not the usual laundry list of items from the forthcoming budget, but a more focused look at a few key initiatives, most of them domestic. … This year, the most extensively previewed plan centers on a tax reform aimed at making health insurance more affordable to low-income people. The proposal would also reduce the tax break for more expensive health plans."

The Washington Times (1/23, Curl, 88K) says Bush "will reach out to Democrats in tonight's State of the Union address, pursuing common ground with his political adversaries on issues such as immigration, education and energy policy." Bush "plans a broad and thematic speech that will placate Republicans while seeking a central ground with Democrats, who along with a majority of Americans oppose Mr. Bush's strategy to deploy another 21,000 U.S. troops to Iraq."

A lot of the coverage in today's newspapers portrays the President as very weakened politically as he readies for his address tonight. The New York Times (1/23, Rutenberg, Pear, 1.16M) headlines its front-page report "Bush, At Low Point In Polls, Will Push Domestic Agenda," and says "the president's advisers said they hoped Mr. Bush's address would re-energize his domestic agenda by striking a bipartisan and ambitious tone as he faces further isolation on his Iraq policy. 'The power of the ideas requires people to take notice and take seriously important domestic initiatives,' said Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor. 'There will be key signals to the American people that despite disagreements over the war, other work can be done.'"

The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Baker, Cohen, 690K), under the headline "Bush To Face Skeptical Congress," refers to Bush's expected proposals as "recycled," adding the "uproar over his decision to send more US troops to Iraq has eclipsed potential consensus on domestic policy." Bush "faces deep skepticism inside the chamber, even within the House Republican leadership. … The doubt on Capitol Hill reflects the continuing erosion of Bush's public support across the country. His approval rating is at the lowest level of his presidency."

Television coverage last night largely ignored the run-up to the State of the Union speech, once again focusing on the Iraq debate in Congress and on the presidential candidacy of Sen. Hillary Clinton. But as was the case with much of the print media, what coverage there was dealt with the President's weakened political position as he prepares to deliver his speech. The CBS Evening News (1/22, lead story, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M), at the end of a story about recent poll data showing dwindling support for the President's Iraq plan (with 59% opposing the war and only 28% approving of Bush's performance), wondered whether Bush is "going to try to use the State of the Union speech to change the subject" or "stay focused on Iraq." CBS (Axelrod) added that "he's going to try to address domestic subjects. But when we asked in our poll what is the single most important issue facing Americans, the Iraq war, 33%, by far and away number one. Everything else single digits."

On NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Bush is "not doing well. Here is the all-important favorable rating for the President: Only 35% approve of his performance as President, 60% disapprove. … Are his numbers are short term setback? 25% [say yes], a long term setback, 65%. And that includes 40% of those Republicans say it is long term difficulties for…Bush." If Congress "opposes sending the troops, should the President listen to Congress? Two out of three Americans say listen to Congress. Do not send more troops. But then this. Should Congress cut off funding? 41% say yes, 52% say no do not cut off funding for the war and that includes one half of the independent voters, one third of Democrats. People still do not want to cut off funding for the war in Iraq."

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, A6, Harwood, 2.04M) says "Bush tonight gets another shot at persuading Americans to support his Iraq war strategy and domestic agenda. His problem: Much of the public has stopped listening to him." The "new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll on the eve of Mr. Bush's State of the Union address underscores the extent to which he has lost the nation's ear. Just 22% of Americans say they want the president to set policy for the country, 27% express confidence in his goals, and 28% approve his handling of the Iraq war."

Florida Today (1/23, Wheeler, 81K) reports, "Florida lawmakers differ on whether President Bush heads into his sixth State of the Union address in a position to dictate the terms of his final two years in office or so weakened by events that it doesn't much matter what he says." Rep. Allen Boyd (D) said Bush's "political capital is certainly not what it was two years ago. That creates some different dynamics for him." Florida Today adds, "The once-swaggering Bush has admitted he made mistakes in Iraq." But GOP Sen. Mel Martinez "believes Bush's troop surge strategy has put the president on the offensive." Martinez said, "This is the best way for him to continue to be relevant over the next two years."

Bush's Claims That US Was "Winning" In Iraq In 2006 SOTU Noted. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Ballinger, 2.04M), on its website, "took a look back at some of the vows -- both memorable and now-obscure -- that President Bush has made in his State of the Union addresses, to see whether they made it from the rostrum to reality. The Journal notes that last year Bush said of Iraq: "we are winning. … As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels." However, the Journal notes that "after perhaps the bloodiest year for both American troops and Iraqis since the 2003 invasion, the strategy in Iraq has shifted dramatically -- as has the language used to discuss the conflict." The Journal goes on to analyze portions of each of the president's past State of the Union speeches.

DC Mayor Declines Invitation To Sit With First Lady. The Washington Post (1/23, B1, Silverman, 690K) reports, "DC Mayor Adrian M. Fenty has declined a White House invitation to sit with first lady Laura Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, deciding to attend the event as a guest of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi." Fenty spokeswoman Carrie Brooks "confirmed yesterday that the city's new mayor will sit in the gallery along with others invited by Pelosi (D-Calif.), who recently became speaker after Democrats took control of the House of Representatives." The Post adds, "Although former mayor Anthony A. Williams, like Fenty, is a Democrat, Williams sat with the wife of Republican President Bush. … During his campaign for mayor, however, Fenty pledged that he would not sit as a guest of the White House because the president had not supported the city's quest for voting representation in Congress." The Washington Times (1/23, Emerling, 88K) also reports the story.

Pelosi Invites "Cluster Of Political Stars" To Speech. In its "Reliable Source" column, the Washington Post (1/23, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports, "The party's not over! Newly minted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will not only sit behind President Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, but she's filling the normally staid speaker's box with a cluster of political stars." The Post adds, "Many of Pelosi's guests, who will sit in 21 balcony seats, will be past and present celebs of the Democratic Party: former speakers Jim Wright and Tom Foley, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Washington's Adrian Fenty. Pelosi also invited two of the more influential 9/11 widows, Carrie Lemack and Mary Fetchet, and the wives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman and vice chairman, Lynne Pace and Cindy Giambastiani."

Webb Reportedly Drafting His Own SOTU Response. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, Chaddock, 59K) reports Sen. James Webb "is giving the Democratic response to this year's State of the Union – an unusually high profile for a freshman. But no Democrat in the Congress is more primed to talk on the No. 1 issue in congressional politics: the endgame in Iraq. 'We have never clearly defined what a win is – never, not since 2002,' says Webb, on a brisk walk through the Capitol basement after President Bush announced an increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq. One of them will be Webb's son, Jimmy, whose Marine unit has just been extended for an additional 60 days in Iraq. A decorated combat marine, Webb knows – and can articulate – the human face of war with an authority that is rare on Capitol Hill." The Monitor notes, "Aides say he is drafting his own response to the State of the Union, working mainly in the evenings, although Democratic leaders will have a say in the final language."

Bush To Unveil Healthcare Initiative. Among the proposals President Bush is expected to be announced tonight in his State of the Union speech, his federal healthcare reform plan is getting the most media attention. The AP (1/23, Ben Feller) reports Bush "will propose a tax deduction of $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families regardless of whether they buy their own health insurance or receive medical coverage at work. Health care insurance would be considered taxable income, and people with more generous policies could face tax increases unless they change plans. The administration says its plan will help people who buy insurance individually rather than through their employers." USA Today (1/23, Wolf, Jackson, 2.27M) says "Bush's plan would financially reward states that make basic private policies more widely available. … The president's plan would not involve any new federal money. It would redirect some of the $30 billion the government spends annually to care for people without health insurance who show up at hospitals and emergency rooms."

The Miami Herald (1/23, Fletcher, 286K) reports, "The proposal…marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans. Administration officials familiar with the plan say it reflects the new political order in Washington, where Democrats now control both chambers of Congress. They refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government."

The New York Times (1/23, Rutenberg, Pear, 1.16M) reports the "initial response to Mr. Bush's health care plans has not been positive, on Capitol Hill or among constituencies including employers and labor unions." The Times notes, "Labor leaders were outspoken in opposing the plan. … Several public health officials reacted with alarm to Mr. Bush's plan to encourage states to take Medicaid money now earmarked for public hospitals and use it for state programs to cover the uninsured."

The AP (1/23, Freking) also reports "Bush's proposed tax deduction for health insurance appears to be shaping up as a tough sell in the Democratic Congress." Rep. Pete Stark (D) said, "Under the guise of tax breaks, the president is pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based health care system through which 160 million people receive coverage." The AP continues, "Stark, who oversees a key House Ways and Means subcommittee, said he would not consider holding hearings on the proposal." The AP adds, "Insurers said the tax proposal would mostly help the nearly 17 million people who buy coverage through the individual or small group market. Their ranks include real estate agents, consultants and employees of small businesses that don't offer health coverage. Also benefiting would be those in newer industries where the workers tend to be younger and the health coverage is more basic, such as technology." The Washington Post (1/23, A1, Baker, Cohen, 690K) also reports the President "faces deep skepticism" in Congress, "even within the House Republican leadership,"

The Washington Times (1/23, Curl, 88K) quotes White House press secretary Tony Snow saying, "Americans want a [health care] system that's going to be more patient-friendly and that's going to meet their needs. … The president will talk about that. Education, always important ... Immigration has been an issue of considerable concern within this country."

The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Reynolds, 850K) reports that Bush "is expected to talk in more depth about an idea he floated over the weekend: that the tax code should put a limit on how much of workers' health insurance premiums are tax deductible. … The administration argues that while some Americans would have to pay taxes on some of their employer-provided insurance, that would make it easier for uninsured workers and the self-employed to buy coverage on the open market. The idea is opposed by the administration's major business allies, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce." The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) also says "the Bush approach adds to a growing list of proposals for expanding medical insurance coverage and dealing with other aspects of healthcare. Like the others, it is likely to fuel the coming debate on the issue in Congress and on the campaign trail."

Leavitt Proposes Giving Governors Greater Flexibility With Federal Healthcare Money. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "With Bush expected to address concern about rising premiums and shrinking coverage tonight in his State of the Union speech, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt offered governors greater leeway in how they use federal healthcare money for the poor if they would take the lead on offering help to the estimated 47 million now uninsured. … Leavitt, in a session with reporters, outlined what he called an 'affordable choices initiative,' which he said was the second major piece of the administration's plan, along with a proposal to tax high-value medical insurance provided by employers to some workers. Under the initiative, the federal government could reallocate as much as $40 billion a year that now goes to hospitals and other providers that treat large numbers of uninsured and low-income patients, he said."

WPost Approves Of Bush Initiative's Goals. The Washington Post (1/23, A16, 690K) editorializes, "At present, people who get health insurance from employers pay no tax on the value of the benefit. Someone with a marginal tax rate of 35 percent and a generous insurance policy worth $20,000 a year gets a $7,000 tax break. But people who buy insurance on the individual market must usually do so with post-tax dollars, so their tax break is normally zero. The administration proposes to eliminate that unfairness by giving salaried workers and freelancers the same tax deduction." The Post adds, "Rather than embracing tax deductions, which are most valuable to people in high tax brackets, Mr. Bush could have made his proposal even more progressive by recommending a refundable tax credit that would be worth the same to everyone." However, the Post says, "the president is right to go after the existing system of tax subsidies for health care. Like the deductions for mortgage interest, these subsidies are regressive and have perverse consequences. Mr. Bush has kicked off a needed discussion."

Universal Health Care Foundation Calls Plan Unaffordable. The New Haven Register (1/23, O'Leary, 82K) reports, "President Bush's plan to make health insurance affordable for more people is getting a thumbs down from one advocacy group, which has more faith in the efforts of individual states to tackle the problem. … Janet Davenport, spokeswoman for the Universal Health Care Foundation, said the fact that the president is addressing the issue recognizes there is a problem." Davenport "said individuals and families who can't afford insurance are in low-tax brackets and making premiums tax-deductible 'would be virtually meaningless.' She said while it is hopeful the issue is again on the national agenda, Connecticut has an opportunity to move forward before the federal government."

"spotlighted health savings accounts" in his State of the Union address last year, and Congress has since "tweaked" the accounts, "enrollment in them hasn't really budged and few people know the facts about them." The Republic adds, "In comparing 2005 enrollment numbers with 2006 figures, Kaiser Family Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based health care policy group, found no statistical difference between the two."

Bush Addresses Pro-Life March, Expresses Opposition To Stem Cell Bill. The AP (1/23) reports, "President Bush marked the 34th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision Monday, telling thousands of abortion foes he shares their goal of seeing 'the day when every child is welcomed in life and protected into law.'" Bush also "signaled his unchanged opposition to a key goal of the Democrats who now control Congress: broadening embryonic stem-cell research. 'Our challenge is to make sure that science serves the cause of humanity instead of the other way around,' the president said in a telephone call piped over loudspeakers to a Washington rally of opponents of abortion rights. 'I have made clear to the Congress, we must pursue medical advances in the name of life, not at the expense of it.'" Bush "calls the rally each year, usually from distant locations. This year, he extended his weekend stay at the Camp David presidential retreat in the Maryland mountains to phone the participants from there."

The New York Times (1/23, Abruzzese, 1.16M) reports that in his remarks, Bush also "mentioned his signing the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which is before the Supreme Court in a case to be decided this term."

The Washington Post (1/23, A10, Chandler, Boorstein, 690K) estimated that "tens of thousands of abortion opponents marched through melting snow on the Mall yesterday and vowed to work harder -- since Democrats have taken control of the Capitol -- to overturn the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion in 1973." The Washington Times (1/23, Lively, Wagner, 88K) also reports the story.

Brownback, Hunter Pledge To Overturn Roe. The AP (1/23, Hananel) reports, "Two of the Republicans' most conservative presidential hopefuls promised anti-abortion activists on Monday that if elected, they would work to overturn the Supreme Court decision legalizing the procedure." Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R) and CA52 Rep. Duncan Hunter (R) "addressed the annual March for Life marking the anniversary of the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling. 'We recognize a tragedy of life in Roe v. Wade, but that tragedy will not always stand,' Brownback told thousands of cheering abortion foes at an afternoon rally." Hunter, meanwhile, told the crowd, "If we have a judicial applicant, a judicial nominee who can look at a sonogram of an unborn child and not see the value of human life…if I should become president of the United States, he will not receive a judicial appointment,' Hunter said."

McClatchy (1/23, Stearns) reports, "Dozens of blue 'Brownback for President' posters dotted the National Mall, where marchers gathered before proceeding to the Supreme Court. Well-wishers approached to urge him on. … 'God bless you, Sam! You are the next president, in the name of Jesus!' shouted a voice near the onstage microphone after Brownback's speech. A surprising response for an underfunded politician mired at 1 or 2 percent in national polls? Not in this crowd. To many marchers, Brownback isn't an asterisk, he's a hero. And that's what gives Brownback hope that his grassroots-oriented campaign could take the establishment by surprise." McClatchy adds, "And what of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, two Republican front-runners? Neither was at the march."

Portman Outlines Bush Plan For Balancing Budget. In an op-ed in USA Today (1/23, 10A, 2.27M) OMB Director Rob Portman writes, "Three years ago, President Bush established the goal of cutting the federal budget deficit by half in five years, without raising taxes. At the time, many — including USA TODAY— expressed skepticism. But it was achieved last year, three years ahead of schedule. Now is the time to build on that success and work with Congress to balance the budget in the next five years. … The president's budget will demonstrate how balance can be achieved by using cautious economic and revenue projections in line with forecasts by outside experts. On spending, the president will propose realistic restraint, while increasing funding for the global war on terror, including all costs of Iraq and Afghanistan over the next two years."

USA Today Dismisses Bush Plan. USA Today (1/23, 10A, 2.27M), in an editorial, writes, "President Bush is expected to call for a balanced budget by 2012. In other words, after turning the Clinton-era surpluses into six straight years of deficits and putting the nation almost $3 trillion deeper into debt, he now wants to see the budget balanced after he leaves office, just as the demographic tidal wave of baby boomer retirements begins to inundate the federal ledgers in red ink. Call us party poopers, but that hardly seems reason to break out the champagne."

University Of Dallas Withdraws Bush Library Bid. The AP (1/23, Brown) reports the University of Dallas "withdrew its bid for George W. Bush's presidential library Monday, citing the library site selection committee's exclusive talks with nearby Southern Methodist University. Last month SMU emerged as the apparent winner for the library with the announcement of the negotiations, putting it ahead of the other two finalists, the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco."

Methodist Activist Opposes SMU's Bush Library Proposal. Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (1/22) aired a segment on "where to put President Bush's library." Host Bill O'Reilly noted the "first choice is Southern Methodist University in Dallas but that is raising some controversy even though it would mean a lot of money for the school some Methodists are objecting on ideological grounds." Rev. Fred Kandeler, of the Methodist Committee for Social Action, appeared on the show and maintained, "there's been a disconnect between the Bush presidency and his positions on many issues, and the social principles or teachings of the church. … We're talking about issues on war and torture. Issues of poverty and economic justice. We're talking about issues of the death penalty and environmental protection."

Paulson, Portman Meet With New Democrat Coalition Members. The Hill (1/23, Snyder) reports the White House "reached out to Democrats last week in advance of President Bush's planned attendance at a party retreat later this month." Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman met with the New Democrat Coalition. NDC chairwoman Ellen Tauscher "said the meeting grew out of a phone conversation Paulson initiated with her over the holiday break. She described the exchange on the Hill as a 'meet-and-greet' event that lasted an hour. The two administration officials talked about trade and budget issues without getting into specifics, she said."

Gates Praised Carter In His 1996 Memoirs. The Washington Post (1/23, A15, Ricks, 690K) reports that in his memoirs Defense Secretary Gates "leaps repeatedly to the defense of Jimmy Carter, the sole Democrat for whom he worked, who was often seen as weak on the Soviet Union and taken by surprise when it invaded Afghanistan in December 1979. Gates's 1996 book, 'From the Shadows,' is now being combed for insights into the new defense secretary's thinking, how he might run the Pentagon and what he's had to say about his past bosses. When it comes to Carter, it isn't that Gates, a career Sovietologist who rose to become CIA director, is a closet dove. Rather, he thinks Carter was far tougher on Moscow than is generally recognized. … By contrast, Gates describes the first president for whom he worked, Richard Nixon, as 'by far the most liberal' of the group. (Gates also shows a bit of dovish ankle, revealing that before leaving the CIA to work in the Nixon White House, he marched in a May 1970 antiwar demonstration.)"

Byrd Among Democrats Opposed To "Modest" Line-Item Veto Bill. In an AP analysis piece (1/23) Andrew Taylor writes that the Senate "is moving toward its first vote in more than a decade on the line-item veto, and it's remarkable how much has changed — particularly the positions of many of the major players. … Put forward by Sen. Judd Gregg it's far weaker than the line-item veto power a GOP-dominated Congress gave President Clinton in 1996. Under that bill, before it was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, Clinton's line-item vetoes automatically went into effect unless overturned by a two-thirds vote of both House and Senate. Still, debate on Gregg's plan already has whipped up passions. Most adamant in opposition is Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., who assaulted the idea last week and again Monday as an attack on Congress' control over the federal purse strings."

Senate Minimum Wage Bill Exempts American Samoa's Tuna Industry. The Washington Times (1/23, Hurt, 88K) reports the Senate "took up a bill yesterday that would raise the minimum wage across the United States and its territories but exempt American Samoa, where tuna canneries pay workers $3.26 an hour." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "told reporters less than two weeks ago that she would close the loophole after coming under criticism from Republicans for what they termed a 'fishy favor' to StarKist Tuna. StarKist has lobbied for years against raising the minimum wage in American Samoa, and its parent, Del Monte Corp., is based in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district. … The House, however, passed the minimum-wage bill with the American Samoa exemption. And yesterday, Senate Democrats were moving ahead with the original legislation, which for the first time would enforce the minimum wage on the Northern Mariana Islands, another territory in the Pacific with a similarly low minimum wage."

Emanuel Works To Establish Cordial Relations With GOP Members. The Chicago Tribune (1/23, Zuckman, 617K) reports, "After mercilessly attacking the GOP for close to two years for what he called incompetence and blind allegiance to the failed policies of a failed president," Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, "acknowledged that he has some work to do in re-establishing a sense of trust on the other side of the aisle." The Tribune reports that Emanuel recently met with several GOP members of congress, including "notable moderates" Reps. Mike Castle, Jo Ann Emerson and Fred Upton, "along with a couple of conservatives—all chosen by Rep. Ray LaHood, co-host of the get-together. … LaHood organized the dinner with the understanding that Republicans could ask Emanuel anything they want." The Tribune notes that "when moderate Republicans needed a regular meeting space, Emanuel provided it for them after their own leaders declined. And he spearheaded an invitation to President Bush to address Democrats at their upcoming retreat in Williamsburg, Va., which the president accepted."

Liberal Groups Intend To Keep Pressure On Democrats. The AP (1/23, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Democratic lawmakers who stray too far from the party line could find themselves facing primary opponents financed by unions, trial lawyers and political activists eager to put the new congressional majority to the test." In addition to anti-war groups, recently "an influential group of organizers from labor and the liberal movement" created "a lobbying wing called They Work For Us and a campaign arm called Working for Us PAC — that will target lawmakers who don't support their agenda of raising wages, increasing jobs, providing more affordable health care and preventing job losses to foreign countries."

GOP Members Back Strict Congressional Ethics Reform. The Washington Times (1/23, Miller, 88K), in an article titled, "GOP Pushes For Stricter Ethics Reform," reports, "The debates on a House bill that would nix federal pensions for convicted lawmakers and a Senate measure to cut pork spending underscored how scandal-scarred Republicans are backing broader ethics reforms than the new Democratic majority is. 'We did have colleagues who violated the trust of the Congress and the public. We have to fix it,' said Rep. Lee Terry, a Nebraska Republican whose pension-reform bill was sidelined by Democratic leaders in favor of a weaker bill." The Time notes that the House "started considering a bill by Rep. Nancy Boyda, Kansas Democrat, that denies federal pensions to members of Congress convicted of bribery, perjury and conspiracy offenses related to the lawmaker's office. … Separate bills by Mr. Terry and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, would have withheld the pension from lawmakers convicted of a longer list of felonies, including some unrelated to abuse of office -- ranging from white-collar embezzlement crimes to political crimes such as securing campaign contributions by intimidation."

Senate Private Jet Restriction Would Apply To Presidential Candidates. USA Today (1/23, Schouten, 2.27M) reports the Senate's plan "to require members traveling aboard plush private jets to pay full charter fares also would force changes in travel by all presidential candidates. Under the Senate-passed ethics bill, senators extended their new rules for reimbursement of such travel to any candidate seeking federal office. … House ethics rules, approved earlier this month, ban all corporate jet travel. The Senate measure exempts senators who have their own planes or whose spouses own them. The two measures must be reconciled by Congress. Travel aboard private planes has long been a favored perk for members of Congress and presidential candidates. The practice came under scrutiny during the investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who paid for trips by members on private jets."

Van Hollen Praised For "Bundling" Disclosure Amendment. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/23, A16, 690K) says, "Last year, as the House Judiciary Committee was debating lobbying reform," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Chris Van Hollen "offered an amendment that would have required lobbyists to report not just the campaign contributions they give directly to lawmakers but also the campaign checks they 'bundle,' or solicit for or deliver to lawmakers. Astonishingly, this proposal passed the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 28 to 4. Less astonishingly, the provision had disappeared from the final version of the bill when it was brought up for debate on the House floor." Now, "with Democrats in charge of the House and Mr. Van Hollen ensconced at the campaign committee, the obvious temptation would be to let the matter drop." To his "credit, Mr. Van Hollen, along with Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), plans to introduce a measure today that would require such disclosure." Van Hollen "is right to insist that the bundlers be brought to light."

Survey Shows Managers Reluctant To Participate In Telecommuting Programs. The Washington Post's (1/23, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Concerns over employee productivity and a lack of control over employee activities make it difficult for federal managers to support telecommuting, according to a survey released yesterday. But federal managers also think telecommuting improves 'work-life balance' for employees, and makes their agencies more competitive in hiring and keeping employees, the survey found." The Post adds that the survey was sponsored by "Telework Exchange, which brings federal officials and technology professionals together to promote telecommuting, and the Federal Managers Association, which represents the interests of nearly 200,000 supervisors and managers across government" and notes that "a relatively small number" of managers "214, responded." The Post adds, "The most recent data show that only 19 percent of eligible federal workers can be considered telecommuters, and managerial resistance is seen as the reason for what some officials consider to be a relatively low participation rate, given the size of the government."

Kristof Compares Bush To Captain Ahab. Nicholas Kristof writes in his column for the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) that President Bush "has made the classics powerfully resonant today" and compares the war in Iraq with Thucydides's account of Athenian war in Sicily. After, "the war went badly" the Athenians "went with the 'surge'" but "the result was a catastrophic defeat." Kristof also compares President Bush to Captain Ahab who "abandons all rules and limits in his quest." He concludes, "Melville captures the trajectory of the Bush years." Because "Mr. Bush became obsessed by his responsibility to prevent another terror attack. This was an eminently worthy goal, but Mr. Bush abandoned traditional rules and boundaries" so "the compulsive search for security ended up creating insecurity."

OTHER NEWS:

Productivity Growth Slowest In Over A Decade.

The Financial Times (1/23, Giles) reports, "The US economy last year recorded its lowest rate of labour productivity growth in more than a decade, with growth in output per hour worked falling behind the EU and Japan. The fall casts further doubt on the ability of the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates as the US economy slows." The Times adds, "Research to be published on Tuesday by the Conference Board, the international business organisation, shows that US labour productivity in the whole economy grew by 1.4 per cent in 2006 as slower economic growth was combined with a rapid rise in employment."

Stocks Down. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 9, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, the Dow was down more than 88 points [to close at 12,477.16]. NASDAQ was also down during today's trading more than 20 points [to close at 2,431.07]. USA Today/Bloomberg (1/23, 6B) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 fell 7.55 points, or 0.5%, to 1422.95."

Pump Prices Fall Another 6 Cents. ABC World News (1/22, story 7, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Some good news for drivers tonight. The government says the price of gas fell another 6 cents in the past week to a national average of $2.17 a gallon and analysts say the recent drop in crude oil prices could push gas below $2 in the next month."

Growth Said Not To Be Necessary Cause Of Inflation. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/23), Robert McTeer of the National Center for Policy Analysis says, "While a weaker economy might well reduce inflation, that isn't a necessary condition. Faster growth can also reduce inflation." Supply-side economics "is out of favor at universities that don't have good football teams. But that's largely because its bar for success has been raised too high. Tax-rate cuts may not fully pay for themselves at current rate levels, but they certainly have gone a long way in that direction, as the recent sharp decline in the budget deficit despite rapid spending growth clearly indicates. Tax-rate cuts that substantially pay for themselves in higher tax revenue are clearly a good thing."

Class Of 2007 Encounters Thriving Job Market.

The Wall Street Journal (1/23, B1, White, 2.04M) reports, "This year is shaping up as the strongest for college recruiting since the downturn earlier this decade, colleges report. Traditionally heavy recruiters, including management consulting firms, investment banks and accounting firms, are intensifying college recruiting efforts. They're also facing more competition from other employers in such fields as technology, consumer products, government and even nonprofits." Employers "plan to hire 17% more graduates from the class of 2007 than they got from the class of 2006, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers. That would make this year the strongest job market since 2000-2001, the association says. More than half of the surveyed employers said they planned to increase hiring; only 5% planned a decrease. Salaries were forecast to rise 4.6%, according to another survey by the same group. … Behind the increased recruiting are a relatively strong economy, growing business demands and heady corporate profits. Employers created about 1.8 million additional jobs in 2006. Average weekly earnings rose 4.5%, compared with a 3.2% increase in 2005."

Job Turnover Seen As Positive Force. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/23, A17), Deputy Secretary of the Treasury Roger Kimmitt says, "More than 55 million Americans, or four out of every 10 workers, left their jobs in 2005. And this is good news, because there were over 57 million new hires that same year. These statistics illustrate a recent and growing trend of dynamism in our job market, especially among younger workers." The data "show that each month millions of Americans leave their jobs -- most of them voluntarily -- and millions more are hired. This is what we want: an economy in which people looking to move up have as many opportunities as possible from which to choose. Promoting this dynamism, and the opportunities it creates, should be a focus of our economic policy."

NFIB Remaking Itself Into Nonpartisan Lobby.

The Washington Post's "In the Loop: On K Street" column (1/23, A15, Birnbaum) reports the National Federation of Independent Business, "a bastion of Republicanism," is changing its image. New President Todd A. Stottlemyer "wants to rebrand the nation's premier small-business lobby as 'nonpartisan,' and to prove his resolve he is talking extensively to Democrats and preparing to donate more to their coffers. … With many lobbying shops scooping up Democrats after last November's elections, Stottlemyer's effort may not seem that newsworthy. But for NFIB, it is huge. Stottlemyer's predecessor, Jack Faris, was viewed as a zealous partisan. A former executive director of the Republican National Finance Committee, Faris stopped talking even to pro-business Democrats in the House after he got involved in a shouting match over dinner with a group of Blue Dogs half a dozen years ago."

Hillary Kicks Off Media Blitz With Network Interviews, Blog Chat. NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 2, 2:05, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Trying to temper the Obama buzz created by his announcement last week, Senator Hillary Clinton has burst onto the campaign field. Her online announcement followed a highly choreographed and newly minted anti-war stance and now a second round of TV interviews, Webchats and appearances meant to highlight her agenda including healthcare." Sen. Hilary Clinton: "It is simply wrong for any child in America to go without health insurance." Gregory: "The early emphasis is on the softer side of Mrs. Clinton. What advisors say is a concerted attempt to firm up her support among women."

The Washington Post (1/23, A2, Kornblut, 690K) reports that with a "call to 'let the conversation begin,' Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) fielded a handful of pre-selected questions from voters on her presidential campaign's Web site last night, speaking into a video camera as she held forth on movies ('Out of Africa' makes her top three), her football-fanatic brothers and her 'nice middle-class upbringing in a suburb of Chicago.'" The "effort to 'humanize' Clinton, as her advisers have put it, was in full swing just two days into her presidential campaign." The online chat "came amid what, for Clinton, is a media blitz at the outset of her campaign for president. She appeared on all three major television networks last night, is scheduled to appear on the morning shows today, and will hold two more online discussions on her Web site tonight and tomorrow."

The New York Times (1/23, Healy, 1.16M) reports Clinton "strived for an Oprah moment yesterday night, the third of her presidential campaign, by sitting in a fake living-room set and fielding questions on a live video Webcast about her vote for the Iraq war (if she had known then), universal health care (still wants it) and her favorite movies ('The Wizard of Oz,' 'Casablanca' and 'Out of Africa')." Clinton aides "say the Webcast demonstrates her determination to speak directly to voters, in as many ways as new technology allows, instead of dealing only with a news media that has sometimes been intensely skeptical of her actions and motives." The questions "e-mailed from Linda in Pensacola, Fla., and other visitors to the Web site were vetted by Mrs. Clinton's staff and offered or elicited few surprises." Her "answers suggested various personas that she wants to convey to voters: a hometown girl, a mother, a moviegoer, a churchgoer, a standard-bearer for women and a critic of the war."

Fox News' Special Report (1/22, Hume) reported that Sen. Hillary Clinton's "weekend announcement raised Democratic eyebrows as an obvious attempt to make her appear warm and likable. Polls suggest Clinton leaves voters cold. She met with families of the victims of 9/11 in New York today and will make her first campaign trip to Iowa this weekend." Billionaire activist donor George Soros "is helping [Sen. Barack] Obama – another sign the antiwar left remains unmotivated, not to say antagonistic, towards Clinton. Then there is her history. She had hoped to stay out of the harsh spotlight of scrutiny until later this spring, but now knows it will not be long before her appearances in the federal court in the 1990's and such things as Whitewater, her husband's impeachment, and her various combative and controversial statements over the years will be revisited in excruciating detail."

Clinton Does Round Of Interviews On Network News. ABC World News (1/22, story 6, 5:25, Gibson, 8.78M) interviewed Sen. Hillary Clinton, who said, "I think my experience and my understanding of the problems facing our country equip me to be the best person to take over in January 2009 when we will be facing a lot of problems at home and abroad and frankly, inheriting many of the problems that have been made worse by this Administration." Clinton said she wants to "be an instrument of bold but practical solutions, weather it is healthcare, making it universal, energy independence, finally dealing with climate change, restoring our leadership and respect for America around the world." Asked if she would "take a pledge not to sign a bill that would raise taxes," Clinton said, "Oh, I'm not going to take any pledges about any issue, because I want to be in a position to bring people together to figure out the best ideas to solve our problems and not get locked into this, you know, partisan ideological debate that's been so sterile so many years." Clinton added the Iraq war and domestic needs required making "some tough decisions."

The CBS Evening News (1/22, story 4, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Sen. Clinton. Asked why she would not support a vote "to cut off funding" for the Iraq war "so the President can't carry out this policy," Clinton said, "I am opposed to the escalation that the President has proposed. Unfortunately, the fact is he is carrying out the policy. He already had in motion the movement of troops into Iraq. What we're trying to do is send a bipartisan message, if possible, that we disapprove of this escalation." Asked to respond to those who "have questions about your electability," Clinton said, "I would say give me a chance. As a friend of mine said the other day, I'm the most famous woman that nobody really knows."

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 5, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed Clinton. Williams asked how she would "have to adjust to counter the presence of this Obama campaign, which is a surprise?" Sen. Hilary Clinton: "Well, you know, Brian, this is exactly how I intended to do this. Once I made up my mind that I was going to contest for the presidential nomination of my party, I wanted to do it on the Web, I wanted to do it before the President's State of the Union, because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office."

Clinton Disapproval At 36% In CBS Poll. On the CBS Evening News (1/22, story 5, 1:00, Couric, 7.66M), Gloria Borger said, "Hillary Clinton knows well that she is well-known. That she comes with an awful lot of political baggage. But in our poll tonight, Katie, we see that as many people approve of her as disapprove of her. It's actually a tie, 36% to 36%. But she does have one thing really working in her favor, it's her great strength. After six years as a Senator people believe in our poll by overwhelming margin that she has the credentials and leadership skills to be president."

Hillary Has Early National Lead In WPost Poll. The Financial Times (1/23, Callan) reports Hillary Clinton "has launched her race for the White House with a commanding lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential candidacy, according to an opinion poll published on Sunday." The Washington Post poll shows Clinton "was backed by 41 per cent of Democrats questioned, more than double the 17 per cent rating of Mr Obama."

Russert Says Hillary Faces "Toughly Fought Primary." On NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 3, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Hillary Clinton will "be the frontrunner because of the money, the machine, her visibility, her high poll numbers and a national perspective. But we can't forget that this race will be decided in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina. States that could be anti-war, pro-labor, high African American turnout like in South Carolina. In those four states, the race with Barack Obama and John Edwards and Hillary Clinton is very competitive. She's not yet been anointed, nor will she be. This will be a toughly-fought primary battle."

Bill Clinton Signals Wife Will Make Healthcare A Centerpiece Of Campaign. The Hill (1/23, Cusack, Young) reports former President Clinton "has signaled privately that his wife…will include aggressive healthcare proposals in her campaign for the White House, despite the debacle of what critics labeled 'Hillary Care' 14 years ago." In remarks "to Democratic operatives last month, the ex-president caused a buzz by strongly defending the substance of his wife's 1990s plan, claiming it was a moderate, private-sector approach grossly mischaracterized by its critics." Clinton's "statements, delivered during a Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) conference at the Charles Hotel in Cambridge, Mass., have been interpreted as signaling that candidate Clinton could revive aspects of her 1993-94 approach that was vilified by Republicans and health-industry groups." The Hill adds the "indications are that Sen. Clinton's strategy will be to turn healthcare, a political weakness, into a strength."

Hillary's Position On Iraq Critiqued. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/23, A17), Liz Cheney, former principal deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, says, "Sen. Hillary Clinton declared this weekend, 'I'm in to win.' Anyone who has watched her remarkable trajectory can have no doubt that she'll do whatever it takes to win the presidency. I wish she felt the same way about the war." Clinton, with "her proposal for arbitrary caps on troop levels and hemming and hawing about her vote for the war resolution, has company on both sides of the aisle. Sen. Joseph Lieberman is the only national Democrat showing any courage on this issue. We Republicans -- with help from senators such as Chuck Hagel -- seem ready to race the Democrats to the bottom." Cheney outlines the case for continuing the war in Iraq, adding, "It's time for everyone -- Republicans and Democrats -- to stop trying to find ways for America to quit. Victory is the only option. We must have the fortitude and the courage to do what it takes. In the words of Winston Churchill, we must deserve victory. We must be in it to win."

Morris Plans Hillary Clinton Expose Film. Political analyst Dick Morris, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/22), said he is "working with a group called Citizens United on a film about Hillary Clinton. It's going to be about 90 minutes long. It's going to play in real movie theaters in all of the early primary states. I'm going to go to those early primary states and give speeches introducing the film. … We are going to have about 30 different shots of her, each with a different hair color, each with a different accent, each with a different affect, each with a different approach and we are going to really showcase the inaccuracies of everything that this woman has said." Morris went on to say that Clinton's "announcement…this weekend has shown how flat-footed she is coming out of the gate which is a surprise to me. I thought she'd be in great shape. … She announces her exploratory committee on a Saturday. Saturday is the worst news day."

Clinton Announcement May Be Death Knell For Public Finance. The New York Times (1/23, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports the "public financing system for presidential campaigns, a post-Watergate initiative hailed for decades as the best way to rid politics of the corrupting influence of money, may have quietly died over the weekend." Sen. Clinton "became the first candidate since the program began in 1976 to forgo public financing for both the primary and the general election because of the spending limits that come with the federal money. By declaring her confidence that she could raise far more than the roughly $150 million the system would provide for the 2008 presidential primaries and general election, Mrs. Clinton makes it difficult for other serious candidates to participate in the system without putting themselves at a significant disadvantage." Federal Election Commission officials and campaign advisers "say they expect the two candidates who reach Election Day 2008 will raise more than $500 million apiece. Including money raised by other primary candidates, the total spent on the presidential election could easily exceed $1 billion."

In a similar story, the Washington Post (1/23, A1, Balz, Mosk, 690K) reports the "public financing system designed to clean up presidential campaigns in the wake of the Watergate scandal may have died on Saturday when" Clinton "announced her bid for the White House." What was "little noticed amid the announcement rollout was a page on her Web site in which she asked potential contributors to give her campaign checks of up to $4,200. That figure signaled not only that she plans to forgo public funds for primary season but also that, if she becomes the nominee, she will not take public money for the general election." Clinton's decision "will put pressure on other candidates in both parties to follow suit, and if they do, the 2008 campaign will complete what has been the rapid disintegration of a system designed to rein in unlimited spending in presidential campaigns."

The AP (1/23, Humbert) reports Clinton's "decision had been widely expected given her and her husband's proven ability to raise vast sums of money quickly. Her advisers have not disputed estimates that she will raise $100 million or more before the year is out." Clinton "already has more than $14 million in the bank, money left from her successful re-election campaign last year. The funds can be spent on her presidential bid."

Viable Candidates Expected To Need $100 Million. The Chicago Tribune (1/23, Dorning, 617K) reports the Iowa caucuses "that kick off the presidential campaign are nearly a year away. For the most viable contenders, make that one year and $100 million away." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has that capacity, and other contenders believe that they do as well." To "wage a serious presidential campaign in 2008, the ante is $50 million raised by Dec. 31 of this year, said one adviser to Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). And that is just to get a place at the table." The Tribune adds, "Those are daunting figures. To make the $100 million mark in a year, a candidate must bring in an average of nearly $2 million a week. That's $274,000 a day, including Sundays and holidays, all of it raised in increments legally limited to no more than $2,100 per person."

ABC World News (1/22, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Never have so many run so early, so hard. Why are we seeing so many candidates declare so early? As you might expect, one of the answers is money." ABC (Tapper) added, "The primary and caucus calendar will likely start earlier and be more front-loaded in 2008. What was typically a four- or five-month process will be condensed to two or three weeks. So candidates need to lay the groundwork in all those states now. And that costs money." Joseph Lockhart, Democratic strategist: "It used to be a candidate with a couple of million dollars in the bank could get them through Iowa, New Hampshire and hope from there. Now you have to be ready to run a full national campaign from day one, and that takes a lot of money."

NBC Nightly News (1/22, story 2, 2:05, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Experts say the rush is for campaign cash, the first test of a candidate's viability." John Harwood, CNBC chief Washington correspondent: "We may see in the first quarter of 2007 at least four candidates, two in each party, raise the kind of sums that George W. Bush ran and broke records with in the year 2000."

WSJournal Says Fundraising Rules Hurt Clinton's Competitors. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Congratulations to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for acknowledging right from the start that she won't accept public money for her White House bid. Now if she'd only admit how much the current fund-raising rules hurt her competitors. Top-tier or wealthy candidates have been forgoing public financing for the Presidential primaries for some time because it limits their spending ability." Contribution limits and the matching funds system were intended to "limit the influence of special interests and make Presidential contests more competitive. The reality is close to the opposite. The system now benefits mainly well-known and well-heeled candidates and thus limits political competition. Serious Presidential contenders like Senator John McCain and Mrs. Clinton begin the race with greater name recognition, long donor lists and the ability to garner far more media attention."

Sniping Between Obama, Clinton Camps Begins. The Financial Times (1/23, Luce) reports the Democratic primary campaign "got into full swing on Monday with campaign staff for Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton already indulging in sniping contests over the relative merits of their candidates." Clinton aides "made indirect attacks on the relative inexperience of Mr Obama, who entered the race a week ago." Democratic consultants "said the campaign, which already includes five other candidates, most notably John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice-presidential candidate, was shaping up to be the most intense and long-running in the party's history." Joe Trippi, campaign manager for Howard Dean in 2004, "said both Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton had been bounced into declaring their candidacies early by the strength of the other's campaign."

Insight Report On Obama's Madrassah Attendance Debunked. The Washington Post (1/23, C7, Kurtz, 690K) reports, "Fresh doubt was cast yesterday on a magazine's allegation that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) attended a madrassah, or religious school that teaches a fundamentalist version of Islam." Hardi Priyono, "deputy headmaster of the Basuki school in Indonesia, told CNN that his institution -- which Obama attended four decades ago, beginning when he was 6 -- is not a madrassah." In an interview with CNN correspondent John Vause, Priyono said, "This is a public school. We don't focus on religion." The Post ads Insight, "a weekly Internet magazine owned by the conservative Washington Times, had reported the madrassah allegation late last week and added, citing unnamed sources, that the information had been unearthed by researchers close to the campaign of Obama's rival for the Democratic presidential nomination Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York."

Media Infatuation With Obama May Be Short-Lived. In his Christian Science Monitor column (1/23), Dante Chinni, a senior associate at the Project for Excellence in Journalism, says Sen. Barack Obama's "life story – father from Kenya, mother from Kansas – makes for compelling copy. But at this point in American political history, an African-American running for president isn't new." For "many in the media, Obama is a candidate to get excited about because he holds the promise of being interesting, different, and able to shake up Washington. And that means Obama-mania will probably be alive and well in the press for at least a few more months. But at some point that lack of a long public history could present some problems for the senator." Right now, "Obama enjoys a sweet story line. But at some point, the media will be eager to fill in the missing pages. And when they do, Obama may find that his biggest strength with the media has its problems."

Newsweek Poll Finds Edwards Fares Best Against Top GOP Candidates. The New York Times (1/23, Broder, 1.16M) reports, "Conventional wisdom may say Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is the Democrats' prohibitive front-runner. But a Newsweek poll released over the weekend, which otherwise shows the candidates tightly bunched, indicates that former Senator John Edwards, below, is the only one to beat the top two potential Republican candidates in head-to-head matchups." The Newsweek poll shows 48% would vote for Edwards, 43% for John McCain; 48% would vote for Clinton, 47% for McCain; 46% would vote for Obama, while 44% would vote for McCain; 48% would vote for Edwards, 45% would vote for Giuliani; 48% would vote for Giuliani, 47% would vote for Clinton; and 47% would vote for Giuliani, 45% would vote for Obama.

Dodd Hopeful His Experience Will Sway Voters. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Calmes, 2.04M) reports that in contrast to the media frenzy around the candidacies of Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, Democratic hopeful Sen. Chris Dodd "travels the country, a year before the first nominating votes, 'hoping someone will show up,' he quips." Dodd's "experiences are typical of the early days of a presidential campaign, which often are humbling, even demeaning, for all but the rare Clinton-like celebrities and Obama-like phenomenons." Dodd has "been in the Senate for more than a quarter-century and was in the House for six years before that. He is chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. And he is an asterisk in early 2008 presidential polls." Yet ask "many Democratic activists whom they'd personally most like to see as president, and Mr. Dodd's name comes up often -- including from some committed to other candidates, notably Mrs. Clinton. Frequently described as witty, smart, and one of the most qualified figures in the party, Mr. Dodd enjoys goodwill beyond Washington from his mid-1990s stint as national party chairman." Despite the "current 'Obama-mania' for his less-seasoned colleague, Mr. Dodd argues that with the nation roiled by war, terrorism and economic globalization, he can persuade voters that his experience is an asset."

Non-Senators Among 2008 Field Seen As Underrated. In his USA Today column (1/23, 11A), Dewayne Wickham says that with "neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney seeking the presidency next year, and foreign policy again the cause of great discontent, a growing number of senators are lining up for the job. And journalists are treating them as though they have the inside track." But in the "current campaign, there's no shortage of governors who have entered — or are poised to enter — the race. Among Democrats, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack have thrown their hats in the ring. And three Republicans who recently left their statehouse jobs — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, and George Pataki of New York — have set up exploratory committees." Don't "let the pundits and the early polls fool you. One of these governors could turn out to be a dark horse candidate, especially if Clinton and Obama split the Democratic Party's liberal base during the primary elections."

Busy Week Ahead For Presidential Candidates. The New York Times (1/23, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports unusual "number of stages" where the 2008 presidential race is "being played on at once." In Washington, there is "a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, a platform that could display the sharply contrasting views on Iraq of" Sens. John McCain and Clinton. Next comes President Bush's State of the Union address, "which many Democrats — notably Mrs. Clinton — view as providing an opportunity to tee off to advance their own presidential campaigns." For the "rest of the week, attention in the Senate will be focused on resolutions critical of President Bush's Iraq policy, giving a platform to other presidential hopefuls, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois, Joseph R. Biden of Delaware, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska." And "at week's end, Mrs. Clinton is making her first trip to Iowa since creating her presidential exploratory committee; it seems fair to surmise that this will not be the kind of small living-room chats — with 10 Democrats and a local reporter or two — that have put the state on the political map." Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani "will be competing for attention by heading for New Hampshire."

Websites Said To Offer Window Into Campaigns. In his Washington Post column (1/23, A17), Eugene Robinson rates the Internet presences of the leading three Democratic candidates: "So what do the Web sites HillaryClinton.com, BarackObama.com and JohnEdwards.com tell us about their namesakes? At first glance, they seem to confirm what we think we already know. Clinton's site evokes a super-competent juggernaut, with every base covered and every hair in place. Obama's is very much a work in progress. And Edwards's Web site suggests the patience, attention to detail and willingness to take risks that you would expect from a trial lawyer who rose from nothing to become a self-made millionaire." The "real difference is depth and ambition. Both Clinton and Obama (he on his Senate campaign Web site) say they want to have a dialogue with the American people about how best to solve the nation's problems. But Edwards has already started his conversation with the nation. His Web site is an exercise in social networking that includes not only a blog, where surfers can post their thoughts, but also cyber-diaries written by Edwards's family members."

Casino Mogul Donates $1 Million To Gingrich 527. The Washington Post (1/23, A4, Solomon, 690K) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "jump-started his new political group with a check for $1 million from a source many in his conservative base would shun -- the gambling industry. Gingrich's American Solutions for Winning the Future reported to the Internal Revenue Service that it collected a $1 million check from Las Vegas Sands Corp. Chairman Sheldon G. Adelson shortly after the November elections. … The contribution dwarfed the other checks, totaling just $60,000, gathered for the group's start-up. Gingrich announced the group late last fall, setting it up as a '527' organization." The post notes Adelson "was listed by Forbes magazine in 2006 as America's third-richest man, with assets of more than $20 billion."

Jindal Seeking Louisiana Governorship Again. The New York Times (1/23, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports Rep. Bobby Jindal will enter the 2007 Louisiana governor's race. … Jindal will be running against a weakened incumbent, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat. Ms. Blanco defeated Mr. Jindal in 2003, but her standing was damaged after Hurricane Katrina." The Washington Times (1/23, Hudson, 88K) reports Jindal "has a significant edge in early polling over" Blanco. A poll by the Southern Media and Opinion Research "shows Mrs. Blanco's support among voters is 35 percent, compared with 59 percent for Mr. Jindal."

Planned Demolition Of New Orleans Projects Draws Opposition. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Simmons, 850K) reports that "with inhabitable housing of any kind at a premium here, the fate of New Orleans' four largest public housing complexes — St. Bernard, C.J. Peete, B.W. Cooper and Lafitte — is at the center of another battle in the city's turbulent efforts to reshape its future. The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Housing Authority of New Orleans have approved plans to demolish these complexes, landmarks in their neighborhoods, and replace them with lower-density apartment clusters for mixed-income residents. Their decision has brought relentless opposition from former tenants who insist they want to restore their lives in their old homes."

State Farm Hit By Katrina-Related Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, Pleven, 2.04M) reports, "Nearly a year and a half after Katrina, the legal storm spawned by the deadly hurricane is coming to a head in Mississippi. At its center is the nation's largest home insurer: State Farm. The Bloomington, Ill., firm is the only insurer, so far, to face a major judgment against it in a Mississippi court over a disputed homeowner's claim related to Katrina. T he judgment came two weeks ago when a federal judge ordered it to pay a Mississippi couple $232,292, and a jury awarded the couple $2.5 million in punitive damages. On Friday, State Farm settled another case about to go to trial, and the insurer faces lawsuits from hundreds of other Mississippi homeowners."

Motherhood Increasingly Seen As An Asset For Politicians. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "It probably wasn't chance that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first public event after announcing her interest in running for president — a stop at a New York health center named for the Chelsea and Clinton neighborhoods — echoed the name of her daughter. Nor was it chance that the new speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, took up her gavel for the first time earlier this year surrounded by children, including some of her grandchildren. … Whether being a woman is an asset or liability in national politics may be an open question, but being a mother — or a grandmother — appears to be a sure winner. Strategists say that talking about motherhood is reassuring to voters, some of whom are still uncomfortable with women in powerful jobs. It also helps create a narrative for their lives that connects them to mainstream and traditionalist voters."

Arab Divisions Abroad Reflected In Dearborn. The New York Times (1/23, MacFarquhar, 1.16M) reports that after the death of Dearborn Mayor Michael A. Guido in

December, "a flock of Arab-American candidates stepped forward in the hopes of claiming City Hall. But despite the fact that roughly one in three Dearborn residents is of Arab origin, most of the Arab-American candidates had dropped out by mid-January. Poll numbers showed that none of them could win." The existence of "internal rivalries echoing those that beset the Arab world, along with the general electorate's lingering unease about Muslims, combined to derail what many here had hoped would be the chance to prove that Arab-Americans had arrived politically — at least in Dearborn, their unofficial capital in this country."

WSJournal Pans Massachusetts, California Healthcare Reform Plans, Calls Them Illegal. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.04M) says that "state schemes that feature 'pay or play' employer taxes or mandates" – such as the Massachusetts healthcare program and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's (R) recently proposed healthcare program -- "are probably illegal" under a decision in the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. That case "said that Maryland's 'Fair Share' health legislation -- otherwise known as 'the Wal-Mart tax' -- violates a federal employee-benefits law known by the acronym Erisa." The Journal continues, "Leave aside that the plan muscled into law by Maryland's Democratic legislature was far less ambitious. The basic similarity is that all three plans feature employer mandates or taxes aimed at changing employee-benefit plans -- in this case by requiring employers to provide health insurance. … There were sound reasons that Congress decided to create a uniform national regulatory framework when it wrote the Erisa law way back in 1974. To wit: Freeing employers from the administrative burden of having to comply with a multitude of state and local requirements leaves them with more money to spend on actual health care and other benefits." The Journal concludes, "We're all for state policy experiments, but these ballyhooed health care reforms are policy blunders that won't stand scrutiny in court, much less in the marketplace."

WSJournal Warns Spitzer On Financial Industry Competitiveness. The Wall Street Journal (1/23, 2.04M) says in an editorial that as New York's Attorney General, Democrat Eliot Spitzer "was the scourge of the financial industry. And in a final rhetorical flourish in that job, he was among the first to denounce last month's report by the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation pointing to a decline in American financial industry competitiveness." Now, however, "Mr. Spitzer is New York's Governor, and it will be fascinating to see if he assumes a more statesmanlike pose toward the same industry. Both the New York state budget, and Mr. Spitzer's own political future, depend on the financial industry's prosperity, as the same Capital Markets Committee report made clear."

Administration Said To Provide "Scant Evidence" To Back Iran Claims. The Los Angeles Times (1/23, A1, Zavis, Miller, 850K) reports on its front page, "If there is anywhere Iran could easily stir up trouble in Iraq, it would be in Diyala, a rugged province along the border between the two nations. … But even here, evidence of Iranian involvement in Iraq's troubles is limited." US troops have found "mortars and antitank mines with Iranian markings dated 2006, said US Army Col. David W. Sutherland, who oversees the province. But there has been little sign of more advanced weaponry crossing the border, and no Iranian agents have been found." The Times notes that in his speech this month outlining the new US strategy in Iraq, President Bush promised to "seek out and destroy" Iranian networks that he said were providing "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies," and is expected "to strike a similar note in tonight's State of the Union speech." However, the Administration "has provided scant evidence to support those claims. Nor have reporters traveling with US troops seen extensive signs of Iranian involvement." The lack of "publicly disclosed evidence" has "led to questions about whether the Administration is overstating its case," and some even "suggest Bush and his aides are pointing to Iran to deflect blame for US setbacks in Iraq."

Bush Address May Hint At Direction Of US Policy On Iran. The Christian Science Monitor (1/23, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "With evidence mounting that international pressure on Iran is getting results, President Bush prepares to deliver a State of the Union speech Tuesday night that could provide signs of where efforts against Tehran and its nuclear program will go next." Some analysts and "a few prominent foreign diplomats -- including Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov -- have said they see unsettling parallels between US action and rhetoric on Iraq and America's Iran policy." Since early 2005, the US "has opened a diplomatic track, primarily with European powers, to stop Iran short of acquiring nuclear weapons through international pressure," but "the question now may be how long Bush…will be willing to stick with an approach whose steering wheel is not solely in American hands."

Iran Bars IAEA Inspectors. The AP (1/23, Karimi) reports Iran has barred 38 nuclear inspectors on a United Nations list from entering the country, the foreign minister said Monday "in what appeared to be retaliation for the UN sanctions imposed last month." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told the official Islamic Republic News Agency, "The act of rejecting some inspectors is legal and in accordance with the agency's regulations," noting that others on the agency's list remain eligible. AFP (1/23) reports the

IAEA "said it was discussing with Iran its demand to withdraw some nuclear inspectors but was confident it could continue monitoring the country's nuclear facilities."

The New York Times (1/23, A7, Fathi, 1.16M) notes the announcement "came only days after Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, Iran's most senior dissident cleric, criticized President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiant stance against the West on the nuclear issue in a speech on Friday, calling it provocative." The two developments "suggest an increasingly open debate within Iran over how forcefully to confront the West over Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as its government continues to defend them."

Similarly, the Washington Times/AP (1/23, Dareini) says Montazeri joined "a chorus of criticism that has included even the hard-line leader's allies" and "reflected a growing feeling among many that Mr. Ahmadinejad has concentrated too much on fiery, anti-US speeches and not enough on the economy."

Iran Begins Short-Range Missile Tests. Under the headline "Iran Tests Missiles As Fear Of Attack Grows," the Financial Times (1/23, Smyth) reports Iran began "military maneuvers in its central desert on Monday, testing short-range missiles at a time of rising tension with the US and as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad faces continuing criticism at home." Iranian state radio reported that Revolutionary Guards were test-firing "both the 350km-range Zelzal-1 missile and the 70km range Fajr-5 near the town of Garmsar, 80km south-east of Tehran." Mohsen Rezaei, "an influential conservative politician and former Revolutionary Guards commander," told state television at the weekend that Washington had opted for "serious confrontation" with Iran, in which it "intends to resolve its problem in the Middle East." The Times says Rezaei' comments represent "a rare glimpse for the Iranian public of the seriousness with which leading officials view the situation, especially in his acknowledgment that America or Israel might attack Iran's atomic sites."

Seoul Asks Washington To Ease Sanctions On Pyongyang. AFP (1/23) reports Seoul "has told the United States that some of the frozen North Korean accounts in a Macau bank are from legitimate business and should be unblocked," South Korean news reports said Tuesday. The nation's Chosun Ilbo newspaper quoted an unidentifed high-ranking source in Washington as saying that South Korea asked the United States to consider unfreezing at least five of the 50 accounts with Banco Delta Asia (BDA). The source was quoted as saying, "Releasing money in those accounts from the freeze is aimed at saving North Korea's face in order to encourage it to proceed with the six-party talks."

Ban Announces Audit Of North Korean Fund. The AP (1/23, Bergman) reports UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon announced Monday that an external audit would be conducted of the UN Development Program in North Korea "after the US alleged the program had funneled millions of dollars to Kim Jong Il's regime." The audit will "initially focus on UNDP spending in North Korea and then be expanded to other UN agencies, though details have yet to be finalized," said Ban's spokeswoman, Michele Montas. The audit will be conducted by the U.N.'s Board of Auditors, which is comprised of accountants from eight U.N. members, she said.

The Washington Times (1/23, Pisik, 88K) says the audit, which is expected to be completed within three months, "will specifically look at hard-currency transactions, the independence of locally hired staff, and the agency's ability to monitor ongoing projects."

Korean Envoys Meet In China. The AP (1/23) reports nuclear envoys from North and South Korean met in Beijing as part of the latest efforts to restart six-nation talks, the South Korean Foreign Ministry said Tuesday. The South's Chun Yung-woo met North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan in Beijing, the Foreign Ministry said, "without giving any further details."

Separately, the AP (1/23, Herman) reports envoys to the six-party talks "are sounding rare notes of optimism, raising hopes for progress after their expected return to the bargaining table in coming weeks." Russian nuclear envoy Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov said Monday after meeting over the weekend with North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan, "On the whole, the impression is developing that the North Korean side has interpreted the results of the talks in Berlin with a certain optimism." For his part, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Monday in Beijing that there was "a basis for making progress" when the negotiations resume. The AP reports that "several envoys have said they expect the nuclear talks to resume before mid-February."

Hill Says Chinese Missile Test Will Not Affect Six-Party Talks. The Washington Times (1/23, Lanfranco, 88K) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "said yesterday that the resumption of six-party talks in Beijing should not be affected by US concerns over China's test of an anti-satellite missile." Hill told reporters, "My government's position on that is pretty clear. We've certainly conveyed [concern] to the Chinese, but I would say the six-party talks are on a different track."

Top Somali Militant Surrenders In Kenya. The New York Times (1/23, A8, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports the second in command of Somalia's Islamist forces "has surrendered to the Kenyan authorities and is staying at a hotel in Nairobi," Western diplomats and Somali officials said Monday. Sheik Sharif Ahmed, the head of the Islamist Courts Union executive council, "was part of a group of Islamist leaders being hunted down by American and Ethiopian troops in southern Somalia." Described as "a moderate Muslim and potential peacemaker," he "surfaced at the Kenya-Somalia border in the past week, Somali officials said, and now the Kenyan immigration authorities are deliberating on what to do with him." Several Western diplomats "said American officials…were instrumental in arranging Mr. Ahmed's safe passage to Kenya." However, On Monday, an American Embassy official "denied that the United States played any role in bringing him to Kenya."

The Washington Post (1/23, A14, McCrummen, 690K) says US officials "are hoping he can help subdue a rising insurgency among the movement's supporters" on the streets of Mogadishu.

China Says Test Does Not Signal Intent To Militarize Space. The AP (1/23) reports Chinese Foreign ministry officials told Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill that China's successful test of an anti-satellite weapon earlier this month "should not be seen as a threat and does not signal the beginning of a race to militarize space," the State Department said Monday. Hill raised the issue with Chinese officials over the weekend in Beijing, urging the Chinese to "be more forthcoming about their military activities and their defense budget."

AFP (1/23) reports State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday, "The bottom line is we encourage them to be more forthcoming, more transparent with respect to not only this test but also their space program."

Zoellick Urges Greater US, Chinese Economic Cooperation. Former US trade representative and current vice chairman at Goldman Sachs Group, Robert Zoellick, writes in the Financial Times (1/23) that "America and China need to develop an agenda as mutual stakeholders in the world economy." To date, Zoellick says "the media focus has been on the appreciation of China's currency," but stresses that "the Sino-American agenda needs to be broader." A "successful strategy," he notes, "will need to open doors for the US and others to benefit while supporting China's development and encouraging China to help sustain the international economic system to which its growth is linked." Zoellick concludes, "If the US and China recognize the strategic stakes in guiding this transition, they can develop an agenda that builds confidence and support in both countries and beyond."

Rice To Unveil "Substantial" Aid Package For Lebanon. AFP (1/23, Millikin) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday will announce "a substantial aid package for Lebanon at a donors conference in Paris" aimed at "bolstering the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. The offer "will come on top of more than $230 million already pledged by Washington to help rebuild Lebanon following the devastating war between Israel and the Islamic militia Hezbollah last July and August. McCormack would not provide details of the US aid proposal, other than say it was "substantial." But another "senior official" said it would be "an equivalent vigorous effort" in comparison to the $230 million pledged by Washington at a donors conference in Stockholm shortly after a UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the war. While insisting the Paris conference was "about helping all Lebanese and not just Siniora," the US officials said it would "also highlight the failure of Hezbollah and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, to repair the war damage."

The AP (1/23, Gedda) says the expected $230 million package "would be a major increase over the $30 million to $40 million that Washington had pledged for aid to Lebanon in recent years." The package is likely to include funds to rebuild "a vital bridge on the Beirut-Damascus highway, which is expected to cost about $20 million." Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns said in Israel on Sunday that the assistance will be part of a world effort to defend Lebanon "from that axis of countries, Iran and Syria, and organizations like Hezbollah, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and others."

Diplomatic Activity Picks Up Ahead Of Mideast Summit. The AP (1/23, Teibel) reports, "After months of inaction, a flurry of diplomatic activity toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking is under way." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "is planning a summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, top Israeli officials are floating peace initiatives and the moderate Palestinian president says he is ready to discuss the outlines of a final settlement. But with Hamas militants dominating the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, and weak leadership on all sides, no one expects a deal any time soon." In the past few weeks, the Israeli and Palestinian leaders "held their first substantive meeting, and Israel followed up by transferring $100 million in frozen tax revenues to Abbas." However, "Sharp differences have emerged between the Israeli and Palestinian positions." The Palestinians "oppose an Israeli proposal for a provisional Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, believing Israel could use it to usurp land while the sides negotiate endlessly over so-called final status issues." The AP notes that "it is precisely the big-picture issues -- final borders, the status of disputed Jerusalem and the Palestinians' demand to repatriate refugees and their descendants -- that have caused past peace talks to collapse."

Palestinians To Resume Unity Talks. AFP (1/23, El Oun) reports Palestinians are "preparing to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after inconclusive talks" between Hamas' Khaled Meshaal and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. A statement issued Monday said a meeting would take place in Gaza City on Tuesday between representatives of Fatah and Hamas, but gave no further details.

Palestinian Father Seeks Peace With Israelis After Death Of Daughter. The New York Times (1/23, A3, Myre, 1.16M) profiles Bassam Aramin, whose 10-year-old daughter was killed last week during a clash between stone-throwing Palestinian youths and the Israeli police and now "says he wants to talk to Israelis about making peace." With his Israeli partner, Zohar Shapira, a former member of an elite commando unit, Aramin "has been speaking to students and community groups in Israel and the West Bank."

Israel Names New Army Chief Of Staff. The New York Times (1/23, A3, Myre, 1.16M) reports Gabi Ashkenazi, a former infantry officer who commanded Israeli troops against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, was appointed Monday as the Israeli military's new chief of staff. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz agreed on the appointment at a meeting on Monday evening, the prime minister's office said. The nomination must still be approved by the cabinet and a government committee.

US Seeks Polish Approval For Missile-Shield Site. USA Today (1/23, 5A, 2.27M) reports Washington "is asking Poland to allow ground-based interceptor missiles on its territory as part of a missile-defense system," the US Embassy in Warsaw said Monday. Polish Defense Minister Radek Sikorski "indicated a willingness to discuss the issue" with "our most important ally" but said nothing had been decided.

US Plans Raise Concerns. The AP (1/23, Gera) reports the "prospect of sophisticated US radar and interceptor systems in formerly communist Eastern Europe has led Russian military leaders to warn of a new arms race." The system "would create a clear threat for Russia," Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, the chief of Russia's Space Forces, warned Monday. Washington has "repeatedly sought to reassure Russia it has nothing to fear from the system -- a message Andrew Schilling, a spokesman for the US Embassy in Warsaw, echoed Monday." He told The AP a US missile defense system in Europe would be solely aimed at countering "the evolving Middle Eastern ballistic missile threat."

Poll Shows Global View Of US Worsened In 2006. The New York Times (1/23, A11, 1.16M) reports the "global view of the United States' role in world affairs deteriorated significantly again last year," according to a poll of more than 26,000 people in 25 countries. Negative feelings about the war in Iraq "were prevalent, and nearly 7 in 10 people polled said the American military presence in the Middle East provoked more violence than it prevented," according to the poll done for the BBC World Service by GlobeScan and the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland. In 18 countries previously polled, "an average of 29 percent of those surveyed saw the United States as having a mainly positive influence, down from 36 percent last year."

The Washington Post (1/23, A14, Sullivan, 690K) notes the survey of 26,381 people was conducted from November to January in Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Britain, Chile, China, Egypt, France, Germany, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Italy, Kenya, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, the Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Russia, South Korea, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and the United States. The Post notes that "views of US foreign policy are also becoming more negative among US citizens, the poll found. Of the 1,000 Americans surveyed, 57 percent said the United States is having a mainly positive influence in the world. That is down from 63 percent last year and 71 percent two years ago."

Armenian Journalist's Death Leads To Conciliation. The New York Times (1/23, A6, Fowler, Arsu, 1.16M) reports the killing of an Armenian-Turkish journalist in Istanbul last week "and the sorrow it has generated within Turkey are leading to rare conciliatory gestures between Turkey and Armenia, historic enemies, and to calls for changes in laws here defending Turkish identity." On Monday, Armenian "political and spiritual figures accepted an invitation from the Turkish government to attend the funeral of Hrant Dink." Despite "the fact that the Armenian-Turkish border has been sealed since 1993 and diplomatic relations severed," Armenia is sending a deputy foreign minister, Arman Kirakossian, to the funeral, and the archbishop of the Armenian Church of America, Khajag Barsamian, also accepted the government's invitation to the ceremony.

The Washington Times (1/23, Birch, 88K) reports on the reaction in the Turkish town of Trabzon to news that "a local youth confessed over the weekend" to the shooting Dink.

Schwab Says No Breakthrough On Doha Round Likely. USA Today (1/23, 5B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports trade negotiator Susan Schwab "said Monday there is no prospect of an imminent breakthrough in long-stalled global trade talks." Schwab leaves Wednesday for the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, "where she plans to meet with counterparts from Europe and key developing nations in hopes of reviving the flickering Doha Round negotiations." But in an interview with the newspaper, Schwab said, "We're still not close, I would say, to being able to sit down as trade ministers to talk about closing a Doha Round deal or to talk about a Doha Round breakthrough in substance." She said ongoing "technical" talks are "advancing and could pave the way for an eventual deal," but "major disagreements remain."

Reflecting Schwab's assessment, the New York Times (1/23, Bilefsky, Dougherty, 1.16M) reports the European Union's chief trade negotiator "said Monday that efforts to restart stalled global trade talks were showing new vigor. But he sought to discourage expectations that a breakthrough could come during a meeting of trade ministers this week" in Davos. EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson said, "We are in the endgame, but we are not in a situation where we have the outlines of an agreement."

Report Cites British Collusion In N. Ireland Killings. AFP (1/23, Mallie) reports British police "colluded with paramilitaries behind at least 10 murders in Northern Ireland in the 1990s, a damning report said, triggering outrage in Dublin and Belfast and remorse in London." The report about Protestant militants "threatens to cloud current efforts to restore self-rule in the long-troubled British-run province, in which Catholic lack of confidence in policing is a key stumbling block." Irish premier Bertie Ahern responded, "Today's ombudsman's report is deeply disturbing. Its findings are of the utmost gravity."

Serbia Vote Could Lead To Coalition Of Democrats. The New York Times (1/23, Wood, 1.16M) reports, "Two leading democratic parties emerged Monday as the groups most likely to form a government in Serbia, despite a first-place showing for a nationalist party in the parliamentary elections on Sunday." The "prospect of slow negotiations to secure a coalition," however, "complicates international efforts to find a solution for the disputed province of Kosovo, which are approaching a turning point." Meanwhile, the formation of a coalition also "will not be easy," because the two main democratic parties "have longstanding rivalries, and the prime minister, Vojilsav Kostunica, seems unwilling to negotiate his job away, though his Serbian Democrats came in third."

Russia Seeks To Limit Foreign Labor In Crackdown On Illegal Immigration. On its front page, the Washington Times (1/23, A1, Mainville, 88K) reports, "Thousands of migrant workers from the Caucasus, Central Asia and China are leaving Russia as the government institutes tough new measures aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration." Campaigners against illegal immigration are "welcoming the measures, saying low-paid migrants were distorting the job market and taking work from Russian citizens. But critics say the moves are ill-advised because they will drive up retail prices and create a labor shortage that could hurt Russia's booming economy."

Author Criticizes China's New Adoption Rules. Beth Nonte Russell, author of the forthcoming "Forever Lily: An Unexpected Mother's Journey to Adoption in China," writes in the New York Times (1/23, 1.16M) in response to a recent announcement by the Chinese government that it "had prepared strict new criteria for foreign adoption applications because the country claimed it lacked 'available' babies to meet the 'spike' in demand." Russell questions whether, "as China increasingly asserts itself on the world stage and prepares to host the 2008 Summer Olympics, allowing Westerners to adopt thousands of infants each year would fit the image it wanted to project. I suspect not, and China's new restrictions lead me to believe that national pride is more important than getting these children into loving homes." She notes that the "issue of abandoned and institutionalized children remains a taboo subject in China, a problem the government does not even acknowledge exists. … But the answer is not to stop the foreigners from adopting; it is to put an end to their reasons for doing so."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al Qaeda Linked To Plot To Use Student Visas (LAT)

By Josh Meyer,

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

Papers found in an Iraq militants' hide-out refer to a plan to get terrorists into the U.S., though none did.

WASHINGTON — Al Qaeda's Iraq-based faction considered trying to use student visas to get a dozen or more operatives into the United States to launch an attack, a ploy that was successful for one of the hijackers in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, U.S. counter-terrorism officials confirmed Monday.

The plot appeared to be little more than an informal list of Al Qaeda-affiliated operatives and initial plans found during a search of a militants' hide-out in Iraq shortly before Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June, said one official.

But it was deemed serious enough to alert the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security, which mobilized agents in the United States to look for possible terrorists and for signs of attempted infiltration, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss classified details of the case.

"Almost anything from Al Qaeda in Iraq is taken very seriously.

"Even though they don't normally operate beyond the region, the fact that they were thinking about that, and considering this method to enter the country, is serious in and of itself," said the U.S. official.

In the end, U.S. authorities concluded that none of the operatives had entered the United States, that one of its leaders was already dead and that the effort never got off the drawing board, the official said.

The plot was confirmed by a second U.S. counter-terrorism official, who described the seized document as showing the scheme to be a group of men "discussing ideas, not an actual operation that was in progress."

Details of the nascent plot were first reported Monday by ABC News.

It also was cited by Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, during his testimony two weeks ago at a Senate Intelligence Committee hearing on threats to the United States.

Maples did not provide any details, saying only that documents seized by coalition forces "revealed [Al Qaeda in Iraq] was planning terrorist operations in the U.S."

The FBI issued a statement late Monday, saying it "has been aware of the information cited by the DIA.... Based on this information, we have no indication of a specific threat at this time."

The U.S. counter-terrorism officials said that Al Qaeda operatives appeared to have begun discussing the plot sometime after Al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman Zawahiri, sent Zarqawi a letter encouraging him to launch attacks far beyond the borders of Iraq.

One of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers, Hani Hanjour, was allowed into the country on a student visa from Saudi Arabia after being turned down for a tourist visa, Janice L. Kephart, the former immigration counsel to the Sept. 11 commission that investigated the attacks, said Monday.

U.S. authorities now require that schools keep much closer tabs on visiting students.

Also on Monday, a Washington-based terrorism analysis group released a videotape in which Zawahiri purportedly ridiculed President Bush for his recently announced plan to send more than 20,000 additional American troops to Iraq to counter the increasing bloodshed and sectarian violence.

In the 14-minute videotape released by the SITE Institute and later broadcast on Islamist websites, Zawahiri challenged Bush to send "the entire army," vowing that insurgents could defeat the equivalent of 10 armies.

U.S. intelligence officials believe Zawahiri is hiding out in Pakistan or just over the border in Afghanistan, but is separated from Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

In his latest tape, which included English subtitles, Zawahiri described Bush's Jan. 10 address in which he outlined his new proposal for Iraq as "ravings."

He also said U.S. and allied forces have not deprived Al Qaeda of a haven in Afghanistan, and he reiterated an earlier offer to Americans to reject Bush administration policies if they wanted to avoid being attacked by Al Qaeda and militant Islamists.

The America Terrorists Never See (USAT)

By Dinesh D'souza

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Congress and the Bush administration are reconsidering America's policy toward Iraq, a topic that the president is sure to emphasize in his State of the Union address tonight. But perhaps a more radical re-examination is necessary.

More than five years after 9/11, we are still under the illusion that America is fighting a war against the enemies of modernity. We hear that these people are against modern science, modern capitalism and modern democracy. In President Bush's words, "They hate our freedoms."

Many of us think of radical Muslims as semiliterate seminarians or mullahs, the product of fanatical madrassa schools. But if you consider the suicide bombers who struck at 9/11, or in Madrid, or in London, most were born in the West, studied in the West, or lived in the West, and had scientific training. Osama bin Laden was a civil engineer, his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri a medical doctor, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (the chief architect of 9/11) a mechanical engineer, Muhammad Atta (head of the Hamburg group) an urban planner. The man who beheaded journalist Daniel Pearl attended the London School of Economics.

If the radical Muslims aren't opposed to science, neither do they reject capitalism. Historically, Islam has been quite friendly to free markets. The prophet Muhammad was a trader. The bin Laden team targeted the World Trade Center not simply because it represents capitalism, but because it represents U.S. capitalism, which is viewed as exporting the debased values of U.S. popular culture to the Islamic world.

Finally, in recent years Islamic radicals have become converts to the benefits of democracy. True, the Taliban hated democracy and bin Laden still rails against elections, charging that they substitute the will of the people for the will of God. But radical Islam's leading groups, such as Hamas, Hezbollah and the largest one, the Muslim Brotherhood, all support elections. Indeed they are, according to Islam expert Noah Feldman, "the loudest voices calling for democracy in nearly every Muslim country." This is not because their leaders have been reading John Stuart Mill or The Federalist Papers. Rather, these groups support democracy because they have discovered that it is their best way to win power.

The first lesson came in the early 1990s when a Muslim radical group called the Islamic Salvation Front ran on a platform of reinstituting Islamic holy law and won electoral victories in Algeria. More recently, Hamas was freely elected in the Palestinian territories, and the Muslim Brotherhood swept the 2005 parliamentary elections in Egypt. Hamas leader Sheikh Nayef Rajoub says radical Muslims have learned to love "the democracy game." And even though it has been called a terrorist group, Hamas thus far has governed like any elected government.

So, for now, Islamic radicals find it in their interest to embrace democracy. What they do when they lose their first election remains to be seen.

Radical Islam's main charge against America is that we are a decadent, immoral society that is projecting its culture and values throughout the world and threatening their faith. This is the basis of bin Laden's call to jihad. U.S. military power is viewed by many as one means for transmission of American values to the Muslim world, which is why radical Islam has been gaining recruits.

So how should the Bush administration respond? First, it should stop calling for democracy worldwide. Is America willing to risk a free election in Saudi Arabia in which bin Laden supporters take control of two holy sites and a significant portion of the world's oil? Of course not. Foreign policy is not philanthropy.

Iraq is part of a legitimate American effort not to have democracy everywhere but to have democracy somewhere. A pro-American democracy in the region would give traditional Muslims an alternative to the two bleak options currently on offer in the Middle East: Islamic tyranny (as in Iran) or secular tyranny (as in Syria, Jordan, Egypt, etc.). The radical Muslims are fighting so desperately in Iraq because they don't want Muslims to have a third choice that may prove vastly more attractive.

The best way for America to refute the radical Muslim allegation that we are an immoral, pagan society is for the Bush administration to show the rest of the world the face of traditional America. This is the America that is not portrayed by Hollywood and the music industry, and it is an America that the Muslims rarely see. Bush should highlight this America in his foreign policy speeches. He should not hesitate to speak out against American cultural exports that are shameless and corrupting. And America should promote traditional family values, not feminism and homosexual rights, in international forums like the United Nations.

If traditional Muslims realized that there are millions of Americans who go to church, take care of their families and live by traditional values, they would be less likely to view us or our leaders as the Great Satan, and fewer of them will be tempted to join the camp of the Islamic radicals. Improving our moral reputation is not just a way to look better, it may also be the best long-term strategy to make our country safer.

Prosecutors Say Padilla Defense Leak Could Taint Jury (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

The leak of transcripts of Jose Padilla's intercepted telephone conversations by a defense lawyer to The New York Times violated a court order and could jeopardize selection of an impartial jury, federal prosecutors said Monday.

"There is no question that the disclosure was calculated and deliberate, with the effect of exposing potential jurors to evidence before it is introduced at trial when both sides will have the opportunity to argue its significance," prosecutors said in court papers.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke has scheduled a hearing Wednesday on the issue, the latest in a string of complications to arise in the case of the alleged al-Qaida operative.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and former Chicago gang member, is charged with being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremists. Originally accused of plotting a radioactive "dirty bomb" attack after his 2002 arrest, Padilla was designated an enemy combatant by President Bush and held without criminal charge at a Navy brig for 3 1/2 years.

He was added to an existing Miami terrorism-support case in late 2005 during a legal battle over the president's wartime detention powers. The dirty bomb allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment.

Three Miami-based public defenders representing Padilla - Michael Caruso, Anthony Natale and Orlando do Campo - admitted in court papers that "one of Jose Padilla's counsel" provided the transcripts to a Times reporter for a story published Jan. 4. The lawyer responsible was not identified.

Padilla is also represented by attorney Andrew Patel of New York, but his name does not appear on the document acknowledging responsibility for the leak.

The seven transcripts were covered by a June 21, 2005, order by Cooke prohibiting dissemination of "sensitive" evidence. The transcripts were declassified telephone intercepts on which Padilla's voice is heard that were obtained under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Prosecutors contend that their disclosure violates Florida Bar and American Bar Association rules governing attorneys' professional conduct. Penalties for such violations vary greatly, from jail time in extreme cases to a judicial reprimand.

The defense lawyers said in their own court papers that disclosure of the transcripts was "born of confusion" about the judge's order. Because the 2005 order had been replaced in 2006, not everyone on Padilla's team understood that the rules regarding sensitive material still applied.

Prosecutors, however, cast doubt on the argument, noting that Assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Killinger said in a letter when the transcripts were turned over to the defense on Jan. 23, 2006, that they were "sensitive discovery materials" covered by Cooke's original order.

Prosecutors accused defense lawyers of "whipping up a media frenzy" that could taint the pool of prospective jurors.

A spokeswoman for The Times declined comment. None of the four defense lawyers responded to e-mail messages seeking comment about the latest government claims.

The Padilla trial had been scheduled to start Monday but was delayed until April, in part to allow time for a mental competency evaluation. Two mental health experts hired by Padilla's lawyers say he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder stemming from his long isolation in military custody and is unable to adequately assist in his own defense.

Padilla's lawyers claim he was tortured while in the brig and are seeking dismissal of the charges on that basis. Pentagon and Justice Department officials have denied those.

Editorial: Congress Must Press For FISA-rule Details (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 23, 2007

Crucial questions remain about new NSA wiretaps.

Just watching Alberto Gonzales being grilled over the Bush administration's new, classified domestic-surveillance agreement with the FISA court was an exercise in frustration. One can only imagine what it was like for the senators doing the grilling; they were simply trying to figure out whether the deal undermines or meets the intent of their own law to protect Americans' privacy.

They didn't get very far. In Thursday's Judiciary Committee hearing, the ever soft-spoken, ever genial attorney general would neither describe FISA orders that ended the warrantless wiretap program nor agree that senators had a right to see them.

That stance is untenable. Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to prevent unlawful eavesdropping by government, and it cannot determine whether to give congressional blessing to the new rules or amend the FISA law unless its members -- who are accustomed to receiving sensitive, classified material -- know how the rules work. Congress must press the White House until it gets the information.

After more than a year of defending its warrantless surveillance on the basis of executive authority, the administration has clearly done some fast footwork in the face of two new factors: an emboldened, Democratic-led Congress and the prospect of imminent federal appeals-court proceedings on its wiretap program.

Talks between the executive branch and the FISA court reportedly accelerated after the November elections. According to the Los Angeles Times, government officials said the negotiations "centered on securing an agreement that would allow the administration to seek warrants on groups of people in certain circumstances, rather than being required to obtain separate court orders for every individual under suspicion." The Times said the changes "appear to require individual warrants when the target is a U.S. citizen or has permanent legal resident status."

But senators heard no such explanation from Gonzales. They must persevere until they do.

Editorial: End To Warrantless Taps? (STNIA)

Staten Island Advance (NY), January 23, 2007

Late last week U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in a two-page letter to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, announced the death of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the super-secret program authorized by the president to eavesdrop on phone calls and e-mails of Americans believed to be communicating with suspected terrorists.

Mr. Gonzales' announcement ended a 13-month brewing battle over the constitutionality of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the warranteless wiretapping conducted by the Bush administration, which had vehemently defended its right to conduct super-secret eavesdropping on phone calls and e-mails of Americans without going through the well-established legal channels before doing so.

The president and Mr. Gonzales, as well as other members of the Bush administration have vehemently defended the program, insisting that it was "critical," "vital," and "crucial to our national security," ever since The New York Times broke the news that the program existed, catching Americans off-guard.

The administration has also claimed that it did not need to request and receive a warrant from the appropriate court -- the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, the sole purpose of which is to monitor the government's wiretapping and monitoring of Americans.

Critics of the National Security Agency program have said from the beginning that FISA should handle the program in the first place. Yet the government argued that going through the FISA court took too long; they said it would impede the program's "speed and agility."

They argued that NSA, the government's eyes and ears of worldwide communication, needed to be able to listen to terror suspects as they moved throughout the world and communicated with people within the U.S. Now, it appears that the "speed and agility" issue is a moot point. And that the White House has beat a hasty retreat.

Or has it?

Democrats are crowing that the Bush administration could no longer -- in the face of widespread criticism from scholars and some Justice Department lawyers -- defend its actions.

But one senior Justice Department official said: "Obviously, this issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny ... considering all of these circumstances, the president determined that this was the appropriate course."

Mr. Gonzales, appearing on the Hill last week, and under intense questioning, said: "We believe the court's orders will allow the necessary speed and agility the government needs," he said. When asked if the court is now a 24-hour drivethru for electronic surveillance, a senior Justice official said that "the judges of the FISA court often make themselves available at all hours to approve emergency authorizations. So that's not something new."

A former Justice Department official has told CBS News that emergency wiretaps can be started and the necessary paperwork can be completed retroactively. Which by the way, was always the case, and the main argument advanced by critics of the program in response to the administration's claim that going through FISA took too long.

So, has the administration actually backed down on one of its key interpretations of executive power?

Already some are speculating that the Gonzales letter is really a Trojan Horse. They claim that a closer reading of the letter provides a major, unresolved loophole the administration plans to exploit.

As one expert pointed out, the National Security Agency surveillance program and the FISA system, as it currently exists, are fundamentally incompatible. Any hasty reconciliation of the two, he said, would involve either a "dramatic revision" of U.S. espionage activities or a very creative reading of the wiretapping statute. The question, he said, is which one?

Critics have also questioned the timing of the Bush administration's policy change, coming two weeks before scheduled oral arguments in the 6th Circuit Appeals Court of a trial court's finding that the wiretapping program is unconstitutional.

Regardless, of which side of this debate readers fall, the program raised troubling questions, not the least of which is the extent and depth of presidential powers even in the time of war.

We also find ourselves wondering why the Bush administration felt it necessary to make an end run around FISA in the he first place, especially in light of the fact that the court in all of its years has only turned down a handful of requests out of the thousands it has granted.

In addition, New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer pointed out that the White House is labeling its cooperation with FISA as a courtesy, and not a legal obligation, meaning the administration does not feel bound to follow a new set of procedures.

"Just as you instituted this program," Mr. Schumer said, "you could just go back to it if you get a decision you don't like."

That fact is the most worrisome about this whole affair, that the White House, having publicly announced its compliance, would behind the scenes still do just the opposite.

We will, for the moment at least, reserve judgment, but urge Congress to continue oversight of this program to ensure that the administration keeps its promise to the American people.

Editorial: Change Of Tactic Only (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120147

Congress and the courts must not be placated by the administration's alleged change of position on spying. It's? a matter of accountability and constitutional obligation.

"The truth of the matter is we looked at FISA, and we all concluded there's no way we can do what we have to do to protect this country under the strict reading of FISA."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week

The element of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that likely caused such consternation? The one that said eavesdropping on Americans should occur with a warrant. And the all-too-typical administration response? Ignore the law.

FISA actually is abundantly clear on this matter of warrants. Nonetheless, the administration had some choices. It could have asked Congress to change the law. It might have noted another part of FISA that allowed warrantless surveillance on an emergency basis for 72 hours before the warrant was requested.

Instead, the Bush administration followed the now familiar script - it ignored the law until it looked as if it would be forced to comply. Last week, the Justice Department announced that it would put its surveillance program under FISA court supervision. This occurred weeks after Democrats assumed control of Congress, just before Gonzales was to appear before the Senate committee and two weeks before a federal appeals court in Cincinnati was going to hear arguments about whether the program is legal. The administration's change of heart was clearly no coincidence.

Among other things, it now hopes that the court challenges to the program will be ruled moot. It also is gambling that Congress will be placated. Neither should occur.

That's because still unexplained is whether this change means each individual warrant has to gain court approval or whether the court will use blanket approvals. The former is what should be occurring.

Also left unclear is whether the administration - which has claimed the president had the constitutional authority for warrantless eavesdropping - has in fact been spying on Americans with no connection to terrorism.

As for the court cases, a New York Times analysis Friday by Adam Liptak observed that the Supreme Court has ruled such court cases are moot only if it is "absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur."

Anyone buying that with this administration's track record?

Congress must continue its oversight of this program. The court cases challenging it must also proceed. There are simply too many unanswered questions.

The President Is More Equal? (WT)

By Bruce Fein

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

George Orwell had his "Animal Farm," and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has his version of the Constitution.

According to the attorney general, the three branches of the government are equal, but President Bush is more equal than Congress or the Supreme Court. Thus, the president is constitutionally empowered to open mail, conduct electronic surveillance, break and enter homes, or torture detainees in defiance of federal statutes. Congress is impotent to check the president's national security powers to prevent the massive intelligence abuses disclosed by the Church Committee, including the gathering of political intelligence under a false foreign intelligence banner. Mr. Gonzales further lectures that the president is authorized to sign bills passed by Congress but to disregard those portions he asserts are unconstitutional, which is tantamount to a line-item veto power rejected by the Supreme Court in New York v. Clinton (1998).

He adds that President Bush, like British kings, can do no wrong in national security matters. Thus, the Supreme Court improperly rebuked the commander in chief over indefinite detentions of alleged unlawful enemy combatants, habeas corpus and military commissions by disputing Mr. Gonzales' doctrine of presidential infallibility doctrine.

The Founding Fathers, in contrast, believed the three branches of government should be equal in the Constitution's checks and balances. Since men were not angels -- even saintly President George Washington -- ambition must be made to counteract ambition to forestall the tyranny of "Animal Farm." Judicial review of presidential actions was enshrined in the expectation the White House would chronically seek to usurp or misuse power to boost its political standing, especially in times of conflict.

The Supreme Court adjudicates the constitutionality of national security measures not because it commands military expertise or foreign intelligence genius. On the latter counts, the president is demonstrably superior. But the commander in chief, unlike the justices, is institutionally motivated to twist the law or distort the facts to gain a direct political advantage.

Mr. Bush, for example, benefits from the hundreds of alleged enemy combatants held at Guantanamo Bay irrespective of whether the detentions are justified. Detainees in large numbers testify to the president's dubious claim that international terrorism is as dangerous to the nation as were Josef Stalin, Adolf Hitler or Hirohito.

While a former commandant and deputy commandant have opined that most of Guantanamo's detainees do not belong there, reducing the number to a handful would be a staggering political embarrassment to Mr. Bush. How can the nation's clash with international terrorism be deemed "war" without a sizable collection of captured illegal enemy combatants on display? The same reasoning will incline Mr. Bush's military commissions established to try alleged war crimes to convict every accused al Qaeda defendant. Any acquittal would undermine Mr. Bush's hyperbolic claim of a Manichean battle between international terrorism and Western civilization.

All presidents are irresistibly tempted to indiscriminate or wrongful detentions, punishments or overreaching whenever exigencies arise to generate popular political support or to justify the indefinite exercise of emergency or war powers. The White House gains from inflated fears. The justices of the Supreme Court do not. Neither do they possess a personal political agenda that would systematically warp their constitutional judgments in favor or against the president's national security actions. That is why the Founding Fathers did not exclude the latter from judicial review, which history vindicates.

President Harry Truman insisted seizing steel mills was essential to the Korean War effort. The Supreme Court voided the seizure in Youngstown Sheet & Tube v. Sawyer(1952), and Truman was proved wrong.

President Richard M. Nixon maintained that publication of the Pentagon Papers would irreparably damage the United States in Vietnam. The Supreme Court rejected the claim in New York Times v. United States (1971), and Nixon was proved wrong.

President Bush asserted that any judicial review of his decision to detain American citizens indefinitely as enemy combatants would cripple the fight against international terrorism. The Supreme Court repudiated the claim in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2005), and Mr. Bush was proved wrong. It speaks volumes that Attorney General Gonzales has failed to cite even one Supreme Court decision which he believes handicapped the president's national security performance.

When the Supreme Court virtually abdicated judicial review in line with the attorney general's views, mass injustice ensued. With congressional support, President Franklin D. Roosevelt interned 120,000 Japanese Americans five months after Pearl Harbor to placate popular racism. Not a crumb of evidence of disloyalty or sabotage was ever forthcoming. The Supreme Court ratified that abomination through blind deference to the commander in chief in Hirabiyashi v. United States (1943), and Korematsu v. United States (1944). Congress later apologized in the Civil Liberties Act of 1988.

Notwithstanding the attorney general, the equilibrium of power among the legislative, executive and judicial branches has proven the best way to preserve an enlightened democratic dispensation for the ages.

Bush's Abrupt About-face On Wiretaps Is Welcome (CCCT)

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, January 23, 2007

Decision to abandon insistence that such surveillance could be conducted without warrants came late in the day, however.

A year ago, when the program of warrantless wiretapping of overseas calls came to light, the Bush administration argued strongly that the surveillance was outside the purview of the courts.

By virtue of the president's executive powers on behalf of national security, the White House said, the administration already had the power to monitor those communications.

And aside from the inherent powers that gave the president the right to monitor those calls, the kind of massive electronic eavesdropping that was being done by the National Security Agency simply made the Carter-era Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court an outmoded tool for dealing with the threat of terrorism.

Trust us, the White House said reassuringly: The program has all the necessary constitutional protections built into its system without any courts.

Then the November elections happened. And last week, in a quiet turnabout, the Bush administration announced that it was discontinuing the program of warrantless wiretaps and said that any future wiretaps would be done under the authority of the FISA Court.

It was a welcome change of method, even if it did not represent a change of heart on the part of the Bush White House.

The administration still believes that what it was doing before was not against the law, although a federal court had already found the program to be unconstitutional. It was highly likely that an appeal court later this month would have upheld the trial court.

The administration, before the takeover of Congress by Democrats, might have been inclined to continue the legal fight.

However, pragmatism, if not respect for the Constitution, prevailed. Not by coincidence did Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announce the change just as he was about to testify for the first time before the new Congress.

The warrantless wiretapping program was an abuse of presidential powers and its dismantling should be welcomed by Americans. The program, while it operated, overrode one of the basic constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures by the power of the state. That abuse fit the Bush administration's view that national security trumps all other concerns, when in fact the need to preserve our way of life in times of crisis demands that we uphold those constitutional protections then more zealously than ever.

Canadian To Remain On U.S. Terrorist Watch List (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Despite a Canadian inquiry that cleared a Syrian-born Canadian citizen of any terrorist ties, the Bush administration has formally refused a Canadian government request that it remove the man, Maher Arar, from the terrorist watch list, saying that the United States has secret information justifying his inclusion.

On Monday, the Justice Department released a letter affirming Mr. Arar's listing sent last week by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, to the Canadian minister of public safety, Stockwell Day.

In the letter, dated Jan. 16, Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Chertoff said their departments and American intelligence agencies "have re-examined the materials in the possession of the United States regarding Mr. Arar. Based on this re-examination, we remain of the view that the continued watch listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate."

After the letter was sent, Mr. Day met last week with Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Gonzales and reviewed the American dossier on Mr. Arar in its entirety, but still disagreed with the American decision, Canadian and American officials said.

For human rights advocates, Mr. Arar became a symbol of the United States' counterterrorism policies gone drastically awry, when he was detained in New York in 2002 while trying to change planes and then sent to Syria. He was imprisoned in Syria for more than a year and beaten repeatedly with a heavy metal cable before the Syrian authorities released him in October 2003.

A two-year investigation by a Canadian government commission concluded in September that Mr. Arar had no terrorist ties and that the Canadian authorities had passed misleading information about him to the United States before he was sent to Syria. The revelations led to the resignation of the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and a formal protest by the Canadian government to the Bush administration over Mr. Arar's treatment.

The Bush administration refused to provide documents or witnesses to Canada's Arar Commission, and it has never admitted to any mistakes in its handling of Mr. Arar.

At a hearing last week, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, a Vermont Democrat who is the new Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, angrily pressed Mr. Gonzales about the case. In a statement on Monday, Senator Leahy said he was "puzzled" by the decision to keep Mr. Arar on the watch list.

"This abhorrent practice stains America's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights, and I hope this administration will renounce it at long last," Senator Leahy said. Mr. Gonzales has agreed to brief Mr. Leahy and Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the top Republican on the committee, on the case.

Spokesmen for Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Chertoff declined on Monday to discuss the case, noting that a federal lawsuit filed by Mr. Arar against the United States government and dismissed last year is still on appeal.

An attorney for Mr. Arar, Maria C. LaHood, said the recent exchange provided more support for a statement last month by the Canadian prime minister, Stephen Harper, that "we simply have a U.S. government that won't admit it's wrong."

U.S. Officials: Canadian Should Stay On Terror List (CNN)

CNN.com, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- American officials said Monday that a Canadian should remain on a U.S. terrorist watch list despite the Canadian government's conclusion otherwise and its apology after the designation led to his detention in Syria.

In a joint letter, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff informed Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety, that they had again looked at intelligence in their possession concerning Maher Arar.

"Based on this re-examination, we remain of the view that the continued watch listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate," the U.S. officials said.

"Our conclusion in this regard is supported by information developed by U.S. law enforcement agencies that is independent of that provided to us by Canada regarding Mr. Arar."

In 2002, U.S. officials detained Arar at a New York airport as he was trying to return home to Canada from a vacation in Tunisia. Canada had placed Arar, a Syrian native, on a terrorism watch list. He said the United States arrested him and eventually sent him to Syria, where he allegedly was tortured and held for 10 months.

In September, a Canadian report concluded that Arar wasn't a terrorism suspect. Gonzales has said the U.S. legally deported Arar and didn't send him to Syria to be tortured. Syria defends its handling of the case, saying a Canadian diplomat visited Arar twice and found he was treated well. Human rights groups widely criticize the Damascus government for torturing prisoners

The Arar case has been politically charged. Last week, Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, sharply criticized Gonzales about the case during the attorney general's appearance before the panel.

On Monday, Leahy complained the letter does not address what he called "the larger issues surrounding this case."

"The reason the Arar case is such a sore point and such an offense to American values is that he was sent to Syria on the Bush administration's orders, where he was tortured," Leahy said in a written statement.

He said he was puzzled by the decision to keep Arar on the watch list, but said he would await a promised briefing by Gonzales.

Justice Department officials said Monday that the attorney general will inform the lawmaker why the Bush administration believes Arar should remain on the watch list.

In their letter to the Canadian minister, the U.S. officials said they would like to brief the Canadians "in a confidential meeting with appropriate Canadian officials at their earliest convenience."

US Still Considers Mistreated Canadian Arar Suspicious (AFP)

The United States still considers a Canadian it detained in 2002 as an "Islamic extremist" and sent to Syria, where he says he was tortured, a suspicious person, despite Canada finding him free of suspicion, a US officials said in a letter.

The letter, written last week by the US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff, said that the US still maintains Maher Aher, who was cleared last year of terror ties by Ottawa, on a watch list based on US intelligence.

"Our departments, in conjunction with the intelligence community, have reexamined the materials in the possession of the United States regarding Mr. Arar. Based on that reexamination, we remain of the view that the continued watch-listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate," it said.

The letter said the basis for this conclusion is based on US information "independent of that provided to us by Canada regarding Mr. Arar."

Arar, who holds dual Canadian-Syrian citizenship, was detained by US authorities in New York while in transit from Tunisia to his home in Canada in September 2002 and deported to Syria where he was jailed for nearly a year.

After his return to Canada, Arar said he had been tortured and that both his arrest by the United States and interrogations in Syria were based on Canadian intelligence.

He has filed multimillion-dollar lawsuits against the governments of Canada and the United States.

Last September Canadian Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said he had advised Chertoff that a public inquiry had found "no evidence against Mr. Arar" and that Canada had stripped Arar's name from security lists.

"We want the government of the United States to do the same thing," he said.

On Monday, the US Center for Constitutional Rights, which is supporting Arar in his legal efforts, denounced the US keeping Arar on its watch list.

"It is now crystal clear that the US has shown everything it has on Mr. Arar to Canada, and that there is no reason for him to be on a watch-list," said center attorney Maria LaHood.

US Senator Patrick Leahy criticized the stance of the administration of President George W. Bush on Arar Monday.

"The reason the Arar case is such a sore point and such an offense to American values is that he was sent to Syria, on the Bush administrations orders, where he was tortured.

"Yet the Bush administration has yet to renounce the practice of sending detainees to countries that torture prisoners, and it has yet to offer even the hint of an apology to Mr. Arar for what he endured with our governments complicity."

Deputy Assistant Secretary For The Indefensible (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

"On the cold moonlit evening of March 5, 1770," writes David McCullough in his magisterial "John Adams," "the streets of Boston were covered by nearly a foot of snow." A crowd set upon a lone British sentry at Boston's Province House, taunting him. Quickly, reinforcements arrived, and so did a larger crowd. Soon the crowd hurled snowballs, chunks of ice, oyster shells and stones. The soldiers, now nine, opened fire, killing five Bostonians -- "bloody butchery," Samuel Adams called it. Only one lawyer would defend the British soldiers. He was a different Adams -- John Adams, a good man on the path to being great.

I resurrect this tale about Adams because it is sorely needed. Just this month, an official in the Bush administration, a deputy assistant secretary of defense named Charles D. Stimson, suggested that lawyers who defend terrorism suspects being held at Guantanamo not only should not do so but that their firms ought to be blackballed as a result.

"I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," he said in a radio interview. You may want to read that again.

It's hard to know where to begin. Shall it be with the notion that the Sept. 11 terrorists did not so much murder about 3,000 people as hit the "bottom line" of American corporations? This is a stunningly original take on that awful day, an auditor's reading of history that Stimson, in the spare time he deserves to have in abundance, might want to apply to the bombing of Pearl Harbor or the burning of Atlanta. I doubt that any CEO looks at Sept. 11 as a bad day at the office.

More to the point, what sort of lawyer -- and Stimson is one -- not only thinks that a terrorism suspect does not deserve counsel but that the counsel ought to be punished as a result? It's hard to fathom a lawyer saying such a thing -- even hard to fathom it from a mere citizen.

It would be just a waste of my time, I suppose, to point out that the Guantanamo suspects are just suspects, convicted so far of nothing. In fact, some of them have been released and others, arrested and held elsewhere, turned out to not be the mass murderers and master criminals the government, in a fit of hype, originally accused them of being. Anyone who thinks all prosecutors speak nothing but the truth need only familiarize themselves with the case of the lacrosse players at Duke. There's a sad lesson in American jurisprudence for you.

Naturally enough, Stimson's repudiation of everything John Adams stood for produced some protest, condemnation and outrage. Following the well-established Washington rule, Stimson apologized, doing so in a letter to The Post. He said his remarks did not reflect his "core beliefs." He did not blame his utterance on drugs, booze, Twinkies or a deep depression; he merely said that his words had left the wrong "impression." With that, he has returned to the obscurity from whence he came, his job presumably secure.

I, for one, do not accept Stimson's apology. I think it is insincerely offered and beside the point. What matters most is that he retains his job, which means he retains the confidence of his superiors in the government. How anyone can have confidence in such a man is beyond me. There are only two explanations, one inexcusable, the other chilling. The first is that his bosses don't care. The second is that they agree with him.

I would guess that Stimson strongly felt it was No. 2 -- agreement. From the get-go, the Bush administration has taken the position that anyone it detained on terrorism charges was guilty. Throw away the key. No need for lawyers. No need for judges. No need for anything except, of course, the word of the authorities. In recent months, a more assertive Congress and the courts have unaccountably challenged this view, and the Bush administration has beaten a tactical retreat on unchecked eavesdropping and the legality of trying alleged terrorists before military commissions. Still, we all know where its heart is on these matters. Justice is what the administration says it is.

By now, any other administration would have fired Stimson, apology or not. His words show that he is unfit for government service, not to mention membership in the bar. Fortunately for him, if and when someone does drop the ax, some misguided lawyer, infused with the spirit of John Adams, will defend him. I hope Stimson will forgive him.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bomb Threat Delays Plane (HC/AP)

The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 23, 2007

HOUSTON — A Continental Airlines Inc. commuter flight was delayed without incident for about an hour Monday after its scheduled landing at George Bush Intercontinental Airport because of a bomb threat, authorities said.

The flight from Tyler, about 200 miles north of Houston, landed about 10:50 a.m. and was diverted to a taxiway, where local, state and federal authorities took about an hour to determine the plane and its passengers were safe, said Marlene McClinton, spokeswoman for the Houston Airport System.

The airport continued to operate normally during the investigation, McClinton said.

The twin-turboprop, operated by Colgan Air Inc., holds 34 passengers, though it wasn't immediately known how many were onboard, a Continental spokeswoman said.

FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap described the incident as a "nonspecified bomb threat" that apparently started in Tyler. A call to the airport in the East Texas city, which is located between Dallas and Shreveport, La., was not immediately returned.

United Passenger Charged For Alleged Drunken Behavior On Flight (SLOT)

DOJ_NMG_0120153

SAN FRANCISCO - A United Airlines passenger faces federal charges for allegedly making statements about a hijacking, trying to open a cabin door and fighting with flight attendants while aboard a flight from Boston to San Francisco.

Erin Callahan Lambert, 28, who apparently was intoxicated during Flight 179 on Sunday, was taken into custody after the plane landed at San Francisco International Airport, authorities said. She was charged Monday with assaulting a flight attendant and interfering with the performance of duties of flight crew members.

About halfway through the six-hour, non-stop flight, Lambert got up, walked to the back of the plane and began talking on her cell phone, FBI Special Agent Brian Gilhooly wrote in an affidavit filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

When two flight attendants told Lambert to turn off the phone and return to her seat, she "refused and became combative," Gilhooly wrote. Asked who she was talking to, she said "I'm calling 911 because the plane is being hijacked," the affidavit said.

Lambert eventually returned to her seat, but later she tried to take her luggage, including her pet dog in a carrier, to the restroom, according to the affidavit. When told to leave her belongings at her seat, she said, "No, you are going to have to kill me and my dog," then locked herself in the restroom, Gilhooly wrote.

Lambert exited moments later and "started walking rapidly toward the front of the airplane," saying, "I'm getting off the aircraft," he wrote.

Flight attendants and passengers stopped her as she headed for a cabin door and forced her into a seat, where the plane's purser handcuffed her, according to the affidavit. She managed to wriggle free from those handcuffs, so plastic ties were placed on her wrists, it said.

"During the entire assault, Ms. Lambert was yelling profanities, cursing and spitting on the flight attendants and other passengers," Gilhooly wrote.

Lambert, a Bay Area resident, was turned over to San Francisco airport police upon arrival at SFO, where she refused to be interviewed by the FBI and requested an attorney, the affidavit said.

Chemical Insecurity (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

The new Democratic leadership in Congress has a chance to finally do what the Republican Congress and the Bush administration failed to do after Sept. 11: to protect the nation's chemical plants from an attack. Lawmakers should stop the Homeland Security Department from adopting new regulations that would block state and local governments from doing more to protect their residents and should finally pass a federal law with teeth.

An attack on a single plant could release deadly chemicals that could put hundreds of thousands of people at risk of death or serious injury. But since Sept. 11, the chemical industry — a major campaign contributor — has managed to ward off any significant new federal rules that might require it to spend money to increase security.

Now it is going a step further by trying to get the federal government to "pre-empt," or invalidate, state and local efforts to impose safety standards. Supporters of pre-emption always claim that they just want a uniform standard. But in situations like this one — where the federal law is absurdly weak — it is obvious that the real agenda is to block serious safety measures at every level of government.

Congress wisely refused to include a pre-emption provision in legislation it adopted last year. Now, however, the Homeland Security Department has proposed regulations that would give itself the authority to pre-empt state and local laws. If the proposed regulations were adopted, they could wipe away the serious chemical plant security law that New Jersey has passed, and prevent other states and cities from requiring the chemical industry to do more to protect their residents.

It is up to Congress to act. It should block these deeply flawed regulations and move quickly to pass a comprehensive law that imposes tough requirements on chemical plants to harden their facilities.

Last year Congress passed a bad rider, backed by the industry, that gives the chemical industry far too much leeway to decide on its own how its plants are vulnerable and how to protect them. The new law should contain specific requirements for plant safety. It should also require companies to switch to safer chemicals when the cost is not prohibitive, a key safety measure that the industry has resisted. And it should clearly state that federal chemical-plant laws do not pre-empt state and local laws. Congress should finally put the public's safety ahead of the chemical industry's bottom line.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Buildup Draws New Challenge (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

GOP's Sen. Warner is an author of the latest resolution opposing Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops.

WASHINGTON — Three Senate Republicans, including one of the White House's most powerful supporters of the Iraq war, introduced a resolution Monday to oppose any troop buildup — a serious setback for President Bush.

The latest challenge is led by Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, a widely respected onetime Navy secretary and former Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, who had been largely restrained in his criticism of the president's plan until Monday.

"I feel ever so strongly that the American GI was not trained, not sent over … to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shia and the wanton, incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Warner said at a news conference. The resolution is the second that aims to put Congress on the record against Bush's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 21,500, an issue the full Senate could start to debate next week. It expresses the sense that the Senate disagrees with the buildup and is largely similar to the earlier resolution, but is more deferential to presidential authority.

Warner's decision to introduce a nonbinding resolution — co-sponsored by Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, along with Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska — deals a blow to a White House that has been struggling to contain a revolt on Capitol Hill.

It was greeted warmly Monday by congressional war opponents, who are pushing to rein in the president and force him to begin bringing home the roughly 132,000 troops in Iraq.

"If you look at what has happened to this debate in the last 10 days … not only from Democrats, but Republicans, this has been a major kind of escalation of expression of opposition," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who has introduced legislation that would require the president to get congressional authorization for the additional troop deployments.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who last week introduced the other anti-buildup resolution with Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), said Biden was open to amending his resolution. Biden and other Democrats are working to round up the Republican votes that any resolution would need to overcome a possible filibuster. Sixty votes are required to cut off debate.

"What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war," said Elizabeth Alexander, Biden's spokeswoman.

The Biden resolution, unlike Warner's, calls Bush's proposal an "escalation," a word criticized by some Republicans as politically loaded because of its association with Vietnam. It also does not include wording that acknowledges the president's constitutional authority to direct the war.

On Monday, several Republican leaders rallied to the president's side.

"We should all want this strategy to work. We should do everything in our power to help make it work. And that begins by giving it a chance and not criticizing it before the strategy even has a few days to work out," Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an emphatic speech on the Senate floor. "That's why the possibility of a resolution, which is highly critical of the president's strategy and suggests a different course of action and a timeline for leaving, is the wrong strategy," said Kyl, the No. 3 GOP Senate leader.

In the House, Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who has expressed strong support for the White House, challenged Democrats to cooperate with Republicans to make the president's strategy work.

Also potentially complicating the congressional debate over the war is that a growing number of senators — including several presidential candidates — are promoting their own proposals to challenge the president's Iraq plans.

But Warner's stature as a longtime supporter of the military and onetime White House ally helped drive the sense Monday that Congress was moving closer to a powerful, if symbolic, repudiation of Bush's position.

The courtly five-term senator, whose bleak October assessment of the situation in Iraq helped unleash other GOP criticism of the White House in the run-up to the midterm election, was careful Monday not to directly challenge the president's role as the nation's commander in chief.

His resolution accepts the White House argument that "a failed state in Iraq would present a threat to regional and world peace" and explicitly rejects the calls of many Bush opponents for a withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"Those are matters that must be left to the president," Warner said on the floor of the Senate on Monday evening. "We do not mean to be confrontational with our president."

The resolution also accepts that additional troops may be needed in Al Anbar province to fight the insurgency there.

Bush has proposed deploying 4,000 of the 21,500 additional troops in the Sunni-dominated region.

But Warner and the resolution's other authors embraced many arguments made by the war's fiercest Democratic opponents.

The lawmakers also included the advice against an escalation by Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing Middle East commander. They quote Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's statement that "the crisis is political." They note the track record of unfulfilled promises by the Iraqi government. And they observe the growing public opposition to continued U.S. military presence in Iraq.

"The responsibility for Iraq's internal security and halting sectarian violence must rest primarily with the government of Iraq and Iraqi security forces," the resolution reads.

Warner said Monday that he envisions bringing up his resolution on the Senate floor as a substitute for Biden's.

But with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which Biden heads, set to begin consideration of the issue Wednesday, some senatorial aides say Democrats are likely to seek a compromise resolution.

WASHINGTON — Congressional Republicans pushed back Monday against President Bush's decision to increase troop strength in Iraq, some voicing opposition while others urged holding the administration and Iraqi government more accountable.

In the Senate, John Warner of Virginia, former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, joined fellow Republicans Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota in producing non-binding legislation expressing disagreement with Bush's plan. Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., joined them.

In the House of Representatives, members of the Republican leadership drafted a series of what they called "strategic benchmarks," and said the White House should submit monthly reports to Congress measuring progress.

The action taken by Collins, Coleman and Warner raised the number of Senate GOP publicly against Bush's plan to five. Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine have said they back the Democrats' resolution.

More Republicans Join Critics Of Bush Troop-Surge Strategy (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Weighing into the Iraq debate, the Republican past chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee broke ranks with the White House over sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to the war zone, especially for the purpose of quelling sectarian violence in Baghdad.

"The American GI was not trained, not sent over there, certainly not by resolution of this institution, to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and Shia and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," said Sen. John Warner (R., Va.) "That's a mission that's important...but it should be performed by the Iraqi forces and not the coalition forces."

Mr. Warner's remarks came as he and a handful of senators from both parties joined in offering a nonbinding Senate resolution intended to give voice to concerns about President Bush's policy. The tone is softer than a companion proposal offered last week by leading Democrats and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.), but showed promise last night of sparking negotiations on a compromise able to maximize support from both parties.

"This resolution is aimed at broadening the support for the resolution dealing with the president's plan," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D., Neb.), who joined with Mr. Warner and Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine) in drafting the resolution. In an interview last evening, Mr. Hagel said that Sen. Warner had allowed him to preview the language on Friday and found it to be, in some instances, more detailed than his own in specifying what course the administration should follow.

"The bottom line is this is a pretty significant piece of legislation," Mr. Hagel said. "In no way is this good news for the administration."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joe Biden (D., Del.), a chief sponsor of the earlier resolution with Sen. Hagel, has called a meeting tomorrow on the matter and signaled a willingness to accept changes to broaden support.

"What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war," said a Biden aide. "We're open to working with anybody and working on language to get a broad majority behind our resolution."

Nonetheless, the situation is complicated by the growing rivalry among would-be Democratic presidential candidates, including Mr. Biden himself. The Delaware Democrat has to navigate through this thicket, and if the various camps aren't careful, the whole debate could degenerate into the sort of political word games and posturing that so often bring ridicule on the Senate.

Mr. Bush, who delivers his State of the Union address before a joint session of Congress this evening, has shown no sign of backing away from the planned deployment of four infantry combat brigades over the coming months. But the nervousness among Republicans is palpable, especially among those up for re-election in 2008.

House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio surprised some of his own colleagues by proposing the creation of a bipartisan House select committee to oversee the president's strategy in Iraq and hold the White House accountable for achieving prescribed "benchmarks." And among the Republican senators speaking out most forcefully now are several facing re-election in two years.

"We're all struggling as to what the right thing to do is. On issues like this you are going to make some people happy and some people unhappy," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R., Minn.).

Mr. Warner, who will be 80 next month, is weighing his own future and whether to seek another term in 2008. Virginia just elected a Democrat, Sen. Jim Webb, a Vietnam veteran who ran strongly against the president on the war issue and will deliver the Democratic response to the State of the Union. But apart from any political considerations, Mr. Warner's unhappiness with the direction of the war has been growing for some time, and if he should break fully with the president, it would be a major blow.

"It's clear that the United States' strategy and operations in Iraq can only be sustained and achieved with the support of the American people," Mr. Warner said "I'm a veteran of the Vietnam period when I was secretary of the Navy, and while I suggest that that conflict does not have any direct parallels to this, I did witness the decline of the public support."

Key Republican Senator Offers Bipartisan Call To Reject Bush Plan For More Troops In Iraq (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, one of Congress's leading authorities on the military, presented a bipartisan proposal on Monday that soundly rejected President Bush's plan to send more American troops to Baghdad and urged the administration to find a new course in Iraq.

"Mr. President," Mr. Warner declared, "go back and look at all the options."

On the eve of the State of the Union address, the proposal by Mr. Warner and two fellow Republican senators, Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, along with Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, was offered as an alternative to an Iraq resolution backed by Democratic leaders and is to be debated this week by the Foreign Relations Committee.

While details of the competing Iraq plans varied, one point could not be mistaken: a growing number of senators in both parties find the president's strategy flawed. While some Republicans still vow to back the White House, the tough language from Mr. Warner, a former chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a onetime Navy secretary, dealt a blow to administration officials trying to salvage the Iraq plan.

"The American G.I. was not trained, not sent over there — certainly not by resolution of this institution — to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shia and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Mr. Warner said. "We don't lessen importance of that mission, but it should be performed by the Iraqi forces and not the coalition forces."

The new resolution reflected Mr. Warner's typical style — in their public comments, he and his allies took a diplomatic tone and sought to play down friction with the administration. Yet the language of the proposal itself was clear in declaring opposition to the troop buildup and urging the Iraqi leaders to seek a political solution to the sectarian violence.

"We've had four other surges since we first went into Iraq," Ms. Collins said. "None of them produced a long-lasting change in the situation on the ground. So I am very skeptical that this surge would produce the desired outcome."

The new Warner proposal and the resolution introduced last week by Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, and Carl Levin of Michigan, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, are similar in many respects. Both are nonbinding but declare that United States involvement in Iraq cannot be sustained without strong public support and that the main military mission in Iraq should be ensuring the nation's territorial integrity.

"There is no misunderstanding, if anyone votes for this, you disagree with the president here," Mr. Hagel said, adding that he and other supporters of his resolution were open to negotiations.

But Mr. Warner's proposal says the Senate "disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces," while the other resolution states that it is "not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence."

Mr. Warner engineered a similar resolution demanding a change in Iraq policy in 2005. Building on a Democratic bill, Mr. Warner, then chairman of the Armed Services Committee, maneuvered a resolution through Congress that called for Iraqis to take the lead in securing their country and required reports to Congress on progress there.

That proposal also required 2006 to be a year of transition to full sovereignty in Iraq, and Mr. Warner's new plan cites that requirement as part of the basis for resisting the troop buildup.

As early as next week, the full Senate could open the most extensive Iraq debate to be conducted in more than four years. The proposal unveiled Monday, sponsors said, was fashioned to be more palatable to moderate Democrats and Republicans because it seeks to employ recommendations from the Iraq Study Group and offers guidelines to establish a military strategy.

"It's important to send a strong message to the White House," Mr. Nelson said. "And it's a stronger message when it has significant bipartisan support."

As Mr. Warner and his coalition acted, House Republicans advanced their own plan on Monday, hoping to find some middle ground between unqualified support for Mr. Bush's plan and mounting resistance among the rank and file, who are moving away from the administration.

Under a plan announced Monday by Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader, and other senior Republicans, Mr. Bush would be required to provide monthly reports on progress in meeting goals in Iraq beginning this month.

Among the new "benchmarks" proposed by Republicans would be the level of cooperation by the Iraqi government in military efforts as well as Iraqi troop deployments and spending on military equipment. Republicans said they have also asked the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, to establish a bipartisan committee to monitor Mr. Bush's new strategy.

"The new majority has two choices," Mr. Boehner said. "They can either try to stop the president's new strategy and block funding for our troops, or they can join us in aggressively holding the Bush administration and the Iraqi government accountable for achieving success."

That comment hit a nerve with Democrats, who said Republicans failed consistently in their duty to scrutinize the administration's conduct of the war when they held majorities in the House and Senate.

"Where were the Republicans the last four years?" said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Ms. Pelosi.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who has proposed a resolution to block spending for any increase in troops, said the terminology in a final resolution may be less important than gaining Republican support for it.

"If you look at what has happened to this debate in the last 10 days here in the United States, where not only from the Democrats but from the Republicans, this has been a major escalation of expression of opposition, reservation, exasperation, frustration, by members of the president's own party," he said. "It's going to be reflected in the votes here."

Warner Bill Hits Bush's Troop Surge (WT)

By Charles Hurt

Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia and other Republicans publicly offered a resolution yesterday condemning President Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq.

The "Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges instead to consider all options and alternatives for achieving the strategic goals set forth below with reduced force levels than proposed," wrote Mr. Warner, joined by Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota.

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat, also helped draft the nonbinding resolution.

The six-page proposal was less critical than one offered last week by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, but still included strict instructions for how Mr. Bush should better wage the war in Iraq.

It also contained a harsh assessment of the current situation, indicating that a broad bipartisan coalition on Capitol Hill will desert the commander in chief if he presses forward with his plan to add troops.

"I feel ever so strongly that the American GI was not trained, not sent over there, certainly not by resolution of this institution, to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shi'a and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Mr. Warner told reporters yesterday.

"That's a mission that's important; we don't lessen importance of that mission. But it should be performed by the Iraqi forces and not the coalition forces," he said.

The resolution has not been formally introduced as a bill. It will be offered as an alternative to Mr. Biden's resolution when it reaches the Senate floor in the coming weeks.

The three lawmakers who were in the Senate at the time voted for the October 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq. Mr. Coleman did not join the Senate until 2003.

All four took pains at yesterday's press conference in the Capitol to include conciliatory words for the administration.

"The purpose of this resolution is not to cut our forces at the current level or to set any timetables for withdrawal, but rather to express the genuine -- and I repeat -- the genuine concerns of a number of senators from both parties about the president's plan," Mr. Warner said. "It is not meant to be confrontational but instead to provide a sense of bipartisan resolve that I hope we can achieve with regard to our new strategy in Iraq."

And, possibly more important, they embraced Mr. Bush's continued hopes for a victory there.

"We agree with the president -- a failed state of Iraq will threaten world peace for a long time to come," Mr. Warner said.

Mr. Coleman said the resolution "does recognize the consequences of failure. I want to succeed. I want to force us to succeed."

Among their directions is to increase troop levels in the volatile Anbar province, "specifically for the purpose of combating an insurgency, including elements associated with the Al Qaeda movement, and denying terrorists a safe haven."

Mr. Nelson said he expects the proposal to draw support from plenty of colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

"We've now just recently in the last hour or two circulated drafts. I've been talking to a number of my colleagues, many of whom have an interest in being supportive," he said. "This resolution will really, I think, be a very strong message to the White House."

He also said it avoids "any partisan rhetoric," a reference to the harsher Biden resolution, which has support from Mr. Nelson's Republican seatmate, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Although some Democrats who want to see troops withdrawn weren't signing onto the resolution yesterday, they hailed it as continued erosion of support for Mr. Bush's war policies.

"The opposition to the President's misguided escalation of the Iraq war is growing louder and louder," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat. "How much louder -- and how much clearer -- does the opposition to his plan need to be before the President will begin to listen and respond to the voices of the American people, the generals, and a bipartisan majority of Congress? The last thing America needs is to send more troops into a civil war that never would have been authorized by Congress, and will do nothing to end the war in Iraq."

Warner Backs Resolution Opposing Troop Increase (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, yesterday endorsed a new resolution opposing President Bush's buildup of troops in Baghdad, as even some of the most loyal Republicans scrambled to register their concerns and distance themselves from an unpopular policy.

The resolution, unveiled the day before the president's State of the Union address, is expected to garner the support of many Senate Republicans -- especially those facing reelection next year. The measure appeals to many rank-and-file Republicans because it allows them to voice their differences with the administration without embracing the highly critical language of another bipartisan resolution co-sponsored by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), one of the sharpest critics of the administration's Iraq policy.

By last night, Warner had already met with Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), and the two camps were negotiating a single resolution likely to be approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday.

Even House Republicans, once the president's firmest bulwark, made their skepticism clear yesterday, calling for firm benchmarks for success in the war that House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said would "hold the Bush administration and the Iraqi government accountable and require the administration to report to Congress every 30 days."

"I support the president's plan," Boehner said. "But we have a duty to candidly and honestly assess whether the new strategy will be effective and ultimately successful."

That statement marked an important shift within a Republican leadership that has rarely made demands on the administration's foreign policy team. With public support for the war at record lows, the Democrats back in control of Congress and many Republicans facing tough reelection campaigns in two years, party leaders feel they have little choice but to voice their disapproval with plans for a troop buildup.

With the introduction of the Warner resolution, five Republican senators are now on record opposing Bush's decision. The resolution's co-sponsors, Warner, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), are all up for reelection next year, as is Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who was included in the resolution's drafting over the weekend.

Another group of senior Republican senators, including Sens. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), are searching for their own avenue to express their concerns.

"The American people on November 7 changed management in the United States Congress. The overriding issue was Iraq," Hagel said. "What you're seeing is representative democracy in action. What you're seeing is the clear attitudes of the American people playing out among their elective representatives."

The Warner-Coleman-Collins resolution tones down some of the language in the competing resolution drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), Hagel and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and couches its recommendations in wording deferential to the constitutional authority of the president.

But it states that "the Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500."

"Our overall military, diplomatic and economic strategy should not be regarded as an 'open-ended' or unconditional commitment, but rather as a new strategy that hereafter should be conditioned upon the Iraqi government's meeting benchmarks that must be specified by the Administration," it concludes.

The House Republican benchmarks also represented a clear break from administration policy. Under the proposal, every 30 days the White House would have to present Congress clear measurements showing the Iraqi government's progress in purging insurgents and terrorists from its security forces, identifying the level of combat experience for Iraqi army battalions, tracking expenditures on Iraqi army equipment and measuring the effectiveness of the police force in Baghdad. The administration would also have to measure Iraqi government efforts to breed tolerance among its country's warring sects.

House Republicans also called on the administration to measure its efforts to cooperate with neighboring countries to stabilize Iraq, a push for regional diplomacy that the White House has resisted.

"We have a responsibility to reach across the aisle and to work with our Democrat counterparts to perform our obligation under the Constitution," Boehner said. "We're a separate branch of the government. We were sent here by the American people, and we believe that proper oversight of this plan and implementation of this plan can help make it successful."

Some Republican aides saw both the Senate and House developments as positive for Bush, because they give Republicans eager to voice their opposition to the president's Iraq policy ways to go on record without siding with the more forthright statements of opposition drafted with more Democratic support.

But Democrats characterized the development as strong evidence of Bush's eroding support. The Foreign Relations Committee will take up the Biden-Hagel language tomorrow and send a modified version for debate in the full Senate next week.

The Warner group has largely reached the same conclusion as Biden, Hagel and Levin: U.S. troops should focus on protecting Iraq's border, combating terrorism and training Iraqi forces, and the administration should step up diplomatic efforts to start a regional peace process.

Committee aides said they will study the Warner resolution and are almost certain to make changes to win support from his coalition.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) took to the Senate floor yesterday to implore his colleagues not to go through with a vote on any resolution of opposition, calling the effort "pernicious" and "very, very dangerous."

GOP Delivers New Blow On Troop Surge (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

George W. Bush's efforts to shore up support for his military surge in Iraq suffered another blow on Monday when a senior Republican senator came out against the controversial plan.

John Warner, the former navy secretary and until last month chairman of the armed services committee, said he would introduce a resolution opposing the sending of 21,500 more US troops to Iraq. The resolution was also backed by two Republican senators, Susan Collins and Norm Coleman, and by Ben Nelson, a conservative Democrat.

Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy to Osama bin Laden, taunted Mr Bush on Monday over his decision to send more troops to Iraq.

"Why send 20,000 only – why not send 50,000 or 100,000? Aren't you aware that the dogs of Iraq are pining for your troops' dead bodies?" he said in a video released the day before Mr Bush was to address the nation with his annual State of the Union speech.

The intensified opposition to the surge came the day before General David Petraeus, the incoming US commander in Iraq, was to face tough questions on Capitol Hill on whether Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his promise to crack down on sectarian militias.

Senators are unlikely to challenge the nomination of the respected soldier but they will grill Gen Petraeus on the plan to pacify Baghdad. The problem facing US and Iraqi forces was underscored on Monday by bombings across Iraq that claimed more than 100 lives.

Gen Petraeus will run a military operation that has run into resistance on Capitol Hill. In addition to Mr Warner, whose move could sway wavering Republicans, a number of Democrats are pushing symbolic resolutions intended to press Mr Bush to abandon the surge, while others are introducing measures that would cap the number of troops or block funding for an increase.

Mr Bush has argued that the surge will differ from previous failed operations in Baghdad because of the streng-thened commitment of Mr Maliki that there will be no political interference in operations aimed at clamping down on Shia militia loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr. The Shia cleric's political support has been crucial to the Maliki government.

Although US and Iraqi troops have raided safe houses used by the Mahdi army, Mr Sadr's militia, and detained commanders for months, US officers have accused the prime minister of offering political protection to the movement. In the past two weeks, however, that protection appears to have been withdrawn. In addition to raids on the Mahdi army over the past 10 days, US and Iraqi forces on Friday arrested Abdel al-Darraji, a senior aide to Mr Sadr.

But the continuation of insurgent attacks on civilian Shia targets such as the one on a busy Baghdad market on Monday that killed at least 88 people will test the authority of the government as it moves to dismantle a force that many Shia believe to be their first line of defence against Sunni extremists.

Also, the lack of benchmarks makes it difficult to gauge whether Mr Maliki genuinely wants to neutralise militias.

Congressional Republicans Voice Concerns Over Bush's Iraq Policy (LEXHL)

By Renee Schoof And Margaret Talev

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. John Warner, an influential Republican on military affairs, introduced a bipartisan resolution Monday that opposes President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more American troops to Iraq and urges shifting U.S. soldiers out of the middle of the sectarian killings that are raging in Baghdad.

On the eve of Bush's State of the Union address, Warner's resolution was one of two strong signals that Republicans in Congress sent Monday showing their doubts about the war. The other came from Republicans in the House of Representatives, who said they wanted Bush to certify on a monthly basis whatever progress was being made in Iraq on military, political and social benchmarks.

Combined with near-unanimous Democratic opposition to Bush's war policy, the Republican stands show a broad bipartisan lack of confidence in the president's course.

Warner said the United States already had "made a tremendous sacrifice in our nation of life and limb and largess" to establish Iraq's sovereignty, and that now Iraqi forces should stop the violence.

Under the president's plan, U.S. troops would be asked to help stop the death squads and bombings now racking Baghdad.

"I feel ever so strongly that the American GI was not trained, not sent over there, certainly not by resolution of this institution, to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shi'a and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Warner said.

House Republican leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who supports Bush's troop increase, made the recommendation for a monthly benchmark report in a letter to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and proposed that Pelosi create a bipartisan select committee to oversee the reports.

"Congress cannot and must not dictate the strategies or methods used in war," Boehner's letter said, "but we have a duty to the American people to candidly and honestly assess whether our efforts have been successful."

While Warner's resolution could pull support from a more strongly worded resolution of no confidence in Bush's Iraq policy that Democratic Senate leaders are promoting, it also could be the starting point for negotiations toward a compromise resolution opposing the troop increase that would win broad bipartisan support.

The resolution drafted by Warner and Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., and supported by Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., is nonconfrontational in tone. It stresses that the Senate doesn't question the president's power as commander in chief and notes that Bush himself, when he announced his new plan Jan. 10, invited members of Congress to suggest ways to improve it.

It's similar in key ways to a resolution proposed last week by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Carl Levin, D-Mich., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, and favored by Senate Democratic leaders.

Both resolutions oppose Bush's plan to increase the number of American troops in Iraq. Both stress that the job of quelling the fighting in Baghdad should belong to the Iraqi government, while U.S. troops should help protect Iraq's territory from outside assault, fight terrorists and train Iraqi troops.

But Warner's resolution avoids one politically loaded term: escalation. It uses the word "augment" to describe the president's increase in forces; the Biden resolution calls it "escalating" the U.S. military presence.

Warner said he'd vote against Biden's resolution as drafted but that he might support it if it were revised. The task of polishing the wording now goes to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which Biden chairs.

"What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war. We're open to working with anybody and look forward to a bipartisan discussion on the Biden-Hagel-Levin-Snowe resolution in the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday," Biden spokeswoman Elizabeth Alexander said.

Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said in an e-mail response to McClatchy Newspapers that "the president and Congress are in agreement on most elements of Iraq policy, including the Iraqis taking the lead in political reconciliation as well as security. ... The various resolutions show there are a lot of different ideas and disagreements on the way forward in Iraq."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Warner's proposal appeared to help more than hinder Democrats' efforts. "It appears to me that the president's going to have bipartisan opposition to the escalation, or augmentation, or whatever you want to call it," he said.

Rockefeller: Iraq Drains Security Funds (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, January 23, 2007

The new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee said he fears the government will not have enough money for homeland security and other domestic priorities because of President Bush's "Iraq adventure."

In an interview on Monday, Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., criticized almost every major facet of the Bush administration's national security course since Sept. 11, 2001. "The president has in a sense walked away from the war on terror," Rockefeller said.

Because of what he termed a misplaced fascination with Iraq based on faulty intelligence, Rockefeller said al-Qaida and Afghanistan have been neglected. He said he worries that U.S. intelligence on Iran is lacking, and what the nation knows about North Korea is even worse.

And he recently told Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson that domestic programs — such as education, health care, the environment and homeland security — are suffering. "That is one of my great, great worries about this Iraq adventure: the shortage of money for homeland security," he said.

Economically, "everything is going to close up and get tougher, and it's all because of the budget and the result of something called Iraq," Rockefeller later added. "I am furious about that."

In the State of the Union address Tuesday night, Bush is expected to reiterate that U.S. involvement in Iraq is part of a unified fight against terror, despite criticism from those who say the Iraqis themselves must do more to fight what now amounts to a civil war. Yet Bush has long said that if the United States doesn't stop the terrorists in Iraq, they will attack at home.

Disagreeing with Rockefeller, Missouri Sen. Kit Bond, the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said statements from al-Qaida's leaders prove Iraq is central to the fight against extremism. "Both Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri say that Iraq is the center piece in the war on terror. That is why they want to win it," he said in a separate interview.

Rockefeller plans two hearings this week on the course of intelligence reform. He said the FBI has made progress at protecting the country, but he still worries about the bureau's lack of technology and its ability to transition from an agency whose investigations are aimed at prosecuting criminals in court, to one that investigates to head off acts such as terrorism.

He said there are still missteps akin to those made on al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, in which the FBI pounces too quickly on a visa violation, rather than tracking a suspected terrorist to learn more about his activities.

Despite improvements at the FBI, he said, "I am not satisfied."

Rockefeller said he's also concerned that the Bush administration could be marching toward a military confrontation with Iran.

"Do I think it's possible that the president could get us involved marginally or even more fully in Iran as a way of distracting us from the war on terror, and from Iraq, as a way of getting past the elections in 2008?" Rockefeller asked. "I don't want to believe that. But after what I have been through with him ... yes, I worry about it enormously."

Rockefeller has formed working groups within his committee to focus on difficult national security issues, including Iran, and the 16 U.S. spy agencies are also working on a high-level National Intelligence Estimate on Iran.

Even as he and Bond have agreed on a forward-looking agenda, Rockefeller intends to finish the second phase of the committee's lingering investigation into the spy agencies' faulty prewar assessments of Iraq.

Rockefeller, who voted to authorize the Iraq invasion, said he was "a victim" of bad intelligence.

He said the intelligence analysis is better now, and he believes intelligence analysts are more willing to say when they don't know certain information. Yet he still sees many gaps in understanding — at the spy agencies and the White House.

The administration, he said, doesn't understand the insurgency because officials have never been in a war like this one. He's also concerned that the turmoil in Iraq will spill over into the region.

Rockefeller said he hasn't met Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but he does "not have a great deal" of faith in him. He said the United States must tell the Iraqis that American troops will leave — and they must believe it.

Then, the work will be up to the Sunnis and Shiites. "They have to face each other, and they really do have to decide for the first time since 1916 whether they can get along," he said, referring to the origins of the country that is now Iraq.

Lawmakers Have Loved Ones In Combat Zone (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

WASHINGTON — Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., lost his nephew, Philip, in Iraq. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., says his son, Alan, had two close calls: one from an improvised explosive device, the other from a sniper.

Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., credits his nightly prayers with his son Perry's narrow escape from a mortar attack in Fallujah.

Almost four years into the war, the conflict in Iraq has begun to touch some of the lawmakers who authorized it in a very personal way.

That reality — which stands in stark contrast to the popular stereotype of Congress — will be embodied tonight by Sen. Jim Webb, the Virginia Democrat delivering the response to President Bush's State of the Union address.

Webb's eldest son, Jimmy, is a Marine in the combat zone. He can't bring himself to talk about his son — not even to the president — but others speak eloquently of their loved ones' sacrifices.

"I understand and sympathize with the Americans who continue to support this war because they do not want their family and friends to have died in vain," Baucus said of his nephew's death in a Senate speech Feb. 10. "I know what it is like to pray for a reason and to become determined not to lose."

Perceptions of Congress

In his 2004 documentary Fahrenheit 9/11, filmmaker Michael Moore showed members of Congress sputtering as he put a camera in their faces and asked whether they'd send their children to Iraq. In arguing for a reinstatement of the military draft, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., suggested his colleagues were out of touch when they authorized the war. "I continue to believe that decision-makers would never have supported the invasion if more of them had family members in line for deployment," he wrote in a column last fall.

At least nine members of Congress have sons or daughters who have served in Iraq, according to the U.S. Senate Library. A tenth, Sen. John McCain, faces the possibility that his youngest son, Jimmy, will go there this year.

Like other Americans in similar situations, the lawmakers are torn by powerful emotions. "We worried every day, but that did not take away from our pride," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., whose stepson, Douglas Lehtinen and his wife, Lindsey, are Marine fighter pilots. They ended an eight-month tour of duty in Iraq last year; Lindsey Lehtinen may be headed back there this year, Ros-Lehtinen said.

It's difficult to determine exactly how many lawmakers have had relatives in Iraq because some don't want to talk about it. In part it's because they don't want to appear to be seeking special treatment; in part it's out of security concerns. "When Perry was actually in Fallujah, I didn't want to mention the location to make him some sort of higher-value target," Akin said.

The number of lawmakers with relatives involved in the war is probably lower than in past conflicts, congressional historians say, in part because there are fewer soldiers involved. Compared with Vietnam, Korea and World War II, "this is a fairly limited conflict," said Ray Smock, director of the Robert C. Byrd legislative resource center at Shepherd University.

Members of Congress with Iraq veterans in the family are as divided as the rest of the country over the war. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., cited his niece and nephew, who both enlisted in the Marines, in a speech where he expressed misgivings about the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Baucus and Webb are also against it.

Others say they will support the Bush plan — with varying degrees of enthusiasm. "I'm a reluctant supporter," said Rep. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo. The congressman's brother-in-law, Ryan Howell, is an Army major. Howell is back in the USA, and Hulshof said their talks over the family dinner table helped persuade him to back the Bush plan as a "last-ditch effort" to stabilize Iraq.

Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., whose son Sam is scheduled to return to Iraq for his second tour of duty this spring as the head of a Marine scout sniper platoon, is less equivocal. Bond said his son has convinced him that "pulling out early downgrades and denigrates the sacrifices that we've made."

Messages from the war

Members of Congress sometimes get bulletins from their relatives on the front lines. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., passed his Blackberry down the dais during House Armed Services Committee hearings, so his colleagues could read the latest message from his son, Alan, an Army reservist who spent a year in Iraq.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., who chaired the panel last year, said he was in a hearing when his son, also named Duncan, called him on a satellite phone during a battle in Fallujah.

The younger Hunter was "very unhappy," his father said, because the Marines were being ordered to stop attacking. "So I called up the Pentagon," the congressman said.

Lawmakers say having loved ones in Iraq makes them more sensitive to the war's implications. "When the early morning news comes on and says 'Marines killed in Iraq,' your stomach tightens," Bond said. Members of Congress insist, however, that their personal ties don't affect their decisions.

Baucus said he decided to oppose the president's proposal to increase troop levels because "our plan's not working," not because of his nephew's death. Hulshof said he voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of military force in Iraq even though his brother-in-law was on maneuvers in Kuwait and "I knew my vote was going to put him in the middle of things."

Webb, a Vietnam War combat veteran, said members of Congress should weigh their decisions with equal care whether it is their flesh and blood on the line or their constituents'. "Every single person up here should act like they have somebody over there," he said.

In New Tape, Al Qaeda Deputy Taunts Bush (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

CAIRO, Jan. 22 (AP) — Al Qaeda's deputy leader on Monday mocked President Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, challenging him to send the "entire army" and vowing that insurgents would defeat them, according to a new videotape released by an American group that tracks messages from Al Qaeda.

The group, the Washington-based SITE Institute, said it had intercepted the video from Ayman al-Zawahri, which had not yet been posted on militant Islamist Web sites, where his messages usually appear. SITE, which assesses and analyzes intelligence related to terrorism, did not elaborate on how it had received the message.

In the tape, Mr. Zawahri said the United States strategy for Iraq, outlined by Mr. Bush in a speech on Jan. 9, was doomed to fail.

"I ask him, why send 20,000 only — why not send 50,000 or 100,000?" Mr. Zawahri says on the video released by SITE. "Aren't you aware that the dogs of Iraq are pining for your troops' dead bodies?

"So send your entire army to be annihilated at the hands of the holy warriors to free the world from your evil," he continues, "because Iraq, land of the caliphate and jihad, is able to bury 10 armies like yours, with God's help and power."

The video showed Mr. Zawahri in a full gray beard, wearing a white turban, in front of a black backdrop.

The message was the first reaction from Al Qaeda's leadership to the new Iraq strategy.

The United States has said the extra troops will try to crack down on fighters from Al Qaeda and other Sunni Arab insurgents in Iraq, as well as Shiite militiamen who take part in sectarian violence.

General May See Early Success In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The battle for Baghdad will start in mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods chosen by military strategists as being the least likely to offer stiff resistance, raising the odds of early success, according to military planners and officials familiar with the thinking of the incoming Iraq commander, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus.

But that could be followed by a sharp increase in violence as insurgents learn U.S. and Iraqi tactics, military officials said.

The general, whose Senate confirmation hearing is scheduled for this morning, plans to send all 17,500 additional U.S. troops ordered by President Bush into Baghdad, regardless of whether Iraqi army units join the fight as planned, according to officials familiar with his thinking. Anticipating an uneven performance by the Iraqi army, military planners are advocating using American force and funding quickly to establish early victories, both in improving security and showing economic progress.

Petraeus's appointment as the top U.S. commander comes at a key point in the war, when public support is lower than ever and the congressional debate is coming to a head. The general offered a harsh critique of U.S. mistakes in Iraq in written testimony submitted to the Senate yesterday, noting a range of ills that included poorly managed elections and inadequate reconstruction plans. Now, as military and political leaders tout Petraeus as the best man to salvage the Iraq effort, he is in the delicate position of wanting to show progress quickly without raising expectations too high.

"This will be a difficult mission and time is not on our side," he states in the written testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Petraeus will require his troops to operate and live among the population, hoping to safeguard security and economic gains for neighborhoods cleared of violence. Military experts say that violence could decrease through April and May but that once insurgents get a feel for U.S. and Iraqi army tactics, a new "fighting season" could begin in late spring -- triggering potential political problems for U.S. public support of the operation.

Perhaps most important, Army insiders say they expect Petraeus to show a very different style from his reserved predecessor, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. "You are going to see a much more active command style than Casey," said one officer who has worked with both men. "Petraeus will be out walking the streets, visiting units and firing up both his Iraqi and coalition forces with his personal attention."

Like every active-duty officer and Pentagon official interviewed for this article, he asked not to be identified by name, noting the sensitivity of the situation as Petraeus awaits confirmation. Also, this officer noted, Petraeus has shown that he can use sticks as well as carrots: "He is also willing to fire people."

Petraeus aims to fly to Iraq as soon as possible, partly because, as one officer put it, he sees signs that "everyone's going on hold" there now as they await his arrival.

The plan to bring security to Baghdad will begin with the deployment of U.S. and Iraqi troops into nine sectors across the city. For years, most U.S. troops have lived on big "Forward Operating Bases." Petraeus plans to instead establish battalion command posts across the city. "I plan to ensure that some of our forces locate in the neighborhoods they protect," he said in his written statement.

People who have spoken with Petraeus recently said he believes that politicians and journalists have put too much emphasis on the increase in troop numbers and too little on his intention to use them differently. Their top priority will be protecting the Iraqi population, following counterinsurgency doctrine laid out in a new Army manual, which he oversaw, that says "the people are the prize."

The plan calls for large numbers of Iraqi and U.S. forces to flow into a targeted area like an ocean tide, temporarily overwhelming militia and insurgent fighters. But unlike in the past, when the tide goes out, it will leave behind a substantial residual force of Iraq army and police units, backed up by mobile U.S. troops. In this way, planners hope to "hold" neighborhoods rather than just "clear" them of the enemy.

The first big question will be whether Iraqi forces show up as promised. Early indications are good, said one person familiar with Iraqi troop movements over the past several days. But they will have to be monitored constantly. The next question will be whether the Iraqi forces actually do anything, or just pretend to comply with American requests. The third will be whether they remain to finish the job, or pull out before the campaign is really completed.

The next big question is how the militia of Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric who is anti-American and a major power in the Iraqi government, will respond to the new U.S. troop presence on the streets of Baghdad. Sadr's Mahdi Army, the single most powerful Shiite militia, has been implicated in death squad activities. "Actions taken in Sadr City will have to be carefully considered," Petraeus says in his statement, referring to Sadr's stronghold in eastern Baghdad.

U.S. military intelligence officers believe that Sadr initially won't confront the new U.S. troops. "I think the Mahdi Army will lay low where we are in present in strength," one intelligence officer predicted yesterday.

The combination of factors -- a militia response of waiting out the U.S. campaign, combined with initial operations in easier areas -- should cause a reduction in violence early in the campaign, said one Army insider. But he predicted that any drop would be short-lived.

By about March, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said recently, U.S. commanders should have a good assessment of whether the Iraqi government is able to deliver on its promises. He said that deployment of all five extra U.S. brigades in the pipeline will depend on Iraqi performance.

But people familiar with Petraeus's thinking say that he is likely to take a different course, ignoring any Iraqi shortcomings and asking for all five brigades of planned U.S. reinforcements, figuring out that a true test of the strategy of clearing and holding, and of protecting the citizenry of Baghdad, will require all those 17,500 troops. "To do what has to be done, they all have to go," said a senior defense official who met last week with Petraeus.

During the first months of the campaign, Petraeus is likely to be wary of declarations of success or calls from Capitol Hill to begin curtailing the troop increase. "Gaining the trust of the populace is going to take more than 30 to 90 days, which means the timeline for obtaining real results are out of sync with what the Hill and the U.S. populace is looking for in the way of results," a strategist for the Joint Staff said.

By April or early May, American planners hope that the levels of violence will begin to go down. But they also fear that this is the point at which the campaign could begin to go quietly sour. Insurgents and militias will have had time to study the new U.S. approaches and determine where the points of vulnerability exist.

By June, all the troops in the planned increase should be operating in Baghdad, with U.S. forces in the city having increased from 24,000 to about 41,000, and Iraqi troop levels rising from 42,000 to about 50,000.

By mid-summer, officers involved in planning said, Petraeus hopes to be able to point to a sustained decrease in violence.

Yet summer may bring the most dangerous point of the entire campaign, especially if U.S. forces begin to withdraw, warned retired Marine Col. Gary Anderson, who has advised top U.S. officials on insurgencies. He predicted that Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias will "wait out the surge, falling upon the Iraqi security forces when the Americans start leaving, causing a Tet-like effect where the light at the end of the tunnel is an oncoming train."

Petraeus Cites Errors In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

DOJ_NMG_0120167

Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is poised to become the top commander in Iraq, believes that the U.S. government has made a host of serious mistakes there, according to written testimony he submitted yesterday to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Among the errors he cites are inadequate planning for the occupation, failing to recognize the emergence of the insurgency, not having enough troops in certain areas and holding elections in such a way that they deepened Iraq's sectarian divisions.

Here are some excerpts (the entire document is available at washingtonpost.com):

-- "[T]here were a number of assumptions and assessments that did not bear out. Prominent among them was the assumption that Iraqis would remain in their barracks and ministry facilities and resume their functions as soon as interim governmental structures were in place."

-- "There was the feeling that elections would enhance the Iraqi sense of nationalism. Instead, the elections hardened sectarian positions as Iraqis voted largely based on ethnic and sectarian group identity."

-- "There was an underestimation of the security challenges in Iraq. . . . It repeatedly took us time to recognize changes in the security environment and to react to them. "

-- "Disbanding the Iraqi army . . . without simultaneously announcing a stipend and pension program for those in the Army. . . ."

-- "We took too long to recognize the growing insurgency and to take steps to counter it, though we did eventually come to grips with it."

137 Killed Or Found Dead Across Iraq (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, January 23, 2007

A suicide bomber crashed his car into a central Baghdad market crowded with Shiites just seconds after another car bomb tore through the stalls where vendors were hawking DVDs and used clothing, leaving 88 dead Monday in the bloodiest attack in two months.

The bombings, along with a double bombing that killed 12 people in the town of Khalis, battered Shiites during one of their holiest festivals. The attacks were the latest in a renewed campaign of insurgent violence in advance of a U.S.-Iraqi security operation.

In all, 137 people were killed or found dead across Iraq, including a teacher who was gunned down as she was on her way to work at a girls' school in a mainly Sunni area of Baghdad. The toll also included the bullet-riddled bodies of at least 30 people, apparent victims of death squads largely run by Shiite militias.

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed its fighters shot down an American military helicopter in a Saturday crash that killed 12 U.S. soldiers. The U.S. military has said the cause of the crash has not been determined.

In Washington, a senior military official said investigators found debris near the scene of the helicopter crash that could be part of a shoulder-fired weapon. The official requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Monday's explosions, which could be heard a mile away from the banks of the Tigris River, tore through the Bab al-Sharqi market shortly after noon in a clear attempt to kill as many people as possible at a time of day when commuters and shoppers tend to gather there in large numbers.

Witnesses said the force of the blasts sent jagged pieces of the sales stalls hurtling through the crowd. Body parts were strewn on the pavement, and heavy gunfire erupted. Black smoke billowed above the center of the capital.

Rescue workers could be seen hauling away a bloodied man on a wooden cart that vendors use to bring goods to market. His pants had been blown off.

Nearby al-Kindi Hospital and its morgue were filled to capacity. Many of the dead were laid out in the courtyard, covered with white and blue cloths, as loved ones crouched beside them shrieking in grief and shouting oaths against the attackers.

Hours later, a bomb struck a market in the predominantly Shiite town of Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, and a mortar shell slammed into the market. At least 12 people were killed and 29 wounded, police said.

Khalis is in the volatile Diyala province, where fighting has raged for weeks among Sunni insurgents, Shiite militiamen and U.S. and Iraqi troops.

In the provincial capital of Baqouba, state television reported that gunmen attacked the mayor's office, ransacking the building and setting off explosives that damaged the structure. Police said the mayor was kidnapped, a report that U.S. officials said they could not immediately confirm.

The twin bombing in Baghdad was the single deadliest attack against civilians in Iraq since Nov. 23, when suspected al-Qaida in Iraq fighters attacked the capital's Sadr City Shiite slum with a series of car bombs and mortars that struck in quick succession, killing at least 215 people.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, denounced Monday's attack and blamed Sunnis. "The alliance of the terrorists and the remnants of Saddam have committed an ugly crime," he said in a statement.

Brig. Jihad al-Jabiri, director of the explosives experts department in the Interior Ministry, told state television that each car apparently carried more than 190 pounds of explosives.

Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili said at least 78 people were killed and 156 were wounded, but police and hospital officials put the death toll at 88.

The attack occurred two days after the start of the 10-day festival leading up to Ashoura, which marks the death of Imam Hussein, grandson of the Prophet Muhammad and one of the most revered Shiite saints.

Imam Hussein died in the battle of Karbala in A.D. 680. The battle cemented a schism in Islam between Shiites and Sunnis, a division that has grown in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The festival culminates next week with processions and ceremonies, including self flagellation, in a show of grief to mark Hussein's death in battle.

Late Monday, the U.S. military announced it had launched a joint drive with Iraqi forces into a dangerous Sunni neighborhood in north Baghdad, a region that has seen significant violence in the sectarian warfare shaking the capital.

It was unclear if the operation marked the beginning of the security drive that al-Maliki and President Bush announced this month.

Bush has committed an additional 21,500 troops to the effort to secure Iraq, but congressional Democrats, mindful of a rising U.S. military death toll, oppose this move.

A U.S. soldier was killed Monday by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq, raising to 28 the number of American troops killed in the past three days; the U.S. military also reported that two Marines were killed Sunday in Anbar province.

Al-Qaida's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, mocked Bush's plan to send more troops, challenging him to send "the entire army" and vowing in a new videotape that insurgents will defeat them. The Washington-based SITE Institute, which tracks al-Qaida messages, said Monday it had intercepted the video, which had not been posted on Islamic militant Web sites.

The success of the new security plan is strongly linked to the Iraqi government's willingness and ability to take on Shiite militias and death squads. Past operations to end violence in the capital failed when al-Maliki intervened on behalf of his fellow Shiites.

In a rare statement that singled out the feared Mahdi Army of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the American military announced that U.S. and Iraqi forces captured 16 Shiite militia leaders and 33 key Sunni insurgents in the past 45 days. The military said 52 operations since Dec. 8 targeted the Mahdi Army, which has been blamed for much of the sectarian violence in the capital, while 42 focused on Sunni extremists.

U.S. and Iraqi military officials also detailed a recent operation near Baqouba in which they said 100 Sunni insurgents were killed and 50 captured.

88 Killed As Car Bombs Devastate Busy Baghdad Market (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 — Two powerful car bombs ripped through a market in central Baghdad on Monday, turning an area crowded with shoppers and commuters into one of the worst scenes of carnage since the war began.

The bombs killed at least 88 people and wounded 160 others even as the first of some 21,000 extra American troops ordered by President Bush began arriving in Baghdad, and as other troops took up positions on SunniShiite fault lines as part of a new strategy to secure the city.

After a weekend in which 27 American soldiers were killed in Iraq, the attacks underscored the challenges that even an augmented American force faces in trying to quell the sectarian attacks. Military officials privately expressed concerns that a renewed period of intense sectarian fighting could easily overwhelm their efforts.

In addition to the market attacks, a bombing in a Shiite town north of Baghdad killed 15 people on Monday. Elsewhere, Iraqi government officials and members of security forces continued to be shot, blown up and kidnapped.

The blasts at the Baghdad market were in a Shiite area and seemed to have been timed to inflict maximum damage, occurring at noon, one of the busiest times of day. The explosions left so many bodies that they had to be loaded one on top of another on wooden carts, according to witnesses. Other victims were simply blown to pieces.

Ali Hussein 47, a biologist who was on his way home, said he had been knocked off his feet. The force of the blasts, which went off just seconds apart, turned everyday items like lotions and DVDs into deadly projectiles.

"Bottles of perfumes and deodorants were flying in the air like small rockets," Mr. Hussein said outside Kindi Hospital, which was quickly overwhelmed with victims. "I was wounded in my right leg."

Police officials said the blasts had been so large that each of the cars used must have carried a huge amount of explosives. From the eastern banks of the Tigris nearby, the two explosions could be heard in quick succession.

Massive clouds of smoke billowed high into the sky, and as the fires caused by the explosion engulfed at least a dozen cars, the cloud drifted over the heavily fortified Green Zone, about a half-mile away.

In the past such Sunni aggression has been met by swift reprisals by Shiites, a cycle of violence that left some 34,000 Iraqis dead last year. Monday's bombings, directed so specifically at civilians, seemed intended to elicit a reprisal, much like the bombings in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City one day last fall, which killed 144 people.

Late Monday, a Sunni mosque in the Dora section of Baghdad was blown up. There were no reports of casualties. Residents said the attack was likely to have been retribution for the bombing of a Shiite mosque in the same neighborhood last week.

Elsewhere, the Sunni mayor of Baquba, Khalid al-Sanjari, was abducted Monday, and after armed gunmen took him way from his office they burned it to the ground, according to a local police official.

Residents in Baquba, about 25 miles northeast of Baghdad, said Mr. Sanjari had close ties with armed groups formerly affiliated with the Saddam Hussein government.

"It is strange that this man was kidnapped," one resident said. "The Iraqi police and army have arrested him more than once, and he was released because of lack of evidence."

Although it is far from clear who abducted the mayor, another resident said, "This is a punishment for him, because armed groups tend to get rid of the person who is no longer useful for them."

Late Monday evening, just north of Baquba, at least 15 people were killed and 39 wounded in coordinated bomb and mortar attacks in the Shiite town of Khalis, according to a local police official.

In Tal Afar, the police were attacked in a bombing that left three dead and nine wounded. The town is considered to be one of the few success stories of the American occupation, a place where violence was largely quelled after intensive intervention. It is being used as the model for the new strategy to secure Baghdad.

Meanwhile, a group claiming to represent Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia took responsibility for shooting down an American Black Hawk helicopter northeast of Baghdad on Saturday. Local Iraqi officials at the site of the crash, which killed all 12 people on board, said the helicopter had been attacked, but American officials here said there an investigation was in progress and did not confirm those accounts.

Monday's bombing in Baghdad was followed by prolonged gun battles. The fighting could be heard across the city, although officials did not release any casualty figures from the ensuing skirmishes.

At the site of the car bombings, the popular market in Bab al Sharji, next to the Museum of Modern Art, Iraqi Army troops spotted someone on a nearby rooftop shortly afterward filming the carnage.

DOJ_NMG_0120170

They went after him as he tried to escape by jumping from rooftop to rooftop before he was shot dead, according to an Iraqi Army official. The official said the man was Egyptian and was filming the attack to use as propaganda for the Sunni insurgents.

The scene after the fact was all too familiar: charred human remains, pools of blood, unrecognizable body parts strewn among the used electronic equipment, CDs and vegetables.

Many of the shops on the square sell used goods at discount prices and are popular among working-class residents. Although the area is mainly Shiite, Sunnis often shop at the market, residents said.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki condemned the attack. "The violent terrorists who committed this crime have illusions that their bloody ideology to kill large numbers of civilians will break the will of the Iraqis and tear their unity and to raise sectarianism," he said in a statement.

But on the streets of Baghdad, people said they had little hope for their country at the moment.

Outside the morgue, families lined up looking for loved ones. Bodies were lined up on the street, some covered in blue blankets. Near the dead there was a grim pile of arms and legs and other body parts.

Baghdad Market Bombings Kill At Least 79 (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 -- The near-simultaneous explosions of two powerful car bombs devastated a crowded street bazaar in central Baghdad on Monday, killing at least 79 people, wounding more than 140 and showering the pavement with shards of metal, tattered vending carts and bloodied human remains.

The midday attack at the Bab al-Sherji market was the second mass-casualty bombing attack in Baghdad in a week and the deadliest of the year. The T-shirt vendors, DVD dealers and fruit peddlers it targeted were primarily working-class Shiite Muslims, a sign that the Sunni Muslim insurgency remains capable of inflicting heavy losses even as Iraqi and U.S. forces prepare to intensify a security crackdown.

The attack came as Shiites were marking Ashura, the 10-day religious holiday commemorating the death of the prophet Muhammad's grandson in the 7th century.

The bombs exploded within seconds of each other around noon, a peak shopping time, and sent a dark mushroom of smoke high into the blue sky over Baghdad. Witnesses said a suicide attacker drove in with one of the bombs, veering his vehicle into a cluster of stands before blowing it up. A second car exploded about 150 yards to the northeast along the same street.

At the Baghdad market, a woman had just asked fruit vendor Ali Khadhim for oranges, so he turned from his wooden trolley to fill her order when the bomb went off. The force of the blast launched him about 10 yards, he said, and by the time he recovered his bearings, the oranges lay scattered on the ground and the woman was gone.

"I couldn't hear for a while," said Khadhim, 42, as he stood on the fringes of the bombing scene, his neck wrapped in a white bandage, his shirt collar darkened by bloodstains. "I was looking at my body, my neck was bleeding. For a moment I asked myself, am I still alive?"

He found a human arm on the ground not far from him. "I looked at it. I looked at my arm. Thank God it was not my arm," he said.

The bombing produced the worst carnage since a Nov. 23 attack in the Shiite slum of Sadr City that killed more than 200 people. A bombing at a university in Baghdad last Tuesday killed at least 65. Iraqi officials saw a connection with the earlier attacks and blamed Sunni insurgents and supporters of the former government of Saddam Hussein.

"One can say there is a pattern emerging. They are attacking the infrastructure of our society: One is the university, one is the marketplace. It is really very, very, worrying. And the government must take this very seriously," said Haider al-Ebadi, a Shiite member of parliament. He also worried about reprisals. "I hope this time is different, but this has happened before: Whenever there is indiscriminate killing, the Shiite militias react by killing Sunnis in similar numbers."

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki issued a statement condemning the attack and promising that "the security forces will pursue all those involved in this crime and bring them to justice."

The body count rose steadily throughout the day, but officials did not settle on a specific number. An official at the Health Ministry who spoke on condition of anonymity said that 87 people were killed and 207 wounded in the market bombings. Brig. Gen. Kasim Salim of the Interior Ministry said 79 people died and 168 were injured.

The bullet-riddled bodies of at least 30 people were found Monday, according to the Associated Press, which reported that a total of 137 Iraqis were killed or found dead across the country.

The timing of the attacks -- a day after the arrival in Baghdad of 3,200 additional U.S. troops intended to bolster the latest security crackdown -- prompted some Iraqi officials to speculate that the insurgents intended to provoke the Iraqi government into a hasty response.

The bombers "want to make the government start with their security plan before finishing all the preparations," said Hasan Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker, who promised that the government's security plan "will not allow things like this to happen."

In the shops and cloth-covered stalls near Tahrir Square, where vendors sell myriad discount goods, from camouflage military uniforms to CDs, secondhand clothes, electronics, tools and video-game consoles, residents expressed less optimism about the government's ability to respond.

An Iraqi police officer who wore a black ski mask over his face and would not give his name cursed Maliki. "Only the poor people are dying, and the killers on both sides are still alive," the officer said.

After the attack, shopkeepers picked through their scattered belongings. A bulldozer cleared the street while firefighters sprayed down the bloodied streets. Ahmed Hossein, 17, worked alongside them, using his wooden pushcart to ferry human body parts to waiting ambulances.

"I was putting in the heads and arms and legs that we found," he said. "But we couldn't match them. The pieces don't belong to one person."

"What did we do wrong?" he asked. "We voted for Maliki and this government; they have not given us anything, and now they're taking our lives."

Hossam Hadi gripped a broom and swept the broken glass from the floor of his clothing shop. Above him, dislodged wires and cables swung down into the room. "People don't care if they are watching this from outside. They are not losing their people. We are paying the price," he said. "Americans are stupid and slow, they see Maliki make mistakes and Bush says: 'Give him a chance.' He wants to try him out. Of course the Bush family is not paying the price. He has time to try people out, we don't."

Elsewhere Monday, a U.S. soldier was killed and four others were wounded by a roadside bomb in Nineveh province northwest of Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a statement. The soldiers belonged to Task Force Lightning assigned to the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division. The killings brought the three-day death toll for U.S. service members to at least 28. Twelve of those occurred when a Black Hawk helicopter crashed Saturday in Diyala province north of Baghdad.

A Sunni insurgent group, the Islamic State of Iraq, said it shot down the Black Hawk, according to a statement posted on the Internet. The U.S. military has not confirmed that the helicopter was shot down and a spokesman said Monday that the incident was still under investigation.

In Khalis, a town north of Baqubah, a bomb exploded in a market, followed by three mortar explosions, in an attack that killed 12 people and wounded 29, according to Ali al-Khayam, a spokesman for the Diyala provincial police.

100 Killed In Market Bombings, Attacks (WT/AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Twin bombings yesterday tore through stalls of vendors selling secondhand clothes and DVDs in a busy Baghdad market catering to Shi'ite Muslims during a religious festival.

A market also was attacked north of the capital, and police said about 100 people died in the renewed campaign blamed on Sunni Muslim insurgents.

The U.S. military also reported the deaths Sunday of two Marines, raising the two-day death toll to 27 in a particularly bloody weekend for U.S. forces in Iraq. A roadside bomb killed a U.S. soldier and wounded four others yesterday in northern Iraq, it said.

The two U.S. Marines were killed Sunday in separate attacks in the Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad, the military said. The deaths came a day after 25 U.S. troops were killed Saturday in the third-deadliest day since the war started in March 2003 -- eclipsed only by the one-day toll of 37 U.S. fatalities on Jan. 26, 2005, and 28 on the third day of the U.S. invasion.

The heaviest tolls Saturday came from a Black Hawk helicopter crash in which 12 U.S. soldiers were killed northeast of Baghdad and in an attack on a provincial government building in the Shi'ite holy city of Karbala that left five U.S. troops dead.

Investigators probing the scene found a tube that may have been part of a shoulder-fired weapon used to shoot down the aircraft, officials said.

Yesterday's first blast, a parked-car bomb, detonated shortly after noon in the Bab al-Sharqi market between Tayaran and Tahrir squares -- one of the busiest parts of Baghdad. Seconds later, a suicide car bomber drove into the crowd.

Police estimated that each car was loaded with 220 pounds of explosives.

Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili said at least 78 persons were killed and 156 were wounded, making it the deadliest attack in two months. Figures provided by police and hospital officials showed that as many as 88 people were killed.

Hours later, a bomb followed by a mortar attack rocked a market in the predominantly Shi'ite town of Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, killing at least 12 persons and wounding 29, police said.

The twin bombing in Baghdad was the single deadliest attack against civilians in Iraq since Nov. 23, when suspected al Qaeda in Iraq fighters attacked Baghdad's Sadr City Shi'ite slum with a series of car bombs and mortars that struck in quick succession, killing at least 215 persons.

In other violence, gunmen killed a teacher as she was on her way to work at a girls' school in the mainly Sunni area of Khadra in western Baghdad, police said, adding that the teacher's driver was wounded in the drive-by shooting.

Two mortar shells also landed on a primary school in the Sunni stronghold neighborhood of Dora in southern Baghdad, killing a woman waiting for her child and wounding eight students, police said.

88 Iraqis Killed In Blasts (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The Baghdad bombings are seen as a Sunni insurgent challenge to the U.S. troop buildup.

BAGHDAD — Insurgents set off a pair of car bombs in a crowded Baghdad market Monday, killing at least 88 Iraqis in what may be a warning sign that Sunni Arab militants will challenge the proposed U.S. playbook for calming the country's sectarian violence.

The explosions left gruesome scenes of chaos in the capital's Tayaran Square, often a frenzied crossroad of commerce and traffic. The wounded dragged themselves into taxis past mangled vendor carts, blackened debris and piles of soot.

Dazed survivors prodded bodies for signs of life and bandaged wounds with secondhand clothes from the market's thrift stores. The smell of burned flesh hung in the air for hours.

At least 168 Iraqis were wounded in the attack, which had sectarian overtones and was similar to blasts carried out by Sunni insurgents, particularly those with ties to foreign extremist groups. The majority of businesspeople and workers in Baghdad's downtown marketplaces are Shiite Muslims.

Analysts said the increase in Sunni violence had exposed a weakness in the U.S.-Iraqi effort to stabilize the capital. The Bush administration, which is boosting the number of troops in Iraq by 21,500, has promised to pacify Shiite militias thought to be targeting Sunnis. But Sunni attacks on Shiites have continued unabated, threatening to strengthen the Shiite population's support of its militias and jeopardizing efforts for talks between the two sects.

President Bush is expected to outline and promote his plan for securing Baghdad in his State of the Union address tonight.

Victims of the bombings cursed the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki as they hauled away bodies and debris.

"Where is Maliki now?" cried one man, whose brother died in the blasts. "We are being killed and they are sitting on their fancy chairs."

One more car bomb was detonated near fruit and vegetable stalls in the mostly Shiite town of Khalis, 30 miles north of Baghdad, killing at least 12 Iraqis and injuring 40.

Authorities discovered the bodies of 29 men, apparent victims of Shiite death squads, scattered across Baghdad.

At least one U.S. soldier was killed and four wounded in a roadside bombing in Nineveh province, which is predominantly Sunni.

At least 30 American troops have died since Friday in apparent Sunni attacks, including a well-coordinated assault in Karbala on Saturday in which uniformed men stormed a security compound and killed five troops.

Frederick W. Kagan, a military analyst at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the attacks on U.S. forces could be a reaction to new American operations in Baghdad or a retaliation for a recent battle on the capital's Haifa Street, where U.S. forces killed Sunni insurgents.

But he said militants also could be launching an all-out effort to discourage the U.S. from sending more troops.

"Some insurgent groups could be trying to mass against us to inflict casualties as a way of turning the surge off," he said.

Monday's bombings occurred about a mile across the Tigris River from the U.S.-protected Green Zone. As pedestrians and shopkeepers rushed to aid the victims of the first explosion, another powerful blast shook the ground.

"I saw scores of injured people covered with blood being evacuated, and smoke and fire at two locations," said Raed abu Ahmad, a businessman who was shopping for a cellphone. "I saw bodies covered with blankets and burning cars."

Sirens erupted throughout the capital as ambulances raced to and from the bombing sites. Jittery police at the square screamed at passersby and fired into the air, attempting to clear the area of pedestrians.

A group of police officers briefly detained a pair of Los Angeles Times reporters, seizing their cellphones, identification cards and a tape recorder for several minutes before returning them.

Soldiers attached to the Army's 2nd Infantry Division arrived soon after the blasts, the military said. The area was sealed off as dump trucks hauled away debris.

The bombings flooded five hospitals with the dead and wounded.

"Most of the victims were burned and injured to the head and upper body," said Imad Abdul-Hadi, a medical assistant at a neurology hospital that took in more than 65 bombing victims. "Our hospital is suffering, as we are working at full capacity in a most abnormal way."

Witnesses were baffled by the attack's target, which appeared to be a group of stalls selling cigarettes and produce. Some said the first blast was caused by a suicide bomber driving a beat-up Volkswagen into a cafe.

The owners, vendors and laborers in the market tend to be Shiites, a result of longtime Sunni domination of government and civil service jobs that forced Shiites, Jews and Kurds to turn to the private sector for employment, especially in Baghdad.

"There weren't any Americans or Iraqi security forces," one witness said. "I don't know why they would target these people."

By early afternoon, several shopkeepers had reopened in an attempt to salvage some of the day's lost business and help pay for repairs after the blasts, which shattered windows and sent shrapnel hurtling through doors.

"This isn't the first time this has happened," said an employee of an appliance repair shop. "They're targeting innocent people. We could understand if they were targeting American or even Iraqi forces. Those are their ultimate enemies. But doing it this way is meaningless."

Gunmen killed a Sunni tribal leader in west Baghdad and a police academy trainer in east Baghdad. Mortar rounds struck a Shiite enclave in south Baghdad and a Sunni section of west Baghdad, killing four people and injuring 11.

Northeast of the capital, gunmen kidnapped Khalid Fenjari, the mayor of the provincial capital of Baqubah, which in recent weeks has been riven by sectarian warfare. The gunmen blew up the mayor's headquarters.

An investigation continued on the weekend crash of a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter, which killed 12 troops.

Fragments found at the crash site northeast of Baghdad have led investigators to think the helicopter may have been shot down by militants, said a defense official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Associated Press said investigators had found a tube that might be part of a shoulder-fired weapon. U.S. officials were not able to confirm the report.

Al-Qaida Group Claims Copter Shoot Down (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed Monday that its fighters shot down an American military helicopter in a crash that killed 12 U.S. soldiers. The U.S. military has said the cause of the crash has not been determined.

The insurgent coalition, the Islamic State in Iraq, posted the claim on an Islamic Web site, saying that "the lions of Iraq's Islamic state managed to down a Black Hawk on Saturday, which was followed by a clash with the Crusaders, and that led to the destruction of two Humvees and the annihilation of those inside, thanks be to God."

The posting's authenticity could not be independently verified, but it appeared on a Web site used as a clearing house for militant statements. The Islamic State in Iraq is believed to be the political wing of al-Qaida in Iraq.

The Army Black Hawk crashed in good weather in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias for months in the province.

A U.S. military spokeswoman, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, said the cause had not been determined. Navy Capt. Frank Pascual, a member of a U.S. media relations team in the United Arab Emirates, told Al-Arabiya television that the helicopter was believed to have suffered technical troubles before going down.

In Washington, a senior U.S. military official said Monday that investigators had found debris near the crash scene that could belong to a shoulder-fired weapon which may have been used to shoot down the helicopter. The official, who requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said there was some belief that the piece of debris was a tube.

Officials were still combing through the debris to make a final determination about the cause of the crash.

The helicopter crash was the fourth deadliest since the start of the war in March 2003.

In The Vortex Of Baghdad, Staying Put This Time (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 — Two blocks from the new American outpost in Ghazaliya, one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, a fight was raging. Shiites were battling Sunnis, the latest skirmish in a sectarian war that has left this area a wasteland.

On Friday morning, it became an American fight, too, after a few rounds whizzed by Sgt. Sergej Michaud's head, and he and three other soldiers returned fire.

The battle would rage for nearly an hour, with mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades exploding near the soldiers, who in turn laid down heavy fire, eventually driving the attackers away.

Previously, that would have been the end of it, with the soldiers moving on to their next patrol area and eventually returning to their base. But this time, the Americans were staying, defending their new home in a neighborhood where the rule of law had been driven out by the reign of the gun.

Their outpost here, a cluster of fortified houses officially designated a joint security station and unofficially called the Alamo by some of the soldiers, is a test case for President Bush's new Baghdad security plan. The strategy envisions at least 20 more facilities like it in other troubled neighborhoods, all jointly staffed by Iraqi and American forces.

Even after the stations are set up, American commanders say, it will be many months, at best, before they can even hope to prevent bombings like the one that killed at least 88 people in a central Baghdad market area on Monday.

In the week since the Americans arrived, however, the troops have seen the truth of what their commanders warned in announcing the plan: it leaves Americans more exposed than ever, stationary targets for warring militias.

The outpost sits on the fault line between Sunni and Shiite enclaves: Ghazaliya to the south, where fighters with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have moved in among the Sunni population, and Shula to the north, a base for Shiite militias that have been raiding this neighborhood for months.

Over the course of three days spent with the 105 soldiers here — Company C of the Second Battalion, 12th Cavalry — four American vehicles were hit by roadside bombs near the outpost. No soldiers from Company C were wounded, but they know the fighting will intensify.

"I'm a juicy target they are just trying to figure out," said Capt. Erik Peterson, 29, the commander at the outpost.

During the week, the soldiers also received their first glimpse of the green Iraqi forces who will share the mission and eventually, they hoped, take it over. The soldiers talked about them with a mixture of bemusement, disdain and mistrust.

"You could talk about partnership, but you would be lying," said one soldier who asked that his name not be used, for fear of punishment by his superiors.

It was also a week to start getting to know the desperate residents of Ghazaliya, where almost every remaining family has lost someone to kidnappings and executions, and where government services have long been cut off.

In their new role, the Americans find themselves acting as jailers and doctors, construction workers and garbage men, guardians and detectives — all in an effort to restore lasting order despite the threats on every side.

Wednesday: First Test

After three days of grueling work on muddy and filthy ground, including installing blast walls around the perimeter, filling 5,000 sandbags and hauling away trash, the soldiers had the beginnings of a functioning base on Wednesday.

That night, they had their first real test. It was nearing midnight, the generator had failed, there was no heat, the radio was malfunctioning — and an Iraqi girl no more than 4 was dying in the bitter cold on an Army cot.

At the same time, a loud firefight erupted outside, apparently an attack on an Iraqi Army checkpoint nearby.

Captain Peterson had brought the sick child to the base because her family was afraid to travel after curfew and no Iraqi government ambulance would dare visit the neighborhood after dark, if at all.

One of the company's medics, Cpl. Peter Callahan, 23, worked by flashlight, trying to soothe the girl, whose body was rejecting the medication her parents had given her.

"She needs to go to the hospital right now," he told Captain Peterson. With no time to call in support, Captain Peterson quickly arranged a convoy to the nearest hospital — a risky proposition even in daylight and with more soldiers to provide security.

But the girl's Sunni family resisted, fearing they would be killed at the hospital, which was in Shula, the Shiite district, if the Americans left them there.

Frustrated, Captain Peterson said over the radio, "I think they are pretty much willing to let this kid die instead of all dying together."

The Americans decided to head to a safer hospital farther away. But time was running out; the girl's pulse was dropping fast, dipping below 25.

Corporal Callahan gave her a small shot of atropine, which was all he had, to increase her heart rate. She stabilized, and when he emerged with the girl alive and breathing, he and her parents could barely contain their joy. He had saved her life.

Thursday: The Neighbors

After fortifying the outpost, the soldiers of Company C were ready for their first foray into the neighborhood. Most of them were familiar with the area, having conducted patrols here in armored Humvees for months, from a base near Baghdad's airport.

The platoon leader, First Lt. Samuel Cartee, 25, reminded his men that this would be different. "They know where we are coming from," he said.

It would be a short trip on foot, just two blocks north, circling back and checking out a local market area. The biggest threat was snipers.

"If we get shot at, and we know what house it is coming from, we are authorized to raid that house," he said.

A few minutes after setting out, the soldiers passed a school that, like the other two in the area, was closed. Two months ago, American officers say, a teacher was raped, mutilated and strung up by her feet outside the building, left to hang for days.

It was unclear whether the killing was conducted by Shiites or Sunnis. But American officers said women were increasingly being attacked, especially by elements of Al Qaeda in the southern part of the neighborhood.

The soldiers soon came to an open area, and a shot rang out. A sniper.

They ran across the trash-strewn lot and took up battle positions, backs against a concrete wall, sun in their eyes. The shot came from about two blocks away — too far to pursue the shooter, who would be gone by the time they got there.

Later, two more snipers took shots, both far off the mark.

The Americans continued on, trudging through streets where rainwater had collected in pools and mixed with the open sewers.

Lieutenant Cartee passed out a flier announcing the presence of the station and inviting residents to call with information or problems. In this Sunni part of town, all the tips would point north, toward Shiite Shula. That fact was clearly painted in English on one wall the soldiers passed.

"Hey Americans, we want you to destroy the J.A.M." It was a reference to the largest Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army. In smaller letters, someone had written an equally clear message: "Bush is appalling and dreadful."

The soldiers made it to the market, and a crowd formed around them. But the soldiers were mostly unable to talk: interpreters are favored targets of snipers, so theirs had to stay in the armored Humvee that trailed behind.

The entire patrol lasted less than an hour. They had been shot at three times, handed out their new phone number to a few dozen people, seen several newly opened stores and made it back alive.

"Nice neighborhood," Lieutenant Cartee said, deadpan.

That evening, a firefight began outside, close enough that tracer fire whizzed over the station. But the Americans did not seem to be the target, this night at least.

Friday: Troubling Thoughts

The first big fight for the Americans came the next morning — the battle that found Sergeant Michaud. When it was over, the Americans had killed two suspected militia members and taken two prisoner.

The suspects were young men, wearing black — the uniform of the Mahdi militia. The Americans blindfolded them and put them in separate rooms, where they were tested for residue from explosives and held for questioning.

As residents began arriving to offer information, a man who lived next to the new station, a Sunni and former police commander, loaded his family's possessions into a pickup truck.

He was happy that the Americans were there, he said, but he was afraid that they would attract constant attacks, so he was moving to a different part of the neighborhood. As he packed up his family, he noticed a young boy loitering. The man became enraged, pointing two fingers at his eyes, then pointing at the boy, yelling, "Mahdi! Mahdi!"

The man explained that both the Mahdi Army and Al Qaeda were sending spies to see who was feeding the Americans information. The boy slipped away.

At the same time, Iraqi Army soldiers were starting to move into the outpost. They arrived in the late afternoon, one truck with a flat tire towing another truck that was not working.

Maj. Chasib Kattab, a boisterous Shiite who commands the Iraqi unit of two companies, about 200 men, started to provide information. But, in a likely hint of things to come, all his tips involved Sunni fighters. He had nothing to say about the Shiite militias.

He also seemed eager to fight. When he told the Americans about a car that was likely to be used as a bomb, he asked whether American helicopters would be able to destroy it. Told that, at night, they could make out the shape but not the color, Major Chasib seemed to think that was good enough. "They should just shoot it," he said.

Captain Peterson had to explain that was not how things worked, aware that his partner's decisions would affect how the Americans would be perceived.

Captain Peterson was under no illusions that establishing security and training the Iraqis to maintain it would be a difficult operation that could take time. He said he was initially skeptical about the plan, thinking the risks might be too great. But looking back over his experiences this fall patrolling the neighborhood, he said he had changed his mind.

One recent event in particular swayed him. When the Americans canceled their usual patrol on Jan. 3, Sunni extremists used the opportunity to bait militiamen by waging war on the small Shiite civilian population in Ghazaliya.

“They just went into the streets and started killing as many people as they could,” he said. Captain Peterson was at the main American base for western Baghdad, three miles away near the airport, and it took him nearly an hour to respond to pleas for help.

“It was such a helpless feeling for me,” he said.

Corporal Callahan, for his part, said that he was not sure he agrees with the war, and that he knew his wife, Stacie, thought it was terrible. But to get through it, he focuses on the people he can help, like the little Iraqi girl he saved.

“As long as I am here, I am going to try and make it worthwhile as far as the kids are concerned,” he said. “The adults, they are going to do what they are going to do.”

Sunni Sheik Declares War On The Insurgency (LAT)

By Tony Perry,

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

A business-minded tribal leader in Al Anbar forges an alliance with U.S. forces.

RAMADI, IRAQ — At 35, he is younger than many sheiks. And his Sunni Arab tribe is not one of the largest in Al Anbar province. But Sheik Sattar Bazeaa Fatikhan projects the aura of power and seriousness that comes to a man who has taken a stand.

After Sunni insurgents killed his father and four of his brothers last year, Fatikhan declared war against the insurgency.

He convened a summit of about a dozen prominent sheiks. From that meeting came a document called "The Awakening," in which Fatikhan persuaded all but one sheik to join him in opposition to the insurgency.

The sheiks pledged to encourage young men to join the police force and even the Shiite-led army. The document states that killing an American is the same as killing a member of their tribes. Since the gathering, Fatikhan said, the sheiks have "eliminated" a number of insurgents.

U.S. officials regularly visit Fatikhan, seeking his counsel, showing him the kind of deference one might expect for a leading government official. When a British general visited recently, Fatikhan, the sheik of the Abo Resha tribe, noted that his great-grandfather had fought against the British in the early 1940s.

Still, he said, "The British respected the sheiks."

In a two-hour interview in his large, carpeted meeting hall, a stream of underlings whispered to Fatikhan or handed him messages. He nodded or spoke a few words, and they hurried off. Later, he allowed himself to joke about the duties of being a sheik.

"They give me a headache," he said through an interpreter.

Drinking tea and smoking Marlboros, Fatikhan listened to questions and then gave an unvarying response: The U.S. military and Iraqi tribes must unite to rid Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province of men who would "try to engineer our future with mortars and roadside bombs."

For U.S. forces, Fatikhan's stand is a significant boost in a bitter fight with insurgents who, until recently, controlled large segments of Ramadi, the provincial capital.

Army Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade Combat Team, 1st Armored Division, credits Fatikhan and other sheiks for an increase in police enrollment, a decrease in insurgent recruitment and new courage among Iraqi forces.

A year ago, insurgents blew up every police station in Ramadi, and officers were afraid to return to duty. The U.S. military rebuilt many of the stations. During a recent attack, Iraqi police officers stood their ground.

"They would not be intimidated," MacFarland said. "Why? Because their sheik, whom they respect, told them, 'You must do this.' "

Fatikhan ordered his followers to "adopt" the U.S. Army's liaison to the tribes and give him an Arabic name, Wissam, which means warrior. After the officer, Capt. Travis Patriquin, was killed by a roadside bomb, the sheik ordered that one of the new police stations be named in his honor.

This month, Fatikhan was host of the first Ramadi reconstruction conference, held behind the high walls of his family compound. Contractors, sheiks and others met with U.S. officials to discuss projects to pave roads, rebuild schools and improve electrical, sewer, phone and water systems.

Fatikhan, who wears tailored suits when not in traditional clothing, understands U.S. politics. He told a visiting journalist, "Please take a message to the Democrats: Let the American forces stay until we can hold Iraq together. Then we will have a party when American forces go."

Outside Fatikhan's meeting room, other sheiks, some much older, waited to talk to him. So did Iraqi police officials. The sheik's bodyguards were nearby.

He offered his American and British visitors sweet tea and insisted that they stay for a lunch of goat, rice and sauces.

"The terrorists are not here for the interests of Iraq," Fatikhan said. "We don't need them here to say they're here to defend us. If Iraq was in danger, the real people of Iraq would stand up and defend Iraq."

He referred to the U.S. and Britain as "the two great nations."

British Lt. Gen. G.C.M. Lamb was quick to return the compliment.

"Baghdad was once considered the center of the civilized world, so I believe we have three great nations engaged in a great purpose," Lamb said.

"The British had an empire and lost it," he added, "and so we have learned that we do not know everything, that there is wisdom in many places."

Fatikhan is not above criticizing the U.S.-led forces.

"The coalition forces made many mistakes," he said. "That led a lot of people to accept [Al Qaeda's] offer: 'We will get rid of the coalition forces.' That was a mistake the people made."

Fatikhan said he didn't fear being killed. He has many bodyguards, and a U.S. tank is parked outside his compound.

"They killed my father and brothers," he said. "I have a different spirit."

His surviving brother lives in the family compound with him and his wife and five children.

The sheik has not traveled outside the Middle East but said he would like to visit Germany, Britain and the U.S.

He joked, without smiling, "When there is peace, I will learn English."

The alliance between U.S. forces and the sheiks is a marriage of convenience. The sheiks are rivals of the elected government in Al Anbar that the U.S. supports, but there is no functioning government in Ramadi.

"Their interests align with us — none of the tribes is making any money during the war," MacFarland said. "Many, like the mafia, own construction companies. There are limits on how far down their path we can walk together, but today it's a very good relationship."

Fatikhan is looking beyond the present toward posterity.

"Let history mention a hero, a man who brought the tribes together to fight," he said. "Let history show that a sheik stood up."

Residents: Baqouba Is Deadly Ghost City (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, January 23, 2007

Two tales of one city.

Many residents of Baqouba say they live hunkered down in cold, dark houses afraid to go out, that the once mixed Shiite-Sunni neighborhoods are riven by sectarian cleansing, that the police force has virtually collapsed, and that longtime rituals — like the annual orange festival — have become unthinkable.

U.S. and Iraqi military officials, in response to questions, paint a different portrait. They insist the city is not nearly as dangerous as "rumors" put it. According to them, Baqouba is improving and violence is down.

Events Monday seemed to contradict those assertions. A car bomb and mortar bombardment in nearby Khalis killed at least 12 people, and state television reported that gunmen in Baqouba proper attacked the mayor's office, ransacking the building and setting off explosive charges that damaged the structure. Police said the Sunni mayor was kidnapped, a report U.S. officials said they could not immediately confirm.

In a video news conference just prior to the attack and in an e-mail response two days earlier to The Associated Press, a senior U.S. military officer emphasized that progress is being made in Baqouba.

"The slow improvement of services is an example of the effects terrorism has on a community," said Col. David W. Sutherland, 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, said in his e-mail response. "The terrorists would have you believe there is no electricity, when in reality, most of the province has about 12 hours a day, which is better than the national average of 11 hours."

Terrorists "would have you believe schools and markets are closed and people are afraid to go out of their homes. Again, in reality, markets are open with fruits, meat, and produce readily available," Sutherland said.

Baqouba is a market center set amid lush orange and date groves about 35 miles north of Baghdad. It is also the capital of Diyala province, abutting Iran. In past years, Shiites and Sunnis abided here in relative peace, until a few months after the ouster of Saddam Hussein, when Sunni insurgents from rural areas began pushing into the city, then about equally divided between Shiites and Sunnis.

In a series of interviews conducted with residents by two Associated Press employees who live in the city but cannot move around freely because of security concerns, and also by telephone from Baghdad, townspeople from both sects gave a bleak assessment of life in Baqouba today.

They describe it as a place where Sunni insurgents signal one another by firing into the air and where in moments a quiet street can be turned into a sectarian hunting ground.

It begins with a pistol shot. Twenty minutes later, masked gunmen carrying automatic rifles march by the dozens through the streets, then set up checkpoints and demand identity cards from anyone who ventures outside. Before Iraqi soldiers or U.S. troops respond, the gunmen usually vanish like ghosts. But not always.

There have been major battles in Baqouba between the Iraqi forces and insurgents, raging firefights that have driven residents inside, where they say they stay home from work and away from schools and universities.

In the highly unusual teleconference, U.S. and Iraqi military leaders in Diyala province detailed a major operation last week in which about 100 insurgents were killed near Balad Ruz, a town 20 miles east of Baqouba. More than 1,300 rockets and 1,100 rocket-propelled grenades and launchers were seized, he said.

"The situation in Baqouba is reassuring and under control — but there are some rumors circulated by bad people," said provincial police commander Gen. Ghanem al-Qureishi.

Maj. Gen. Shaker Hulayel, commander of the 5th Division of the Iraqi army, added that "residents are going as usual with their work. ... Markets are open and trade continues. This is in addition to recruitment for police forces that are going on."

Residents interviewed by AP reporters on the basis that their names not be used because of security fears acknowledge markets are open, but, they say, only for a few hours a day. They say they are able to duck out for supplies, mostly food, for brief periods.

They also said they feel isolated, because roads in and out are too dangerous to use, phones work only sporadically. Electricity is rare. Water, they contend, flows through city mains about an hour a day.

"You rarely see anyone in the streets after midday," said one resident reached on a satellite telephone late last week. Gunfire crackled in the background. "People are fed up because all they hear is gunfire and explosions."

"We have no social life. We stay at home all day and the road is too dangerous to go to Baghdad," the resident said.

Another resident complained about a lack of services, blamed the government and said she yearned for the days of Saddam Hussein.

"We thought our life was going to get better. Had we stayed like before it would have been better," the woman said in a videotaped interview as she made tea over a kerosene heater.

Residents claim Sunni and Shiite gunmen have cleared some formerly mixed neighborhoods of sect members who were in the minority.

The al-Mualimeen district in the southwest of the city and the western Tahrir neighborhood are now mostly Sunni while the Huwaider neighborhood, also in the southwestern district, now is nearly all Shiite.

In June, al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike on his hideout near Baqouba, and his death was followed by a series of raids that the military said revealed a "treasure trove" of intelligence.

But the situation in Baqouba began to worsen in October when the predominantly Shiite Iraqi army launched a major detention campaign against suspected Sunni insurgents in the city. Angry Sunnis have fought back.

Days after the start of the campaign, leaflets of a little-known group called the "Mujahedeen of Diyala" were found in the streets. They demanded the resignation of the army and police commanders as well as the governor of the province — all Shiites — within 30 days.

None of the three resigned by the deadline. The insurgents attacked police, leaving scores of people dead. The police force nearly collapsed in late November, and the city has been under the authority of the Iraqi army since then.

And despite the success of the operation against insurgents in nearby Balad Ruz and the military assertions to the contrary, a Shiite resident of Baqouba spoke despairingly in front of his crumbling home last week.

"The only thing in the streets is killing. Some of us here are starting to wonder if death might be better than this life," the man said in a videotaped interview.

Col. Sutherland said the problems, where they do exist, can be laid at the feet of the insurgents.

"I don't want to paint a rosy picture," he said in his e-mail response. "There is violence in Baqouba. Terrorists target not only government workers, but also the Iraqi army soldiers, Iraqi police, and the citizens of Iraq."

North Of Capital, A Tale Of Two Iraqs (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Hasan Shammari

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 -- U.S. Army officers described Monday how they disbanded what they called a terrorist network whose members killed tribesmen and otherwise sowed fear across large pockets of Diyala province north of Baghdad.

"There are shopkeepers who had closed their doors out of fear, that are now beginning to open their doors," said Maj. Brett G. Sylvia, speaking from Diyala through a satellite video link to reporters in Baghdad. "Families are starting to move back into the area. A sense of normalcy is attempting to be reestablished in this area."

Minutes before the news conference began, armed men kidnapped the mayor of the provincial capital, Baqubah, blew up his office and stole six government cars, including three new Chevrolet police pickup trucks, officials in the province said.

The near-simultaneous scenarios played out like a tale of two Iraqs, one inching toward stability, the other engulfed in chaos.

After seizing Mayor Khalid al-Sanjari, one of the armed men grabbed a loudspeaker from a police car and taunted the chief of police, the officials said.

" 'We are Ansar al-Sunna battalions,' the man blurted out," according to Abu Sajjad, a member of the Baqubah municipal council. " 'If you dare, come and take us.' " Ansar al-Sunna is a Sunni insurgent group active in the city.

The 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the U.S. Army's 1st Cavalry Division, made up of roughly 4,000 soldiers, is responsible for Diyala and some surrounding areas -- roughly the size of Vermont and New Hampshire -- in tandem with the Iraqi army's 5th Division.

In the video conference, the brigade commander, Col. David W. Sutherland, spoke proudly of his soldiers and commended his Iraqi counterparts for their role in the operation.

"There is no doubt that the cycle of violence is on the downturn," he said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces in Diyala first fought the insurgent network -- known as the Council, which officials said was an offshoot of the Sunni group al-Qaeda in Iraq -- in November. Then they spent several weeks analyzing the group's techniques and weaknesses, the colonel said.

On Jan. 4, U.S. and Iraqi forces began a concerted attack, which lasted nearly 10 days and resulted in the killing of nearly 100 members of the Council and the detention of 50, Sutherland said. The commanders also said they seized large caches of weapons, including nearly 1,200 Katyusha rockets and 1,300 rocket-propelled grenades. The enemy, military officials said, used spider holes and irrigation canals to store weapons and ammunition.

Sutherland was flanked by two Iraqi commanders, who were wearing slightly darker uniforms. They weren't there to paint "a rosy picture," Sutherland told reporters. But they wanted to highlight what he and Iraqi officials described as progress in the province.

"The situation in Baqubah is controlled," said Maj. Gen. Ghassan Adnan Awad al-Bawi, the provincial police chief, adding that rumors to the contrary should be ignored. "The purpose of these rumors is to hit the will of our citizens."

In Baqubah, meanwhile, the armed men arrived at the municipal building waving guns, said Abu Sajjad, the council member, who declined to give his full name for security reasons. The attackers targeted only the mayor, who runs the city of roughly 280,000 people.

"They did not take any one of his guards," Abu Sajjad said. "They didn't kill or wound anyone."

He wondered whether the mayor had been set up. Some high-ranking city officials who should have been at work had left unexpectedly, he said, adding that the parking lot behind the building was unusually deserted. The mayor's one-story building was destroyed.

"We don't know yet why he was targeted," said Hussein al-Zubaydi, a member of the provincial council and head of its security committee. "We don't know whether it was personal."

As the news conference ended, reporters who had assembled in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone were handed press kits with photographs, maps and biographical information about the American commanders. They also were given a DVD with raw footage of parts of the operation, called Turki Bowl because it happened close to the village of Turki.

About 30 minutes after the kidnapping, U.S. military and Iraqi security forces arrived at the scene, cordoned it off and inspected the damage as military helicopters hovered overhead, officials said.

Suicide Bomber Kills 10 In Afghanistan (AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan on Tuesday, killing 10 people and wounding 14 others, an Afghan official said.

The bomber approached a group of Afghan men who were waiting outside the base in the city of Khost, in Khost province, before triggering an explosive strapped to his chest, said Jamal Arsalah, the province's governor.

Maj. Matt Hackathorn, a U.S. military spokesman, confirmed the blast, but said that there were no U.S. military casualties known so far.

Jamal said the men were daily workers, lining up to get into the base at the time of the blast.

Suicide attacks have increased as Taliban militants intensify their insurgency against Afghan government forces and foreign troops. According to U.S. military figures, there were 139 suicide attacks during 2006, up from 27 in 2005.

In 2006, Taliban carried out a record number of attacks — suicide and otherwise — and some 4,000 people died in the insurgency-related violence, according to a tally by The Associated Press based on reports from Afghan, NATO and coalition officials.

Khost, where Tuesday's attack was carried out, is a former al-Qaida stronghold on the mountainous Pakistani border that has been a focus of militant activity.

Afghan and Western officials say insurgents use the tribal areas of neighboring Pakistan as sanctuaries from where they organize and launch operations in Afghanistan.

Pakistan argues that only remnants of the Taliban and al-Qaida remain on its side of the border and complain that it gets too little recognition for deploying thousands of troops to the region.

On Monday, a suicide car bomber killed four Pakistani soldiers in North Waziristan, across the frontier from Khost.

Senior U.S. officials have warned that fighting in Afghanistan is likely to surge again this spring, as warmer weather clears snow from mountain passes and militants try to weaken the grip of President Hamid Karzai's U.S.-backed government.

Suicide Blast Kills 10 Afghans Outside NATO Base (AFP)

A suicide attacker blew himself up among a crowd of Afghan labourers queuing to enter a NATO base in eastern Afghanistan, killing 10 and wounding 14, an official said.

The attacker, who appeared to have been on foot, detonated his load of explosives outside a gate of an International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) base near the eastern city of Khost.

"Ten civilians were killed and 14 injured," Qasim Jan, an aide to the provincial governor, told AFP on Tuesday.

The crowd was waiting to pass security checks to enter the base, where most of them worked, Jan said. The attack took place at about 7:10 am (0240 GMT).

ISAF confirmed there had been an explosion at the Salerno base.

"There was an explosion in the vicinity of Salerno early this morning in Khost province. There were no ISAF casualties. However we are aware of a number of other casualties," said an ISAF spokeswoman in the capital Kabul.

Police could also not confirm the toll.

"The suicide bombing was in front of a base of the coalition forces," police spokesman Zemarai Bashary told AFP in Kabul.

On casualties, he said: "We cannot say -- the area was blocked by the coalition forces and no one was allowed in."

Provincial police were also not able to immediately give details.

Foreign troops cordoned off the area about a kilometre (mile) from the blast site and did not allow anyone to enter, an AFP reporter at the scene said.

No one immediately claimed responsibility for the blast but suicide attacks are a hallmark of the Taliban-led insurgency that kicked off when the hardline Islamic movement was driven from power in 2001.

There were nearly 140 such attacks in the country last year, according to US officials. They were mostly aimed at foreign and Afghan forces, but killed more civilians.

Suicide Bomber Kills 4 And Wounds 23 In Pakistan (NYT)

By Ismail Khan

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 22 — A suicide bomber rammed his explosive-laden car into a military convoy near Mirali in the restive North Waziristan tribal region on Monday, killing 4 people and wounding 23, witnesses said.

The dead included two paramilitary officers, a member of the military and a woman civilian, the witnesses said, and 20 of those wounded were soldiers.

The attack occurred at a checkpoint about a mile east of the town of Mirali when a joint convoy of the army and paramilitary was heading from a garrison in Bannu to Miramshah, the restive region's administrative headquarters.

Witnesses said that three army vehicles and a passenger car were damaged in the attack, the first to cause fatalities since the government and Taliban-backed tribal insurgents signed a peace agreement on Sept. 5, 2006.

Army and paramilitary troops had vacated the checkpoint as a condition of the peace agreement, and it is now managed by a tribal force.

Militants in Miramshah who had signed the peace agreement promptly denounced the episode and said that they were not involved in the attack.

A statement that said it was issued from the "security office of the Taliban North Waziristan" said: "We (Taliban) do not have a hand in the bomb attack. We want to maintain the peace agreement and the government should also do so."

Taliban leaders in the region had called a meeting in Miramshah to discuss the situation, the statement said.

A militant commander in the neighboring South Waziristan tribal region, Baitullah Mehsud, had vowed to avenge an airstrike last week on what the government said was a militant training center in which, government officials said, more than 20 people were killed and 8 wounded.

A government official familiar with events in the region said Monday that the signers of the peace agreement had little influence over militants beyond Miramshah.

“This brings into question the efficacy of the whole agreement,” he said, adding that the bombings could be expected to increase tensions in the region after a lull in hostilities since the agreement.

“There had been warnings to security forces to avoid traveling in the tribal region after Baitullah’s warning unless absolutely necessary,” the official said.

A spokesman for the North Waziristan governor told reporters that the government was making efforts to maintain the peace agreement and attributed the attack to criminal elements trying to derail the peace efforts.

Pakistan officials said that a paramilitary soldier was killed and two others were wounded on Monday when an American helicopter from across the border fired rockets at a border post in the Shawal region on Monday.

A military spokesman in Islamabad said that Pakistan would lodge a strong protest with the United States and demand an investigation. A NATO spokeswoman said that aircraft had attacked insurgents who fired on a NATO base near the border and there may have been casualties, [a news agency] reported.

Taliban Chief Said Likely In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

Taliban leader Mullah Omar is likely based in southern Afghanistan and leading the resurgent Islamic militia from there, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said Monday. A spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry said that Omar's exact whereabouts remain unknown.

"But generally the likely scenario is that he is in Kandahar, from where he is marshaling his troops," spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said at a news conference, referring to a city in southern Afghanistan.

Aslam's comments follow claims by Afghan officials that a captured spokesman for the Taliban militia told interrogators that Omar was living in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta and that he was protected by Pakistan's ISI intelligence service. The purported Taliban spokesman, Mohammad Hanif, was arrested last week in eastern Afghanistan.

Afghan and Western military officials have repeatedly complained that Taliban leaders find refuge in Pakistan and use it as a base for attacks against Afghanistan's U.S.-backed government.

Taliban fighters launched a record number of attacks against Afghan and international coalition forces last year. Some 4,000 people died in the insurgency-related violence, according to a count by The Associated Press.

Pakistan vehemently denies backing the militants.

"To say that the Afghan insurgency is being sustained by a few people who cross from here is very simplistic and naive, if not done with some other agenda of shifting the blame on Pakistan for failures inside Afghanistan," Aslam said.

Pakistan was a key supporter of the Taliban militia until it switched sides to become a U.S. anti-terrorism ally following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Fire From Afghanistan Kills Pakistani (AP)

By Sadaqat Jan

AP, January 23, 2007

U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan mistakenly fired at a Pakistani border post and killed a soldier, Pakistan's military said Monday after lodging a protest over the death.

A U.S. military spokesman said four precision-guided bombs were dropped on four suspected militants who were firing rockets at a U.S. military outpost at Bermel in Afghanistan's Paktika province, near the Pakistani border.

"I cannot confirm or deny loss or injury of Pakistani military," said Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, the spokesman. "This all happened inside Afghanistan."

He also said the coalition was investigating.

But the Pakistani military said in a statement the post that was hit is located near Shawal, a mountainous area close to the Afghan border in Pakistan's North Waziristan tribal region.

Pakistan, a key U.S. ally, has a long border with Afghanistan that straddles rugged mountain regions and is not clearly demarcated in places. It is under growing pressure to help contain Taliban and al-Qaida militants suspected to operate from its soil.

Pakistan strongly protested to the coalition authorities, asking them to investigate and take "necessary steps to ensure that such incidents are not repeated in future," its statement said.

Fire by U.S.-led coalition forces has landed in Pakistan in the past. In January 2006, Pakistan protested to the U.S. military in Afghanistan over firing at a village in North Waziristan in which eight people were killed.

From Pakistan, With Jihad (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

To learn why a resurgent Taliban is fighting American and NATO troops to a military draw in Afghanistan, you have to go to the frontier region on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.

Our colleague, Carlotta Gall, did just that last month and what she learned led to a physical assault on her by Pakistani intelligence officials and five hours in custody for her photographer, Akhtar Soomro. The Pakistani agents broke into her hotel room and copied her notes and computer files. They then tracked down and questioned everyone she had interviewed in Quetta, a border city.

We now know why. Ms. Gall's reporting has determined that Quetta is an important rear base for the Taliban, and that Pakistani authorities are encouraging and perhaps sponsoring the cross-border insurgency. That is a role that Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, denies. But residents of the border area, opposition figures and Western diplomats point to specific cases of Pakistani involvement. Americans need to know more about this collusion and to demand better answers from General Musharraf.

There are many reasons that things are now going badly for the American-backed Afghan government. America shortchanged Afghanistan's security in its rush to invade Iraq. European allies have inexcusably failed to provide NATO with enough soldiers to carry out the expanded Afghan security mission it took on last year and have imposed hobbling restrictions on the activities of those they did send. The government of the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, is rife with corruption, and the regional warlord allies it depends on to control outlying areas are even more thieving as well as shockingly brutal.

These problems all need to be addressed. But the positive results will be limited as long as Afghanistan's much more populous and powerful neighbor, Pakistan, provides rear support and sanctuary for the Taliban insurgency.

It is simply impossible to believe that this support takes place without the approval of the Pakistani military, the country's dominant institution for a half-century.

Pakistan is now the third-largest recipient of American foreign aid. Yet more than five years after 9/11, the Bush administration has still not been able to secure Pakistan's active and consistent support against the Taliban. The very least Washington should be demanding of President Musharraf is that he enforce an immediate halt on Pakistani military support for the Taliban insurgents who are crossing the border and killing American troops.

Signals Foil IEDs But Also Radios (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has launched an urgent effort to develop radio systems immune to the jamming signals that troops use to foil homemade bombs planted by insurgents in Iraq.

The jammers, which block signals that detonate improvised explosive devices (IEDs), have become so powerful they can "cause the loss of all communications" for U.S. troops, a Pentagon solicitation to contractors says. It calls for information on devices that will allow troops to use jammers and radios at the same time. The Pentagon said the information is needed "to support urgent, ongoing initiatives" for jammers.

Jammers have been a lifesaver by disabling IEDs, the leading cause of death of U.S. troops in Iraq.

Bombs have killed at least 1,168 U.S. troops, according to an analysis of Pentagon data by iCasualties.org. The total is probably higher, the website says, because the Pentagon does not include details of each death. The site noted that the highest monthly death toll for IEDs occurred in December, when bombs killed 71 U.S. troops. All told, more than 3,000 U.S. servicemembers have died in Iraq.

Communication has been a historic advantage for the U.S. military, allowing it to send troops where they're needed most and to avoid "friendly fire" casualties. The jammers that protect troops from roadside bombs can keep them from knowing the location of enemies and allies. In close-quarters urban warfare, ensuring communication can be a life-or-death matter.

"It is a nightmare," said John Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a military think tank. "Any part of the spectrum we can use to communicate is part of spectrum that the enemy can use to detonate an IED."

IEDs have killed 20 U.S. troops in Iraq this month, according to iCasualities. Adding 21,500 U.S. troops — as President Bush has announced — would be complicated by poor communication.

"Twice as many combat troops means twice as big a problem," Pike said.

The Pentagon posted the urgent notice on Jan 4. Jammers are a large portion of Pentagon efforts to fight IEDs. In 2006, the Pentagon spent $3.5 billion to counter IEDs, $1.4 billion of that on jammers.

The military has dealt with the communication problem for years. Troops initially kept power to jammers low enough to avoid interfering with communication, Marine Lt. Gen. James Mattis told Congress in 2005. But detonators for the bombs have grown more sophisticated, requiring more powerful jammers.

Christine DeVries, a spokeswoman for the Pentagon's Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization — the military's lead agency in fighting IEDs — said she could not provide details on the urgency of the request.

The Army has ramped up efforts to deal with electronic communication and warfare. Since Jan. 1, each Army battalion headed to combat has been required to have an electronic warfare operator, said Col. Laurie Moe Buckhout, chief of Army electronic warfare. Rendering IEDs harmless by an electronic signal will be one of the operator's responsibilities, Buckhout said.

The Army has put electronic warfare on par with learning to fire a weapon or administer first aid.

Army electronic warfare operators disrupt enemy communication, ensure U.S and coalition troops can talk to one another and prevent the enemy from knowing what friendly forces are doing, Buckhout said. A large portion of their responsibilities will be dealing with IEDs.

DOJ:

Ensign, Others Won't Say Why Top Federal Prosecutors Getting The Ax (LVS)

By Sam Skolnik And Lisa Mascaro, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, January 23, 2007

The Justice Department briefed Nevada Republican Sen. John Ensign last month on plans to replace Nevada's top federal prosecutor, but Ensign has decided that whatever the reasons, the public need not know them.

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas is one of at least seven top federal prosecutors being removed by the Bush administration, five from other Western states. All were appointed by Bush.

As is true with Bogden, the reasons for the departures remain mysterious.

Absent explanations, Democratic lawmakers and lawyers across the West are speculating. They wonder if the prosecutors pursued cases that displeased Washington, or if the Justice Department wants to choose replacements under a new Patriot Act provision that allows the appointments without the customary review by the U.S. Senate.

"If you ask me if my suspicions are aroused, they are," said Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif. Her state lost two U.S. attorneys.

During his five-year reign as the highest-ranking federal prosecutor in Nevada, Bogden has scored some notable successes. His office boosted firearms prosecutions, secured the convictions of dozens of violent gang members and oversaw the cases against four former Clark County commissioners convicted of taking bribes.

Even defense lawyers, Bogden's frequent courtroom opponents, speak highly of his straightforward style and fair play.

So why did Bogden suddenly announce his resignation Wednesday, after days of speculation that he was forced out of office by the Justice Department?

Officials in Nevada and Washington, D.C., are only providing hints as to why he and the other prosecutors are leaving.

Bogden has declined comment, other than to make a brief statement in a Wednesday news release.

The sudden bloodletting involved U.S. attorneys up and down the West Coast, as well as New Mexico, and one in Arkansas. The new interim U.S. attorney in Arkansas had been a political operative who worked for powerful White House aide Karl Rove.

No potential replacements have yet been named for Bogden, although a Justice Department source confirmed that officials have talked to both Ensign and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid in recent days regarding a replacement.

Feinstein said she's concerned Bush and his attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, are eager to use a newly added provision of the Patriot Act that would allow Bush to appoint new, interim U.S. attorneys, and to keep them in office until a new president takes charge, without having to get them confirmed by the Senate. This is just one of many speculations.

One theory suggests that Bogden got in political trouble by using the Patriot Act in his prosecution of former Clark County commissioners. The theory goes that the White House wanted to distance itself from what could be perceived as an example of an abuse of the controversial law. Reid and others had argued in 2003 that the prosecutor overreached by using the anti-terrorism law to fight domestic crime.

Reid's office could provide little information as to why Bogden was apparently forced out.

Ensign, a Republican who has known about Bogden's departure since Justice Department officials told him about it during a briefing last month, would not offer any explanation.

Other theories being posed in legal circles include Bush and Gonzales wanting to install a team of new prosecutors more receptive to carrying out the administration's law enforcement priorities; or more eager to investigate Democrats - and less eager to investigate Republicans - in public corruption cases.

The White House may also want to use the U.S. attorneys offices to develop a bench of potential Republican candidates for Congress.

Gonzales insisted at Thursday's hearing that the Justice Department plans to continue bringing all nominees before the Senate for confirmation. And as for the resignations, Gonzales testified: "I think I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it."

Feinstein, backed by Reid, is skeptical. She called any attempt by the administration to skirt the Senate confirmation process unacceptable and introduced legislation to reverse the law.

After Thursday's hearing, Feinstein said she still does not know why two U.S. attorneys in her state were stepping down. One had prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., for bribery in a case that had been expected to include defense contractors and possibly other Republican lawmakers.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse declined to comment on any of the theories swirling about Bogden or the other U.S. attorneys.

"It is erroneous to believe that anyone would be encouraged to resign in an effort to retaliate against them or interfere with or inappropriately influence a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case," he said. CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple's Jobs Questioned In Options Probe, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, January 23, 2007

Jan. 22 (Bloomberg) -- Apple Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs was questioned by U.S. government investigators about backdating of employee stock options grants at the company, lawyers familiar with the matter said.

Jobs met with officials from the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department last week in San Francisco, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the interviews are confidential. The company said last month that it found ``no misconduct'' by Jobs or current management after an internal investigation of the stock-option backdating.

The meeting, which took place the same week Apple announced record sales of its best-selling iPod music player, shows the U.S. government is still seeking information about Jobs's role in the backdating even after the company's report clearing him and others, said Nell Minow, editor at the Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm in Portland, Maine.

``It is after all the SEC's view on his culpability that matters, not the internal investigation at Apple,'' Minow said.

The people wouldn't disclose specifics about what Jobs was asked, what he told investigators and whether there would be additional meetings.

Mark Pomerantz, an attorney for Jobs, declined to comment. Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, whose office is investigating Cupertino, California-based Apple, declined to comment. SEC spokesman John Nester in Washington declined to comment.

Apple shares fell $1.71 to $86.79 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

6,500 Grants

Almost 6,500 grants to Apple employees were backdated between 1997 and 2002, including one grant to Jobs marked as approved at a special board meeting that never occurred, Apple said Dec. 29. Jobs chose dates for some options other than his own, the company said.

Apple hasn't publicly disclosed which options Jobs backdated, which other executives received backdated options or why it faked a board meeting. The company said no member of current management was aware of the ``irregularity'' concerning the fictitious meeting.

Apple continues to ``voluntarily and proactively'' inform government investigators of its findings and continues to answer their questions, Chief Financial Officer Peter Oppenheimer told analysts on a conference call on Jan. 17.

The interview with Jobs was first reported Jan. 19 by The Recorder, a legal newspaper in San Francisco.

Jobs's Options

At least 200 companies are being investigated for changing the dates of options grants to inflate their value. Companies have taken over $8.1 billion in charges or restatements to account for backdated options grants.

Stock options allow holders to buy shares at a later date, usually at the market price the day they were granted. Backdating options to days with low prices inflates their value. If not properly disclosed, the practice may break laws because it hides costs from shareholders and regulators.

In 2001, Jobs, 51, received options on 7.5 million shares. The terms of the grant were completed Dec. 18 of that year, when Apple's shares were trading at $21.01, Apple said. Oct. 19 was chosen as the grant's date, giving Jobs a lower exercise price of $18.30.

The company told shareholders in a March 2002 regulatory filing that the grant was approved at a special board meeting in October 2001. Apple disclosed last month that the meeting never took place.

Apple said it recorded $84 million in charges to correct its accounting for the backdated options, including $20 million for Jobs' 7.5 million share award. Jobs voluntarily canceled that grant and other outstanding options in March 2003. He chose to do so to make more stock available for employees, Apple said in an SEC filing at the time.

Instead, the board gave Jobs 5 million shares of restricted stock, which vested in March 2006. At the time, the shares were worth $646.6 million.

The Options Paper Trail (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

With federal prosecutors investigating the granting of stock options by Apple, the actions of its iconic chief executive, Steve Jobs, are being more closely examined.

A review of how Jobs handled his stock options from 2001 shows that he waited about two-thirds of a year to report the receipt of 7.5 million options that the company admitted last month were improperly backdated. The board meeting at which they were reportedly approved never took place.

The timing of Jobs's filing was not illegal and beat the deadline. But it broke with the practice common among other Apple officers and directors of submitting the report, in this case a Form 4, within weeks, not months.

"That's clearly an anomaly worth pursuing," said Michael Levy, a former federal prosecutor who heads the white-collar group at the McKee Nelson law firm in the District. "The fact that it was this grant in particular that was subject to such a delayed filing of Form 4 seems very interesting."

Jobs filed his statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission in August 2002, reporting that he had received the stock options on Oct. 19, 2001. Apple now says the options were actually finalized in December 2001, when the value of the options was significantly less because of changes in the stock price. Jobs filed his personal disclosure about eight months later.

In contrast, three other directors who filed within days of Jobs had waited only four weeks to disclose their options. In fact, the filings of 53 other Form 4s by Apple officers and directors between the start of 1999 and late August 2002 -- when new disclosure requirements came into force -- took just under four weeks, on average. When Jobs received a previous grant of 10 million stock options in January 2000, he filed his Form 4 in just under three weeks.

Steve Dowling, Apple's director of corporate communications, declined to comment yesterday on Jobs's filing and repeated that the company's "exhaustive investigation" had found no evidence that the chief executive, board directors or other current members of management had been involved in backdating irregularities. He said Apple had voluntarily provided all details of its investigation to the U.S. attorney's office for Northern California and to the SEC.

The U.S. attorney's office confirmed this month that it was investigating options "irregularities" at Apple. Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the office, declined to give more detail but added, "We've said repeatedly and publicly that something comes into the U.S. attorney's realm and the criminal realm when there's an intent to defraud."

The SEC is also reviewing the backdating of options at Apple. The Recorder, a legal newspaper in San Francisco, reported Friday that Jobs was interviewed last week by federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers.

Sources familiar with the investigation said Wendy Howell, who worked as a lawyer in the office of Apple's general counsel, played a part in creating the paperwork for Jobs's options. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing criminal investigation.

Her attorney, Thomas Carlucci, said in statement: "While an Apple employee, Ms. Howell acted as instructed by Apple management and with the company's best interest being paramount."

Howell's boss at the time, former general counsel Nancy Heinen, has sought to distance herself from the scandal. "Each of the grants involving Ms. Heinen was authorized and approved by her superiors," her lawyer, Cristina Arguedas, said in a statement.

Apple has said Jobs never benefited from his options because he gave them up before they were exercised. But when he relinquished them, he received restricted stock estimated to be of about the same value. Last year, he used nearly half this stock, worth about $296 million, to meet tax obligations.

In Jobs's Form 4 filing in 2002, he cited the false October date four times. Adding to the confusion, he reported on the cover page that the statement covers November 2001.

Under SEC rules at the time, officers and directors of companies were instructed to report the acquisition of stock options not on Form 4 but on Form 5, which is an annual statement of transactions involving stocks and options. Nine Apple insiders filed this from 1999 to 2002.

Jobs chose the alternative, filing a Form 4. SEC rules said that an insider could disclose the receipt of stock options on a Form 4 as long as it was submitted before the deadline for the annual Form 5. Ten Apple insiders took this route from 1999 through 2002, though none of the others waited nearly as long as Jobs did in disclosing his 2001 options. Jobs filed before the legal deadline.

Congress adopted stricter disclosure standards in 2002 as the result of corporate and accounting scandals involving Enron, WorldCom and other firms. Under the rules, company officers and directors were required to disclose their transactions, including the acquisition of options, within two business days.

Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Direction Of Apple Probe Clouded By Shakeups In U.S. Attorney's Office (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 23, 2007

Two things set the investigation of Apple Inc. apart from the hundreds of other stock option backdating probes: the indispensability of the company's CEO, and the fact that while both in-house lawyers and HR staff were involved with options grants, it's the lawyers who are getting the most scrutiny.

With Apple's fortunes tightly linked to its leader, Silicon Valley titan Steve Jobs, anything seen as jeopardizing his role at the company strikes intense fear into stockholders. That helps explain why Jobs took the risky step last week of talking to federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers to convince them of his innocence.

But with turmoil in the U.S. Attorney's Office, and no joint defense agreement among potential targets of the investigation, the probe looks more uncertain now than at any time since it launched last fall.

Lead prosecutor Christopher Steskal announced Friday that he's leaving government for Fenwick & West. Earlier that week, his boss, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan was sacked, and has hired legal placement company MLegal to find him his next job.

Ryan's No. 2, Eumi Choi -- the other prosecutor on the Apple case -- has had her resume floating around Silicon Valley for weeks.

That means that every aspect of the probe -- including whether it even turns into a criminal case -- will remain uncertain until at least two key prosecutors are replaced.

PROTECT THE HEAD

Apple is in the unenviable situation of having had to publicly admit improperly dating thousands of grants, including a massive one to Jobs in 2002. Indeed, the company said that Jobs himself helped pick some of the dates.

But all along, the company and its CEO have insisted that he had no knowledge that when such grants aren't recorded as an expense, the practice is illegal.

In simple terms, Jobs has mounted a typical defense against accusations of fraud: He says that he didn't intend to commit a crime.

And to convince prosecutors of that, Jobs, according to people familiar with the probe, took the risky step of sitting down with them.

Agreeing to such a grilling -- which few potential targets of a criminal probe would submit to -- is one way for defendants to convince prosecutors that have nothing to hide.

"You're giving them free discovery, and you don't want to give them free discovery unless it's to your advantage," said Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law and a former federal prosecutor.

"It's a great show of openness," he said, adding that it can backfire if a person doesn't come across as completely forthright.

People familiar with the Apple probe, speaking on condition of anonymity because of their involvement, said that such a meeting was almost a requirement for Jobs after the company's insistence that he has no criminal exposure. By refusing to do the interview, they said, he could have undermined the assertion that he wasn't concealing anything.

LAWYERS ON THE GRILL

While there is great uncertainty in the staffing of the Apple probe -- and in the fate of Jobs -- the strides made so far by prosecutors have laid a solid foundation for whomever ends up taking over.

Apple's public statements and the actions of prosecutors so far indicate that Apple's legal department is the most highly scrutinized part of the company -- and that human resources officials, who have landed themselves in trouble in several other companies' backdating probes, seem likely to get a pass at Apple.

After completing an internal investigation of options issues, Apple last year blamed two former company officials. Though Apple didn't identify them, sources close to the case say they are former General Counsel Nancy Heinen and former CFO Fred Anderson.

"Usually, in most companies, HR people are involved in the award process," said Jordan Eth, a partner at Morrison & Foerster who is conducting internal options investigations for several companies.

Apple is no exception: According to people with close knowledge of the company's options infrastructure throughout the late 1990s and early part of this decade, one lawyer in the general counsel's office and various human resources personnel were responsible for processing grants.

But the company's internal investigation turned away from HR -- a department that was under the purview of CFO Anderson -- and resulted in the firing of a low-level in-house lawyer, Wendy Howell.

It was her job to fill out options paperwork, and, according to people familiar with the probe, she is the one who faked meeting minutes for the 2002 Jobs grant.

It's not clear yet whether Howell will end up cooperating with the probe. People familiar with the case say no joint defense agreement has been signed, leaving open the possibility Howell, her supervisor, Heinen, and other officials could blame one another for the improprieties.

But one former official seemed sanguine when reached last week.

Dan Walker, Apple's former HR chief, wouldn't say whether he's been contacted by government investigators. But he did indicate that he's not expecting any legal problems.

"I don't have a lawyer," said Walker, who now runs a consulting firm in San Clemente. "I don't need a lawyer."

Foundry Networks CEO Keeps Job Despite Role In Backdating Options (MERCN)

By Mark Schwanhausser

The San Jose Mercury News, January 23, 2007

Foundry Networks said Monday that Chairman and Chief Executive Bobby Johnson Jr. will surrender his role as chairman -- but will stay on the board and continue to run the company -- even though he personally picked the dates for a ``substantial" number of tainted stock options.

The Santa Clara company said Johnson was not advised that such practices could violate accounting rules and cause the company to overstate its profits. Foundry said Monday it faces a pretax accounting charge that could mount to as much as $205 million because of misdated options it gave directors, officers and rank-and-file employees from 2000 to 2003.

Johnson received no misdated options, the company said.

Foundry, which makes computer networking hardware, also stripped Timothy D. Heffner of his title as chief financial officer. But it shifted him into a new executive job that has no accounting or financial responsibilities.

Foundry's case is noteworthy because of the similarities to the high-profile case involving Apple CEO Steve Jobs. Though Apple acknowledges that Jobs recommended favorable grant dates, the company said he did not understand the accounting implications. Unlike Johnson, Jobs received tainted options. But Apple said he did not benefit from the options, which he later exchanged for restricted stock.

Foundry's decision to keep two central players despite acknowledging their roles in the options abuses is both rare and risky, said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues. Most companies have fired or forced out implicated executives and directors, he said.

``The board is taking a risk here," Fernandez said. ``The board is saying, `These guys were immersed in something highly questionable and fumbled accounting 101, yet let's give them another shot because they just didn't know what they were doing.' "

Among the key findings of the investigation by the company, which also faces investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department:

• The company doled out backdated options to people at all levels of the company, including the board, top executives, new recruits and other employees. The company will take a pretax accounting charge of $185 million to $205 million in fiscal years 1999 through 2005. After accounting for tax deductions the company could have claimed, the after-tax charge will total $120 million to $135 million.

• Johnson ``selected" the grant dates and backdated option awards for a ``substantial number of cases" at the company. The company said Johnson did not receive any misdated options and ``found no evidence" that he had been advised about the accounting fallout of issuing misdated options.

• Heffner, who resigned as CFO but will serve as vice president of corporate development, did not pick the dates for option grants but relayed the decisions to stock option administrators and human resources. Heffner received tainted grants and has agreed to repay tainted gains on options he has exercised and reprice options he still holds. The estimated cost: $162,000.

• The company will reprice one grant of discounted options awarded to directors. Non-management directors who exercised any of those options have agreed to repay a total of about $86,000.

13 Charged In Foodservice Alleged Fraud (AP)

SEC Accuses 13 More People of Aiding Alleged U.S. Foodservice Fraud

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal regulators have accused an additional 13 people of aiding an alleged massive accounting fraud at U.S. Foodservice Inc., a subsidiary of Dutch grocery retailer Ahold NV, in a scandal that brought the resignation of top executives and criminal probes in the United States and the Netherlands.

The Ahold affair was one of Europe's biggest accounting scandals, and the Dutch company skirted bankruptcy in 2003. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission in 2004 accused Ahold of fraudulently overstating sales by billions of dollars and fabricating hundreds of millions of dollars of earnings.

The civil charges filed last Thursday by the SEC bring to 30 the number of people the agency has accused of aiding the alleged fraud by signing false audit statements that enabled a $1 billion overstatement of Ahold's earnings in 2001-02. The SEC announced the new charges on Monday.

All 13 of those charged most recently in federal court in Washington were employees of or agents for vendor companies that supplied Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice, which sells food in bulk to restaurants and cafeterias.

Nine of the 13 have each agreed to pay a $25,000 civil fine to settle the SEC's allegations, which they neither admitted nor denied, the agency said. They are: Carl Allen, Donald Childers, John Crowder, Chris Jakubek, John King, Steve LeBarron, Patrick Penderghast, Frank Riggio and Richard Vecchia.

The cases remain pending against the other four, whose titles at the time were: Gary Bell, vice president for business development at Hunt-Wesson Foodservice; Joseph Grendys, the owner of Koch Poultry; Anthony Holohan, sales representative for C.F. Sauer Foods Inc., and Michael Smith, corporate accounts manager for Citrus World.

Attorneys for Bell and Holohan disputed the SEC's allegations. Lawyers for Grendys and Smith couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Ahold, which also operates the Giant and Stop & Shop supermarket chains in the United States, was not fined in an October 2004 settlement of related charges with the SEC; it did agree to a permanent injunction against violations of U.S. securities laws.

"The annual audit-confirmation process at U.S. Foodservice was systematically corrupted to help keep the fraud from being discovered," the SEC said in the civil lawsuits filed last week. The agency alleged that the 13 people signed and returned to U.S. Foodservice's outside auditors letters that they knew overstated the amounts of promotional fees paid or owed by the vendors to the company -- often by millions of dollars.

The scheme enabled U.S. Foodservice to inflate its income from promotional payments by at least $700 million for fiscal years 2001 and 2002, according to the SEC.

The former chief executive and chief financial officer of U.S. Foodservice were convicted of fraud and fined in 2005.

Ahold's former chief executive, Cees van der Hoeven, resigned in 2003 -- the year its stock lost 60 percent of its value after the accounting lapses came to light. The company's accounting was investigated by the U.S. Justice Department and Dutch authorities.

Last September, the company signed an agreement with the Justice Department under which it will not be prosecuted in connection with the alleged U.S. Foodservice fraud so long as it avoids further alleged violations.

Take-Two Let Ex-CEO Get Away With Backdating (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of Grand Theft Auto and other popular video games, failed to monitor stock-option grants, including a significant number that were backdated over a six-year period, according to an internal report released Monday by the company.

The report found that Take-Two's compensation committee abandoned its responsibilities and allowed former CEO Ryan Brant "to control and dominate the granting process" and engage in "a pattern and practice of backdating options" from 1997 to 2003.

Brant resigned as CEO five years ago and as chairman last October.

The investigation, by the BDO Seidman accounting firm and the law firm Kasowitz Benson Torres & Friedman, found no evidence that Take-Two's current executives engaged in misconduct, or that the company's former or current directors "engaged in willful misconduct or other dishonest acts."

However, the report found that three former Take-Two executives — a former controller and two former chief financial officers that the report did not name — "appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process" and declined to appear for interviews with investigators.

Also Monday, Take-Two said that the Nasdaq Stock Market warned the firm that its failure to file its Form 10-K with the Securities and Exchange Commission for the company's fiscal year ended Oct. 31 was another reason to delist the firm from Nasdaq.

Nasdaq already had warned Take-Two last year that it faced possible delisting for failing to hold its 2006 shareholders meeting and for not filing its quarterly earnings report with the SEC for the company's third quarter.

Take-Two said Monday it will file its required SEC forms "as soon as practicable," and will combine its 2005 and 2006 shareholders meetings. Take-Two said in December that it will restate its finances for the fiscal years from 1997 to 2006.

The company disclosed last August that it had received grand jury subpoenas on its stock options from Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau.

Two years ago, the SEC alleged that Brant, former chief operating officer Larry Muller, former chief financial officer James David Jr. and vice president of sales Robert Blau fraudulently inflated the company's revenue by $60 million for 2000 and 2001.

Without admitting or denying the charges, the men and Take-Two agreed to pay penalties totaling $9 million and to disgorge more than $5 million in bonuses and interest.

Take-Two Accuses Ex-CEO Of Options Backdating (WSJ)

By Kevin Kingsbury

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. said former Chairman and Chief Executive Ryan Brant backdated stock options over a six-year period and said the company's failures allowed him "to control and dominate the granting process."

The New York-based videogame maker disclosed in July the Securities and Exchange Commission was investigating its options-granting process, and Take-Two said last month that independent investigators found improprieties in the company's granting processes. Take-Two's review began with the company's April 15, 1997 initial public offering.

The company noted the outside law firm which conducted the options review said three former executives who "appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process, declined to appear for interviews" and limited to some extend the information collected. The trio was Take-Two's former controller, who was fired last month, and the two chief financial officers Larry Muller and James David Jr. The pair served in that post from 1999 through 2001. Take Two's filing with the SEC on Monday didn't disclose the officials' names.

The law firm's report found that Take-Two's option-granting process usually didn't follow the company's rules and didn't have adequate control. In addition, the firm's compensation committee "abdicated its option granting responsibilities and permitted" Mr. Brant to "control and dominate the granting process."

Mr. Brant, who founded the company in 1993, was CEO until February 2001, chairman until March 2004 and resigned his remaining position with the maker of the "Grand Theft Auto" series of video games three months ago.

The probe's report also charged that between April 1997 and August 2003, Mr. Brant "engaged in a pattern and practice of backdating options," with many options during that period appearing to have been backdated. No backdating has been found since then.

Current management, including CEO Paul Eibeler and CFO Karl Winters, were cleared last month, at which time Take-Two said it would have to take charges regarding its past option practices. The amount of the charges has yet to be disclosed.

Take-Two, Messrs. Brant, Muller, David and another executive agreed to pay about $14 million to settle SEC civil charges they schemed to inflate revenue by $60 million in fiscal 2000 and 2001. Messrs. Brant and Muller each paid a $500,000 penalty. Mr. Brant also returned $3.1 million made up of bonus money and stock options he earned after the accounting scheme enabled Take-Two to meet financial targets, while Mr. Muller returned $1.2 million.

Mr. Brant agreed to be banned from serving as an officer or director of a public company for at least five years, while Mr. Muller -- called the scheme's "principal architect" -- accepted a permanent ban.

Mr. David succeeded Mr. Muller in July 2000 when Mr. Muller was promoted to chief operating officer. Mr. David, who was demoted in December 2001 when Take-Two announced it had to restate its 2000 and 2001 results, agreed to a $200,000 civil penalty and the return of almost $800,000.

Restatement By Take-Two Over Problems With Options (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of the Grand Theft Auto video games, said yesterday that it let its former chief executive, Ryan A. Brant, “control and dominate” improper options backdating that began when the company went public in 1997.

The compensation committee abdicated its responsibilities for the grants and failed to maintain proper controls, the company said in a regulatory filing. Take-Two will restate results from 1997 to 2003 to reflect options costs.

The restatement will be the second time Take-Two has revised earnings to fix accounting irregularities. In 2005, the company paid a $7.5 million fine in settling a Securities and Exchange Commission suit over how it booked sales. Take-Two is among at least 200 companies that are being investigated on suspicion of changing the date of options grants to inflate their value.

“They’re very familiar with the S.E.C.,” said Paul-Jon McNealy, an analyst with American Technology Research in Boston who rates the shares neutral. “It’s not finished yet.”

A significant number of grants were backdated from 1997 to August 2003, the company said, but it also said that it had not found any backdating since then.

Shares of Take-Two gained 5 cents, to $17.54, on Nasdaq. They had declined 5.7 percent this year before yesterday. The billionaire Carl C. Icahn owned 2.89 million shares, or 4 percent, as of September.

Three former executives declined to be interviewed for the option investigation, which was led by Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman and was completed last Wednesday, Take-Two said in yesterday’s S.E.C. filing. They included a former controller who was fired in December and two chief financial officers, one of whom served from late January 1999 to early 2000 and the other from early April 2000 through 2001.

Mr. Brant founded the company in 1993 at age 21 and served as chief until 2001. In March 2004, as the company's sales accounting was under investigation, he gave up the title of chairman and became director of software publishing. He was a nonexecutive vice president until his departure in October.

Take-Two faces possible delisting from the Nasdaq after failing to report results on time. It said yesterday that it planned to file earnings for the quarter ended July 31 and the year ended Oct. 31 "as soon as practicable."

Take-Two also said that Nasdaq said the company could continue to be listed as long as it reported before March 19 on the quarter that ended July 31 and also held a combined 2005 and 2006 annual shareholders' meeting before March 27.

Suspects In Siemens Probe Point To Finance Chief (WSJ)

By David Crawford In Berlin And Mike Esterl In Frankfurt

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Two key suspects in a fraud investigation roiling Siemens AG have told German prosecutors that Chief Financial Officer Joe Kaeser has known for years about an alleged scheme to pay bribes to win overseas telecommunications contracts, according to witness statements reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

One suspect also told prosecutors that two other senior executives at the German conglomerate knew since at least early 2005 about the alleged bribes-for-business scheme: current management board member Rudi Lamprecht and Lothar Pauly, who headed the telecom division before leaving the company in late 2005.

TELECOM TURMOIL

• The Situation: Siemens is facing a criminal bribery investigation involving hundreds of millions of dollars in suspicious payments.

• Why Investors Should Care: Evidence of wrongdoing could curb Siemens's ability to participate in major infrastructure projects.

• What's Next: Shareholders will vote on senior management's actions at Thursday's annual shareholder meeting.

The revelations come at a sensitive time for top managers at Siemens, who have been fending off criticism ahead of an annual holders' meeting Thursday that they didn't do enough to stop corruption. Evidence of wrongdoing could cause some countries to ban Siemens from participating in big infrastructure projects that generate much of its revenue.

The investigation also could complicate the conglomerate's efforts to jettison its telecom business, merging much of it into a venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland. The testimony alleges that bribes took place in Siemens's wireless-telecom business, and weren't confined to the fixed-line unit, which was the original focus of the criminal investigation.

German authorities are investigating the allegations, which were made in separate statements provided by long-time Siemens executives Michael Kutschenreuter and Reinhard Siekaczek.

Peik von Bestenbostel, a Siemens spokesman, said: "Mr. Kaeser and Mr. Lamprecht did not know of, and they were not involved in, bribes at any point." He said no current members of Siemens's management board have been approached by authorities.

A spokesman for the prosecutor's office in Munich declined to comment. A lawyer for Mr. Pauly, now a member of the management board at telecommunications titan Deutsche Telekom AG, said any allegation that his client knew of bribes or was involved in bribes is "completely false." He declined to comment on whether Mr. Pauly has been in contact with authorities regarding the fraud probe.

The scandal at Munich-based Siemens widened last month when the company said it had found €420 million ($544.4 million) in suspicious transactions spanning the past seven years -- double the amount German prosecutors flagged in November.

Police arrested half a dozen suspects -- including Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek -- late last year. They were released last month after they agreed to cooperate in a widening, cross-border probe.

Mr. Kutschenreuter's lawyer, Leonard Walischewski, said his client's statements are backed by documents supporting his allegations. "If prosecutors had any doubt about Mr. Kutschenreuter's statements, he would be in jail," Mr. Walischewski said.

Wolfgang Kreuzer, a lawyer for Mr. Siekaczek, said his client is cooperating with prosecutors. "Police have investigated and verified Mr. Siekaczek's statements," Mr. Kreuzer said.

The witness statements were made by two men who were considered loyal Siemens officials for decades. The statements are significant because they were presented as evidence in an arraignment hearing, where prosecutors would have been required to point out any contradictions or inaccuracies in the statements.

The two witnesses said that the alleged involvement of the finance chief, Mr. Kaeser, occurred while he oversaw finances at Siemens's wireless-telecom-equipment unit. He belonged to the executive management board of that unit from April 2001 to October 2004.

Mr. Siekaczek, who left Siemens in late 2004 after four decades, told prosecutors after being arrested in November that Mr. Kaeser "had people that created slush funds" at the wireless unit while Mr. Kaeser was employed there, according to the witness statements.

Mr. Kaeser became financial chief in May 2006 after succeeding Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, who left the company. German prosecutors said earlier this month that Mr. Neubürger is a suspect in the investigation.

Mr. Siekaczek testified that he himself helped carry out bribes at the wireless unit for a brief period around 2000. Mr. Kutschenreuter told prosecutors in December that a compliance manager told him in late 2004 or early 2005 that illegal payments were commonplace at the wireless unit, according to the statements.

Mr. Kutschenreuter became the chief financial officer of an expanded telecom division in October 2004, when the wireless and fixed-line units were merged.

Around that time, Mr. Kutschenreuter testified, he spoke with Mr. Pauly, who then headed the merged telecom division. He said Mr. Pauly told him the wireless unit's former top management -- including Messrs. Kaeser and Lamprecht -- were aware of bribe payments to win wireless contracts.

Mr. Lamprecht headed the mobile unit before being promoted in October 2004 to the management board of Siemens.

Prosecutors suspect Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek helped orchestrate bribe payments at the fixed-line unit through a system of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts. Mr. Kutschenreuter was heading Siemens's real-estate unit at the time of his arrest.

German prosecutors presented the testimony of Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek to an arraignment judge last month when seeking the detention of former management-board member Thomas Ganswindt. A lawyer for Mr. Ganswindt, who was released, said his client denies any wrongdoing.

The allegations could harm efforts by Siemens to merge the bulk of its telecom business into a 50-50 joint venture with Nokia. A merger would create the world's No. 3 supplier of equipment to telecom carriers with about €16 billion in annual revenue.

Nokia and Siemens said last month they expect to close the transaction in the first quarter of 2007, not Jan. 1 as originally planned, pending "an appropriate compliance review"' of the German company's telecom business.

The planned merger, which includes both fixed-line and wireless assets, was announced last June.

Top management at Siemens has consistently denied any wrongdoing. The company says it is cooperating fully with authorities. Authorities have said that Chief Executive Officer Klaus Kleinfeld is a witness, not a suspect, in the criminal investigation.

Investors will have a chance to question management further about the fraud investigation Thursday, when Siemens has its annual shareholder meeting. Shareholders also will be asked to vote to approve the actions of individual management and supervisory board members in the most recent fiscal year.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Report Faults FBI In Foley Case (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Margasak

Long Island Newsday, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The FBI should have acted to protect teenage House pages when it initially learned last July that Rep. Mark Foley had sent disturbing e-mails to a former page, a Justice Department report concluded Monday.

The bureau, which at the time declined to investigate, also made inaccurate statements to the news media about its decision, the report said. It said that bureau spokesmen wrongly asserted that the decision was influenced by a congressional watchdog group's failure to provide information missing from the e-mails.

The report, by Inspector General Glenn Fine, said the group was not asked to provide any additional information from the e-mails -- nor did the missing material influence the decision not to investigate.

"We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the Congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley," Fine reported.

Such actions by the FBI could have included interviewing the former page and notifying House officials overseeing the page program about the e-mails.

The inspector general, however, found no misconduct by FBI officials, who at the time were aware only of e-mails to a former Louisiana page that were not sexually explicit and gave no indication of criminal activity.

The FBI said the inspector general acknowledged that its assessment "was conducted after the fact and after explicit instant messages surfaced -- none of which were part of the FBI's initial evaluation."

The bureau promised to carefully examine its policies for disseminating information to see whether changes are warranted.

The group that provided the e-mails, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) said it had been vindicated by the report.

"Not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up it's shocking inaction by blaming CREW. The IG's report vindicates CREW completely."

The bureau did launch an investigation after Foley, R-Fla., resigned last Sept. 29 and the news media revealed he had sent instant electronic messages with sexual overtones to former male pages. The FBI has not commented on the results of that investigation.

"We believe that the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps," the report said.

The action could have included a preliminary inquiry with an interview of a former page. Alternatively, officials should have considered "notifying the House authorities in charge of the page program about the concerns expressed by the former page," Fine's report said.

In fact, some House officials did know about the e-mails, sent in 2005. The chairman of the House Page Board overseeing the program, Republican Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, confronted Foley about them and told him to stop sending the messages.

However, Shimkus has been criticized by members of both parties for failing to convene the page board, and the body was reconstituted last week to ensure that it would better handle future problems.

The substance of the e-mails to the Louisiana page has long been known. Foley asked what the youngster wanted for his birthday and asked for a picture.

The youngster told others the e-mails "freaked me out" and repeated multiple times that they were "sick."

The internal Justice report said that at the very least the bureau should have notified the organization that provided the e-mails that it had declined to open an investigation.

CREW had been relying on the FBI to pursue the matter and had not notified anyone else about the e-mails while waiting for the bureau to act.

The House voted unanimously last Friday to provide both parties equal membership on the board that oversees the page program and to add a parent and a former page to that body.

FBI Chided For Inaction On Foley Case (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - The FBI -- which warns parents on its website about "individuals who attempt to sexually exploit children" via the Internet -- should have sounded alarms over questionable computer messages sent to a former teenage page by disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, an inspector general's report concluded Monday.

The agency should have interviewed the page or alerted the House page program or, "at the very least," told the whistle-blower agency that provided it with the messages that it was declining to investigate, said the 31-page report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine.

"We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley," the report states.

The report also found that FBI officials misled reporters about the whistleblower group that provided the messages. The FBI, it said, suggested to reporters that its decision not to investigate the matter was partly because the group gave it messages that were "heavily redacted" and that it refused to cooperate further.

But the report shows that Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington provided messages that had the name of the page and a House employee to whom the message was sent. It chastises the FBI for not telling CREW that it wasn't going to investigate the matter, suggesting that CREW might have pursued it further.

The FBI, in a statement issued late Monday, noted that the inspector general's report concluded that the agency had "acted within the range of its discretion" in not opening a criminal investigation. And it noted that the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia later reviewed the same messages ``and agreed that no further investigation was warranted."

The agency also promised to "carefully examine" the report to see whether policy changes are needed.

CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan welcomed the report, but suggested it mirrored a pattern of agencies turning a blind eye to Foley's behavior. Amid criticism, the House of Representatives last week revised the Page Board in an attempt to avoid future problems.

Foley, a Lake Worth Republican, resigned Sept. 29 after sexually explicit instant messages he exchanged with other pages surfaced.

That action came several months after CREW sent copies of computer messages to the FBI. The e-mails did not contain any sexually explicit material, but the report suggests it was enough for the FBI to act.

The inspector general noted that the language in the messages fell within the type of behavior that the FBI warns against in A Parent's Guide to Internet Safety, which is available on its website.

No Misconduct Found In FBI Decision On Foley (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

The FBI's initial decision not to open a probe into Rep. Mark Foley's e-mail contact with House pages was within bureau guidelines, but the exchanges "provided enough troubling indications" to begin a preliminary inquiry, according to a report released yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said that given the position of trust and authority the former Florida congressman held with respect to House pages, a better decision for the FBI in the matter would have been for it to take "at least some follow-up steps."

"Such action could have included a brief preliminary inquiry with an interview of the former page," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. "Alternatively, if the FBI did not think that such an interview was warranted, it should have considered notifying House authorities in charge of the page program.

"At a minimum, we believe the FBI should have notified CREW (Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington), the complainant in this case, that the FBI had declined to open an investigation," Mr. Fine said. "At the time, CREW was relying on the FBI to pursue the matter and as a result had not notified anyone else about the e-mails."

Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, had forwarded three e-mails to the FBI in July that she believed warranted investigation, although the bureau decided they did not warrant any investigative action. The FBI did not inform CREW of its decision or take any additional action.

In September, the sexually charged e-mails and other instant messages from Mr. Foley to other former congressional pages became public. Mr. Foley, a Republican, resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 and three days later, the FBI announced it was opening a "preliminary investigation" into Mr. Foley's e-mails with House pages.

Mr. Fine said five of the e-mails were written by Mr. Foley to a former male page and contained statements that, at a minimum, could be described as unusual between an adult in a position of authority and a juvenile. He said three additional e-mails were exchanged between the former page and a House employee in which the former page expressed concern about the nature of the Foley e-mails.

An investigation by Mr. Fine's office found that e-mails provided to the FBI by CREW had been forwarded promptly to the appropriate FBI supervisory special agent in the Washington field office. Mr. Fine said his investigators were told that while the e-mails were determined to be "odd," there was no evidence of criminal wrongdoing and no further investigation was warranted.

The Inspector General's Office concluded that the decision not to open an investigation did not constitute misconduct, but it said a preliminary inquiry should have been ordered.

The FBI in a statement yesterday noted that the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia later reviewed the same e-mails and agreed no further investigation was warranted.

The statement said the e-mails were reviewed by three separate investigative squads and FBI agents acted "quickly and appropriately in assessing the information" and providing it to the Cyber Crimes Squad, where the decision was made not to pursue a criminal investigation.

FBI Should've Followed Up On Foley's E-mails, Inquiry Finds (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

WASHINGTON — The FBI should have made more inquiries into the "troubling" e-mails written by then-congressman Mark Foley to young congressional pages before the bureau decided against launching a formal investigation, the Justice Department's inspector general concluded Monday.

On Sept. 29 — two months after the FBI received information about the e-mails from the government watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) — Foley, R-Fla., resigned when ABC News confronted him about sexually suggestive e-mails he had sent to male pages.

The inspector general found that the FBI's handling of the matter did not constitute misconduct and that an unidentified FBI supervisory special agent acted within "the range of discretion" when the agent found no apparent evidence of criminal wrongdoing.

"However, the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps with regard to the e-mails," the inspector general's report found.

"If the FBI did not think that such an interview was warranted, it should have considered notifying House authorities in charge of the page program about the concerns expressed" by a former page, the report said.

The inspector general also found that "FBI or Justice Department" officials provided "inaccurate information" to media outlets when they explained that an investigation had not been opened because CREW provided the FBI with "heavily-redacted" material and that CREW refused to provide details about the source of the e-mails.

In a written response, the FBI said it would review its internal policies. But the bureau said Foley's most explicit communications with pages were not part of its initial evaluation of the case. The FBI said internal "misunderstandings" contributed to the release of inaccurate information to reporters.

"The (inspector general) determined that the e-mails were reviewed by three separate investigative squads and that the FBI agents acted quickly and appropriately in assessing the information," the FBI said in its response.

CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan said the government's release of inaccurate information amounted to a "coverup" of the FBI's "shocking inaction."

"By forwarding the e-mails to the FBI … CREW (was) the only party in this sordid affair to have done the right thing from the first instance," she said.

In December, the House ethics committee reported that several members had known about Foley's e-mails and did not do enough to protect pages. However, the panel found that no individual member had violated the chamber's ethics policies.

The Foley scandal, revealed just more than a month before the elections in November, was among a series of ethical issues Republicans faced before losing control of Congress in the elections.

The FBI, which opened an investigation into the Foley case after he resigned, is continuing to examine the case. The attorney general's office in Florida continues to investigate the case, spokeswoman Sandi Copes said.

FBI Faulted For Inaction In Foley Scandal (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The FBI should have acted last summer to protect underage congressional pages after it was given "troubling" electronic messages sent by then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), according to a report released yesterday.

The review by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine also found that FBI and Justice officials misled the news media last fall when they asserted that an activist group that first provided the FBI with Foley's messages had not been cooperative and had withheld vital information from investigators.

In fact, Fine's report found that the group -- Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington, or CREW -- had notified the FBI within days of obtaining the electronic communications in July. But the FBI never asked for additional information from the group and never sought to interview the former page in Louisiana who received the messages from Foley, the report said.

The 31-page report provides additional evidence that government and legislative officials took little action in response to growing complaints about Foley's conduct with underage male pages. It also shows how officials frequently attempted to minimize their roles in the affair after the communications were publicized and Foley resigned.

"We believe that the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps," the report concluded. It added later: "[E]ven if the FBI did not believe any interviews were warranted based upon the e-mails alone, we believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the Congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley."

Follow-up steps could have included interviewing the male page who received the electronic messages or notifying House leaders about the communications, the report said.

Foley resigned from the House in September after ABC News reported on the same communications given to the FBI, in which Foley praises the physical attributes of one page and asks another for his picture. The ensuing scandal was widely seen as a significant factor in the defeat of some Republicans in the November elections.

Both the FBI and the state of Florida have opened criminal investigations of Foley. In December, the House ethics committee concluded that House leaders and staff members knew for months or even years about Foley's inappropriate conduct, but the panel declined to recommend any disciplinary action.

The FBI's criminal probe appears to be ongoing. One 22-year-old former page who allegedly received explicit messages from Foley said in an interview yesterday that the FBI had most recently questioned him the week before Christmas. He said the agent was focused on determining his age at the time of the electronic exchanges with Foley and confirming other details.

Shortly after the Foley scandal broke, CREW publicly disclosed that it had provided the FBI with suspicious messages from Foley in July and criticized the bureau for not moving more aggressively in the case.

Several officials at the FBI and Justice Department -- all of whom requested anonymity at the time -- responded by telling reporters that the messages supplied by CREW had been "heavily redacted" and that the group had refused to provide further information.

Fine's review found, however, that the only thing removed from the messages was the identity of the person to whom the communications had been forwarded, and that the "redactions in the e-mail did not factor into the FBI's decision to decline to investigate the matter." Fine's office also found that a chronology prepared by the FBI's Washington Field Office contained inaccuracies that were likely repeated to the press.

CREW's executive director, Melanie Sloan, said in a statement that "not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming CREW."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse referred questions about the report to the FBI. The FBI, in a prepared statement, attributed the erroneous statements about CREW to "inaccurate information" that led to "misunderstandings on the part of FBI and DOJ spokespersons."

The supervisory special agent who looked into the Foley messages said there was no evidence a crime had occurred and that the messages were "not the job of the FBI" but "a parental job."

"We are not the ethics police," the unidentified agent said later in the report.

One point of disagreement not answered in the report is whether Sloan was asked by an FBI agent to identify the person who provided the group with the messages. The FBI agent said she "may have" asked Sloan that question, but that she was not sure; Sloan has said since October that she was asked only whether the author of the communications was Foley.

FBI: We Flubbed Foley E-mails (ABC)

By Jason Ryan And Brian Ross

ABC News' The Blotter, January 23, 2007

The FBI should have done more to investigate the Mark Foley e-mails or, alternatively, notified House authorities in charge of the congressional page program, the FBI's inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, said in a report today.

Read the Mark Foley e-mails.

In effect, the report finds the FBI's inaction contributed to the failure of officials to detect Foley's inappropriate behavior, which eventually led to his resignation when ABC News revealed more sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages to current and former pages.

While finding no official misconduct on the part of FBI officials, the inspector general said "the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face" to have warranted follow-up steps.

Instead, the inspector general found, the supervisory agent decided there was no evidence of criminal wrongdoing and "placed the e-mails in her in box and took no further action" even though she found the e-mails "odd."

The e-mails were provided to the FBI in July 2006 by the non-profit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

Click Here for Full Blotter Coverage.

The inspector general said the FBI "at a minimum" should have told CREW it had decided against an investigation because "CREW was relying on the FBI to pursue the matter and as a result had not notified anyone else about the e-mails."

Melanie Sloan, the executive director of CREW, says the FBI's handling of the Foley e-mails was irresponsible. "They should take investigating potential, child sexual predators much more seriously," says Sloan. "Attorney General Gonzales said this is one of their top priorities, but their conduct in this case shows that clearly that is not the case."

The inspector general also concluded that widely reported comments by FBI officials on the e-mails provided by CREW were "not accurate."

Unnamed officials were quoted as saying "the reason that the FBI did nothing further at the time" was because CREW had provided heavily redacted e-mails and refused to provide information about the source of the e-mails.

Sloan says the agency owes her organization an apology. "The FBI didn't fail to take any action on the e-mails because of any of CREW's actions," she said. "What CREW gave the FBI, they failed to investigate all on their own."

The inspector general said it was unable to determine who was responsible for making the inaccurate statements to the media.

Justice Report Faults FBI On Foley, Says Agents Should Have Done More (PALMBEACHP)

By Brian E. Crowley, Palm Beach Post Political Editor

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 23, 2007

The Justice Department on Monday released a report criticizing the FBI for failing to take action to ensure the safety of congressional pages after receiving copies of e-mails sent by former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley.

In the 31-page report, Inspector General Glenn Fine said that although the failure to begin a formal investigation was "not misconduct," agents had enough information to "have raised enough concerns to warrant some action."

Fine also found that the FBI misled reporters by saying the e-mails they received were incomplete, with much of the writing blotted out. That was not true, Fine said.

The messages examined by Fine were not the sexually explicit e-mails that led to Foley's resignation from Congress.

The FBI obtained the messages in question in July from Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a government watchdog group. In one, Foley asks a teen to send a picture, asks how old he is and comments on another congressional page who is "in really great shape."

Sloan's office received copies of the e-mails and forwarded them to the Washington office of the FBI.

Fine's report details how the e-mails were batted from the Public Corruption Squad to the Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity Squad and finally to the Cyber Crimes Squad. None of the agents is named in the report.

The supervisory special agent for the Public Corruption Squad told Fine that after reading the e-mails, he thought, "What a freak," but he decided they did not fall into his jurisdiction. He passed them to Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity.

The agent in charge of that squad told Fine that it "was clear to me that there was no criminal violation," although she called the e-mails "inappropriate." Because of the type of messages, she passed them on to Cyber Crimes.

The agent in charge of Cyber Crimes called the e-mails "odd" but also "did not see any evidence of wrongdoing," Fine said.

She told him she decided not to investigate, in part, because the age of consent in the District of Columbia is 16.

During Fine's investigation, the Cyber Crimes agent said: "We only open a case if there is a reasonable indication that criminal activity has occurred or will occur. There was nothing in this that warranted taking any action."

The agent also was asked whether the e-mails suggested she should notify managers of the congressional page program. She said no.

She told Fine that the e-mails, which were not sexually explicit, were "not the job of the FBI. This is a parental job."

She said the fact that Foley was a congressman did not influence her decision.

Two months later, ABC News posted the same e-mails on its Web site. That prompted others to send copies of e-mails from Foley that were more sexually explicit. Foley, a Fort Pierce Republican, resigned Sept. 29.

Fine said the FBI's decision not to investigate the e-mails it received in July "fell within the range of discretion" of an FBI supervisor.

But Fine went on to say that because of Foley's "position of trust and authority" with House pages, "a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps."

At the very least, agents should have "notified the House authorities who ran the page program," Fine said.

The report also criticizes the FBI for not following up with Sloan and for claiming that the e-mails it received contained little useful information.

In a statement, Sloan said she hoped "the FBI would learn from this incident and, in the future, be quicker to investigate potential crimes against children."

Meanwhile, both the FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are continuing their investigations into Foley and his conduct with congressional pages.

DOJ_NMG_0120202

"We still have an active, open investigation, so there is no change on our part at this time," FDLE spokeswoman Kristen Perezluha said. "What we are doing is on the state level. We have been assisting the FBI in their investigation, but the FDLE investigation is separate."

Report Faults FBI Handling Of Foley Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The agency's follow-up was inadequate and it gave "inaccurate" public accounts, inquiry finds.

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department's inspector general admonished the FBI on Monday for its handling of the page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, saying the bureau failed to follow up on suggestive e-mails between the Florida Republican and a former male page and gave "inaccurate" public statements about the case.

The watchdog report was triggered by a complaint filed by a nonprofit advocacy group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which had sent the FBI copies of e-mails between Foley and a former page last summer. The e-mails were sent two months before the scandal became public and forced the lawmaker to resign after a series of sexually explicit messages surfaced.

The FBI dismissed the early e-mails, the inspector general found, because agents did not believe they showed evidence of criminal wrongdoing. The FBI later launched an investigation, which is pending.

In the e-mails, Foley beckons a former page to e-mail him a picture of himself and asks what he might like for his birthday. He also comments about another page being "in really great shape" and seeming "much older than his age."

The e-mails also included complaints about Foley from a former page who told a House employee that Foley's e-mails had "freaked me out" and calling the content of his messages "sick."

The inspector general found that the tip was handled by a senior supervisory agent in the cyber crimes division of the FBI Washington field office who found the messages "odd" but not indicative of any criminal wrongdoing because, the agent said, the law in the District of Columbia permits sexual relations between an adult and a 16-year-old — the minimum age for pages.

The report found that the decision not to investigate "fell within the range of discretion" afforded supervisory agents and "did not constitute misconduct." But it also found the messages "at a minimum" to be "unusual" and that the FBI should have taken some action.

"The e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up," the inspector general found.

The report also noted that, notwithstanding the law in the district, three of the eight states from which the e-mails were sent or received would have made sexual conduct between Foley and a 16-year-old a crime.

The report also criticized the bureau for public comments it made about the advocacy group's complaint.

Justice officials said at the time that the group had provided "heavily redacted" e-mails and refused to provide information about their source, indicating that was the reason the FBI did not pursue an investigation earlier.

The inspector general's office "concluded that such statements were not accurate. The e-mails were not heavily redacted and the evidence showed that the FBI did not seek additional information from" the advocacy group, the report found.

The inspector general "was unable to determine who was responsible for making the inaccurate statements," the report said, and concluded that the inaccuracies were caused by "a misinterpretation of the description of events that was disseminated within the FBI."

Melanie Sloan, the executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics, said: "Not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming" the advocacy group.

The FBI said it would study the report. "The FBI shares the [inspector general's] interest in ensuring that information regarding potential criminal activity is evaluated objectively and in conformance with established policies and practices," the bureau said in a statement. "Accordingly, the FBI will carefully examine the … review for any changes to existing policies or procedures that may be warranted."

CNN.com, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- An internal Justice Department report concluded the FBI should have notified the House of Representatives or other officials after learning last summer of inappropriate e-mails former Rep. Mark Foley sent to a House page.

The report, released Monday and authored by the Justice Department inspector general, said the FBI acted within its "range of discretion" when it initially decided not to open a criminal investigation in the case.

But the internal watchdog's investigation concluded that the response was inadequate.

"The e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face -- particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages -- that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps with regard to the e-mails," said Inspector General Glenn Fine.

Fine's investigation said that if the FBI determined an interview with the former page was not warranted, the FBI should have at least notified House officials charged with protecting congressional pages.

It also should have notified the complaining organization that sent the material, the report said.

In a written response late Monday, the FBI defended its handling of the case and stressed the inspector general's finding that the FBI acted appropriately in its decision not to launch a criminal investigation after the initial e-mails.

"The OIG [Office of Inspector General] acknowledges that its assessment was conducted after the fact and after explicit instant messages surfaced -- none of which were part of the FBI's initial evaluation," the FBI said.

"The review suggests certain follow-up steps could have been undertaken with regard to the e-mails," the response notes.

The inspector general confirmed the first Foley e-mails came to the FBI in July 2006 from the group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, after which the FBI decided no action was needed.

After eight more e-mails and explicit instant messages from Foley were made public in September, a political firestorm erupted on Capitol Hill.

Foley resigned September 29 and the FBI opened an investigation. To date, no charges have been filed.

The inspector general also criticized the FBI for making inaccurate statements about the reasons it had not opened an investigation after the initial batch of e-mails.

The report rejected the FBI's claims in press reports that the e-mails had been heavily redacted and that CREW had refused to provide information about the source of the e-mails.

In its response, the FBI said the bureau will conduct a review of whether any policies or procedures need to be changed in the interest of disseminating the most accurate information and avoiding internal misunderstandings.

Justice Department Report Says Bureau Mishandled Receipt Of Ex-Congressman's Improper E-mails

The Justice Department's Inspector General's internal investigation into how the FBI's Washington field office handled e-mails sent to pages by former Rep. Mark Foley has concluded that the agency handled the events poorly.

The Foley e-mails were sent to the FBI in July 2006 by Citizens for Responsibility in Ethics (CREW); the scandal broke in September 2006.

However, the investigation concludes that the FBI supervisors did not engage in "misconduct."

The report reveals that the e-mails "provided enough troubling indications" that the FBI supervisor who reviewed them should have, at a minimum, interviewed the former page. If the agents didn't think such an interview was warranted, they should have gone to House authorities in charge of the page program about concerns that were expressed. Finally, the FBI should have notified CREW that the FBI decided not to investigate since CREW thought an investigation was already under way.

After Foley resigned from office in September, the Office of the Inspector General also concluded that the FBI made "inaccurate statements to the media" about the e-mails forward by CREW. The FBI claimed the e-mails were heavily redacted, and thus useless to investigators. But in fact, the e-mails were not heavily redacted, "and the evidence showed that the FBI did not seek additional information from CREW."

The Justice Department was faulted for disseminating inaccuracies to the news media as well.

Investigators: FBI Not Wrong To Dismiss Complaint About Foley (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, January 23, 2007

The FBI misled reporters about its decision not to investigate a series of e-mails between former Rep. Mark Foley and a congressional page, but was justified in deciding not to open a case based on information provided in July 2006, Justice Department investigators said Monday.

A Justice inspector general's investigation cleared the FBI of accusations that officials were too quick in declining to open an investigation based on five e-mails from Foley, none of them explicit in nature, to a former page.

The e-mails were shared with the FBI in July, months before Foley resigned from the House, by the Washington advocacy group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics. The group asked the IG to look into the FBI's handling of the matter after the scandal broke in late September. While the e-mails were less damning than the instant messages later uncovered between Foley and a House page, the minor who forwarded the e-mails to a House staff member described them as "sick sick sick sick sick."

Justice IG Glenn Fine's study found that after several hand-offs between FBI units, the e-mails provided by the advocacy group reached the Cyber Crimes Squad, where a supervisory special agent decided not to open an investigation because there was nothing in the messages that constituted a crime. Inspectors concluded that the agent's decision fell into an appropriate "range of discretion," but said the group should have been informed of the decision not to open an investigation.

"At a minimum, we believe the FBI should have notified CREW, the complainant in this case, that the FBI had declined to open an investigation," inspectors wrote, adding that CREW had been relying on the agency to pursue the issue and so had not taken other steps. The IG also noted that Foley's messages followed the lines of behavior that the FBI describes as "gradual seduction" in its Parent's Guide to Internet Safety.

Inspectors described the internal handoff of the case from a federal watchdog liaison agent to the Public Corruption Squad to the Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity Squad to the Cyber Crimes Squad, but found no indication that concern over pursuing a case against a congressman had factored into the agency's final decision not to investigate further. The FBI announced on Oct. 1 that an investigation would be opened into Foley's contacts with pages, just after his Sept. 29 resignation.

The advocacy group also asked the inspector general's office to investigate statements that Justice officials made to reporters in September that the agency had failed to act earlier because CREW had submitted only "heavily redacted" versions of the e-mails and had refused to provide further information when asked.

The watchdog group immediately contested those charges, and in its review, the IG office found that public statements attributed to FBI and Justice officials were not true. The only information redacted from the messages was the name and contact information of another person to whom the messages had been forwarded. The message bodies, the page's e-mail address and that of the House staffer to whom he reported the messages were all clear.

The IG office also found that the advocacy group participated in the only follow-up conducted by FBI agents, a telephone call from the liaison officer immediately after the messages were submitted. The group forwarded them to authorities immediately, not after a lag of several months, as media outlets reported an undisclosed official had suggested, the auditors found.

The inspectors attributed the misinformation to "misunderstandings" between FBI and Justice spokespeople, but said none of the three media representatives interviewed recalled giving out the inaccurate information.

"By forwarding the e-mails to the FBI for investigation, CREW stands out as the only party in this sordid affair to have done the right thing from the first instance," CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan said Monday. "In marked contrast, not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming CREW."

In a statement, Justice officials said Monday that FBI "will carefully examine the OIG review for any changes to existing policies or procedures that may be warranted."

Last week, the House passed legislation intended to ensure Congress would respond better to future incidents involving pages by expanding representation on the board overseeing the page program to include a former page who is not a member of Congress, and a parent of a current or former page.

FBI Should Have Pursued Foley E-Mails, Report Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland

Bloomberg, January 23, 2007

Jan. 22 (Bloomberg) -- The FBI should have followed up on e- mails sent in 2005 by then-U.S. Representative Mark Foley to a former teenage male congressional page instead of deciding not to investigate, a Justice Department report says.

Bureau officials also circulated inaccurate information about the e-mails, leading to false news reports that helped justify inaction by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said the report today by the department's inspector general.

``The FBI's decision to decline to investigate this matter was not misconduct," the 21-page report said. ``Yet we believe that the e-mails should have raised enough concerns to warrant some action."

Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned in September after the e-mails became public. The controversy surrounding his conduct, and whether House Republican leaders ignored his transgressions, helped Democrats regain control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

A House ethics committee report said in December that Republican congressional leaders failed to protect the pages after hearing warnings about Foley's behavior as much as two years earlier.

The FBI got the 2005 e-mails last July from a nonpartisan watchdog group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. After reviewing the messages for two days, the bureau decided not to investigate, the report said.

Discipline Required

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the group that forwarded the e-mails to the FBI, said the Justice Department should discipline employees responsible for lapses identified in today's report.

``I think Foley would have resigned a lot sooner if he knew the FBI was looking at him," Sloan said in an interview.

None of the FBI agents who handled the e-mails were identified by name in the report. Sloan said she got the messages from another public-interest group.

The FBI said in a statement it shares the Justice Department inspector general's ``interest in ensuring that information regarding potential criminal activity" is properly evaluated, and it promised to study the report for any warranted ``changes to existing policies or procedures."

Within the FBI, a public-corruption agent who read the e- mails in July thought of Foley, ``What a freak," the Justice Department report said. The agent decided that the material should be examined by colleagues in other units, who found that the messages didn't warrant further investigation in part because they didn't contain sexually explicit language, the report said.

Asking for Photograph

In one e-mail given to the FBI, Foley inquired about a former page's safety in a hurricane and asked him for a photograph. The page passed on the e-mail to a House aide and added the comment: ``sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick."

Today's report said the FBI could have conducted a preliminary inquiry that included an interview of the former page. The bureau also could have notified congressional leaders about concerns expressed by the former page in the e-mail.

When the messages became public, news reports quoted the FBI and the Justice Department as saying -- in what proved to be false -- that the messages were ``heavily redacted," or censored, and that Sloan's group refused to provide more information, the report said.

Editorial: FBI Flubbed Foley Probe (BOSH)

Boston Herald, January 23, 2007

The latest in the sordid saga of former Rep. Mark Foley proves once again that not a single agency - not a single individual - managed to see clearly through the Beltway haze to act in the best interests of vulnerable teens.

The Department of Justice yesterday concluded that the FBI should have investigated Foley and the inappropriate e-mails he had sent to a former House page when the agency was informed of them back in July.

"We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the congressional page program were not at risk . . . " wrote DOJ Inspector General Glenn Fine.

The e-mails, while not sexually explicit, "provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held" to warrant an FBI probe, Fine wrote.

An FBI investigation might have included informing House officials who oversee the page program about the "Foley problem." Then again, as another investigation proved, some of those same House officials already knew, but did little to deal with it. It appears that like everyone else tainted by this scandal, the FBI passed the buck until Foley resigned and the sordid details were reported by the media.

Now the new Congress has revamped the board that oversees the page program and has pledged regular meetings. But unless every agency, every individual with an interest in protecting these young people understands their duty, that will be of little comfort.

Libby Jury Is Chosen; Arguments Set To Start (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

A federal judge empaneled a jury yesterday in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, seating a largely apolitical, educated group of D.C. residents to decide whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to investigators about his role in divulging the identity of a covert CIA officer.

The nine women and three men selected for the jury -- as well as four alternates -- are scheduled to hear Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald and one of Libby's attorneys, Theodore V. Wells Jr., lay out opposing portrayals of the celebrated case in opening statements today. Over the next four to six weeks, testimony in the case will expose the inner workings of the Bush White House shortly after the Iraq war began and confidential conversations between well-known journalists and their sources in the administration.

Libby faces five felony charges that he lied to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame's name by aides to President Bush.

In a city where most residents are black, 90 percent are Democrats and the local culture is steeped in politics, the jury is not completely representative. Ten of the 12 jurors -- and two of the alternates -- are white. Most said during questioning that they have no political opinions about the administration's handling of Iraq or do not follow the news.

"I am a master of all things pop culture but nothing about current events," said a woman who books conventions for hotels. Another juror, an art historian with a doctorate, said she glances at newspapers perhaps twice a week and never watches television.

The large proportion of jurors without opinions of the president or the war is a result of the defense's strategy. Libby's attorneys told potential jurors that Cheney and other senior aides to Bush probably would testify and asked careful questions to determine how jurors would regard the credibility of those important defense witnesses.

By yesterday morning, when the two sides had narrowed an initial pool of 60 potential jurors to 37, a dozen in that group had expressed at least mild disagreement with the administration. Virtually all of them were excluded from the 16 who were seated.

The jury includes a retired math teacher who said he does not always agree with Bush's Iraq policy and is "beginning to have less faith in him" as the war continues. But he emphasized his objectivity and said he does "not make any snap judgments."

During four days of jury selection in Courtroom 16 of the federal courthouse a few blocks from the Capitol, a large number of jury candidates said they were personally acquainted with people involved in the case. In the end, knowing those players did not, in itself, keep them off the jury. Among the jurors is a former Washington Post reporter who once worked for now-Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward, a defense witness, and until recently was a neighbor of NBC's Tim Russert, a prosecution witness.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton told the jury members that he would "semi-sequester" them. He said they could go home each night. But to minimize their contact with other people, he said, they would be picked up at a central location every morning and have breakfast and lunch delivered during the day. He ordered them not to discuss the case with anyone or follow the news.

The jurors do not know which of them have been designated as alternates. All 16 will hear the entire case.

Libby Jury Seated; Arguments May Start Today (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The judge in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. seated a jury of nine women and three men on Monday who are expected to spend a month or longer hearing the case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former top aide.

Mr. Libby, widely known by his nickname Scooter, is charged with lying to a grand jury and to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents who were trying to find out who leaked to journalists the identity of a C.I.A. operative and why. Neither Mr. Libby nor anyone else was charged with disclosing the name of the operative, Valerie Wilson.

Instead, he is charged with lying about the fact that he discussed Ms. Wilson with journalists and thus impeded the investigation.

In addition to the 12 jurors, Judge Reggie M. Walton seated four alternates to replace any of the 12 who may fall ill or have other problems.

All 16 jurors will hear the case, unaware who are alternates, to ensure that they pay attention. The lawyers on both sides and reporters covering the case do know which jurors are which.

The jurors include a woman who said she had worked for decades as a curator of prints and drawings at the Metropolitan Museum of Art and a retired postal worker who said in jury selection that Judge Walton sentenced her son to jail on drug charges years ago.

The jury includes a former reporter for The Washington Post who said his editor was Bob Woodward, a Post journalist who is expected to be a witness in the trial. The former Post reporter also said that until recently he was a neighbor of Tim Russert of NBC News, who is also expected to be a witness.

All the jurors had said they would be able to put aside any feelings about the Bush administration and assess the case fairly.

The jury selection spanned four days, an unusually long time, because so many prospective candidates said they might be biased because they were so strongly critical of the administration, especially Mr. Cheney. The vice president is expected to be a major witness for Mr. Libby.

Explaining that he wanted to shield the jurors from the news media and others at the courthouse who might inadvertently influence them, Judge Walton said jurors would be collected at an undisclosed location and brought in to hear the case.

At each day's end, they will be returned to that location to be dismissed to go home.

Each side is expected to make its opening statements on Tuesday, with Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the prosecutor, first.

He will be followed by Mr. Libby's lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr.

The first witnesses against Mr. Libby may begin testifying on Wednesday.

A Trial To Remember (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff

Who knew that 12 angry Americans could be so easy to come by — and a jury so difficult to assemble? "It took us all day to get six jurors qualified," Judge Reggie M. Walton lamented last Thursday, after a contentious afternoon of voir dire in the Scooter Libby trial. Judge Walton had hoped to have seated his panel by then; selection took twice as long as expected. Opening arguments are scheduled for today, not the sort of trailer you would normally run before a State of the Union address.

To some minds, a jury has not been the only thing missing from United States of America v. I. Lewis Libby. "In the most important sense, this is a case without a crime," The Wall Street Journal reminded us over the weekend. An artful leap followed: "Yes, Mr. Libby is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, which are serious offenses."

It is true that what began as a search for a leak ended — after much collateral damage — with an indictment for a lie. At this juncture it can be difficult to grasp what, precisely, is on trial. Some of us seem viscerally to wish something else were. While the original investigation stemmed from the charge that a public official had provided accurate information to the press, potential jurors appear more eager to charge a public official with having provided false information to a country. It was, after all, Mr. Libby who drafted the 2003 masterpiece that Colin Powell presented to the United Nations, the one about Iraq's fabled chemical and biological weapons.

Juror 0420, an economist, couldn't help but say she thought the Iraq war "a tremendous mistake, a horrendous mistake, and a betrayal." She could not promise to be objective about Dick Cheney, who is slated to testify.

Juror 0244 reported "strong negative feelings about this current administration and its conduct of the war." He was gone in seconds.

Juror 1140 admitted: "I believe the vice president would have had the defendant leak." Had she any preconceived notions? "Guilty."

Juror 1298 felt that she could muster the maturity to be open-minded about Mr. Libby. But when pressed by Judge Walton on whether a witness from the administration would carry "a strike against them," she replied, "Probably." Home she went.

Juror 1980 made herself crystal clear: "I cannot believe any statement from the Bush administration." Bye-bye.

These exchanges produced a little rowdiness over in the press room, where stopwatches were set to see how long a potential juror could last. Remember that door-to-door campaign the president has promised for Baghdad? Those good-will ambassadors might be better deployed in our nation's capital.

On the stand will be the vagaries of human memory. Hence the carefully crafted questions submitted by Libby's team for prospective jurors: Can you honestly misremember? Is the memory like a tape recorder, or does it make mistakes? Can you falsely believe someone told you something when it was someone else, at a prior date? Can you hold to your memories even after they are found to be inaccurate?

The defense will contend that Mr. Libby's recollections were honest, even if incorrect. "Confused, forgot or misremembered" are not crimes. Deliberate lying is; to be convicted, Mr. Libby must be shown to have willfully misled.

He claims to have been preoccupied with vital security issues and buried under intelligence information; he paid little heed to the matter of a C.I.A. officer's employment. Technically this is called the "Honey, I was too busy preparing the family tax return to think clearly when you asked about the lap dancers" defense.

Surely it's a legitimate one, if perhaps a little tough to swallow after six years of distorted intelligence and Enron-grade responsibility. Also, is it just me, or does that argument sound disconcertingly familiar? Wasn't it Mr. Libby's ex-boss who — when asked why he hadn't served in Vietnam — replied, "I had other priorities in the '60s than military service"?

Generally, a memory can prove a dangerous thing to have under this administration. Even I can remember W.M.D., Mohamed Atta, African uranium, shock and awe, mission accomplished, and a heckuva job — and I'm lousy when it comes to plot. The prodigious Mr. Libby, on the other hand, remembers all 79 "Star Trek" episodes. And their titles, too.

Fox News, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department should administer a polygraph test to former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger to find out what documents he took from the National Archives in 2002 and 2003, Rep. Tom Davis wrote in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dated Monday.

Davis, ranking Republican on the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, is leading a group of 18 lawmakers who say the Justice Department has been "remarkably incurious" about Berger's decision to remove documents relating to the Sept. 11 commission's inquiry into his role in helping prevent terror attacks during the Clinton administration.

"It is extraordinarily important that the Justice Department avail itself of its rights under the plea agreement and administer a polygraph examination to Mr. Berger to question him about the extent of his thievery. This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead up to the terrorist attacks on the United States," Davis wrote.

The letter was signed by all Republican members of Congress.

Berger admitted to taking documents on two of the four occasions he went to the National Archives to bone up on his responses for the Sept. 11 commission on his inquiry into how intelligence and law enforcement communities failed to prevent the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks on the United States. He said he hid some of them at a construction site near the archives building in Washington.

Berger agreed to take a polygraph test as part of a plea deal reached in September 2005. As part of the guilty plea, he was also sentenced to 100 hours of community service, two years probation, three years of lost security clearance and a $50,000 fine plus court costs.

A report issued two weeks ago by Davis said commission members expressed grave concerns about whether they had received all the relevant information on the Clinton administration's anti-terror activities. Archivists said they will never know what Berger took because none of the pages Berger said he took were inventoried.

At the time of the report, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Added Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Berger attorney Lanny Breuer: "I can state unequivocally that no documents were withheld, and that all documents that Mr. Berger took were disclosed to the Justice Department and the inspector general of the archives."

But Davis and the other lawmakers said the Justice Department's investigation is incomplete and two Justice Department officials confirmed that a polygraph was never administered despite the department being given the authority to do so.

Former State Official Gets 1 Year Over Documents (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

A former high-level State Department official was sentenced to a year in prison yesterday for keeping more than 3,500 classified documents at his Fairfax County home and concealing his relationship with a Taiwanese intelligence agent.

Prosecutors said Donald W. Keyser possessed far more unauthorized classified documents than any government employee ever prosecuted by the Justice Department. Keyser, 63, is one of the nation's leading experts on China and was a top adviser to Colin L. Powell, former secretary of state.

Yesterday, the government that Keyser served for three decades as a Foreign Service officer said his actions endangered national security. Keyser "allowed himself to be seduced by a female intelligence officer for a foreign government," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman said as he urged a sentence of 18 to 24 months. "This case is about abuse of the public trust, reckless disregard for the government's secrets and reckless disregard for the truth."

Keyser's attorney, Robert S. Litt, recommended a sentence of probation, calling the case "the classic Greek tragedy of a great man brought down by his tragic flaws." But U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria sentenced Keyser to a year and a day in prison. "You said you were just careless," the judge told the former diplomat. "I think the government correctly points out that you did this purposefully."

The sentencing did little to resolve the lingering mystery surrounding the downfall of Keyser, which stunned the Washington diplomatic establishment. When he was first charged in September 2004, the FBI said he had passed documents to Taiwanese agents during covert meetings in the Washington area.

But court papers filed with Keyser's guilty plea in December 2005 did not mention passing any documents, and law enforcement and diplomatic sources said at the time that the case did not involve espionage but rather a government employee who became careless. Keyser pleaded guilty to unlawfully removing classified documents and two counts of making false statements. He admitted to having a "personal relationship" with the Taiwanese agent, Isabelle Cheng, and meeting her on a trip to Taiwan in 2003, a trip he concealed from his supervisors.

Prosecutors later tried to void Keyser's plea agreement, saying he wasn't fully cooperating. They withdrew the motion in December.

Keyser said yesterday that he had only been trying to create a channel of information to Taiwanese intelligence to ensure that the message of U.S. policy toward Taiwan was getting through. "What I was doing was to further U.S. interests. It was not to further Taiwan's interests," he told Ellis. "I know that some people believe that I was some kind of agent. I want to stress in the strongest possible terms that I was not."

Laufman questioned Keyser's explanations, saying it was "curious" that Keyser never mentioned his planned outreach to Taiwanese intelligence to his supervisors.

But prosecutors offered no alternative explanation. "Your honor, we may never really know why Donald Keyser committed the acts that bring him before this court," Laufman concluded.

Former U.S. Diplomat Gets Year In Prison For Taiwan Affair (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- A former top State Department official was sentenced to a year in prison Monday for mishandling classified documents and concealing his relationship with a female intelligence officer from Taiwan.

Donald W. Keyser, 63, of Fairfax, had been the second-ranking official in the State Department's Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs before retiring in 2004.

Prosecutors at one point considered bringing espionage-related charges against Keyser but eventually settled on a plea bargain involving lesser counts--making false official statements and unlawful removal of classified documents from the State Department.

At his sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court, Keyser admitted to egregiously bad judgment in striking up a personal relationship with 35-year-old Isabelle Cheng, a known intelligence officer with Taiwan's National Intelligence Bureau whom he first met in 2002.

But Keyser rejected any accusation that he was acting as an agent of Taiwan or that he compromised U.S. interests.

"Ms. Cheng ... never sought from me or received from me any unauthorized information," Keyser said.

Prosecutors never charged Keyser with disclosing classified information to Taiwan, but it was clear from Monday's hearing that they remain suspicious of his activities. Court records indicate that Keyser failed polygraph tests when he was quizzed about a secret trip he took to Taiwan in September 2003 to meet Cheng.

Keyser's refusal to disclose this trip to his superiors, along with his failure to disclose his relationship with Cheng, formed the basis for his conviction on making false statements.

Keyser "exposed himself to compromise and blackmail by hostile intelligence services," prosecutor David Laufman said during the hearing. "We may never know why Donald Keyser committed the acts which bring him here today."

Although much of the evidence in the case is under seal, prosecutors were particularly concerned about e-mails Keyser sent to Cheng suggesting that one U.S. official was "ripe for recruitment" and that another individual was "a rare orchid to be cultivated and nurtured," presumably for recruitment as a spy.

Keyser and his lawyer, Robert Litt, said the government was misconstruing the e-mails.

Prosecutors had sought a sentence of 18 to 24 months, while Litt urged Judge T.S. Ellis III to sentence Keyser to probation.

Jail Sentence For Diplomat In Spy Case (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — A longtime high-ranking official at the State Department was sentenced to just over a year in jail yesterday for keeping thousands of classified documents at his home and for lying about his personal relationship with a younger Taiwanese diplomat.

In late 2005, the former deputy chief of the State Department's East Asian and Pacific Affairs Bureau, Donald Keyser, pleaded guilty to three felony charges stemming from an investigation into his contacts with the Taiwanese agent, Isabelle Cheng.

Judge Thomas Ellis of Alexandria, Va., imposed the sentence after a lengthy hearing yesterday. According to court records, the judge ordered Keyser to spend a year and a day in jail and two years on supervised release, and to pay a fine of $25,000.

Keyser had asked not to be sent to jail. He submitted a sheaf of letters from former colleagues praising him for his selfless devotion to America during more than three decades in the Foreign Service.

" Mr. Keyser had an absolute obligation to safeguard the classified information entrusted to him and utterly failed to do so. His sentence of imprisonment is a warning to others in positions of public trust," the U.S. attorney overseeing the case, Chuck Rosenberg, said in a written statement.

Keyser's sentencing was delayed repeatedly after prosecutors accused him of failing to keep his promise to cooperate in debriefings with the FBI. They also alleged that polygraph tests showed that Keyser was not telling the government the full truth about what transpired.

'Girls Gone Wild' Producer Gets Heavier-than-expected Sentence (LAT)

By Claire Hoffman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The community service is piling up for "Girls Gone Wild" mogul Joe Francis.

The producer of racy videos featuring young — and often naked — women was sentenced today to 200 hours of community service over two years by a federal judge in Los Angeles and was placed on two years probation for failing to adequately document the ages of his subjects. The amount of time was double what Francis' lawyers had sought.

The heavier-than-expected sentence is the second time that a federal judge has come down hard in sentencing Francis. In December, in Panama City, Fla., a federal judge sentenced Francis' company Mantra Films Inc. to serve 32 hours of monthly community service for 30 months.

The sentencing stems from a plea agreement Francis made with the Department of Justice in September, when he admitted to shooting underage women in his videos and pleaded guilty to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws.

Those laws govern the way in which producers of adult material document the ages of performers in sexually explicit videos and are intended to hinder the sexual exploitation of children.

In addition, Francis has greed to pay $500,000 in fines in California, with his company paying an additional $1.6 million in fines in Florida in a related case.

U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak in Panama City, Fla. said at the time that the financial burden of the agreed upon fines would make little impact on the wealthy 33-year-old entrepreneur. Smoak asked Francis to shoulder the majority of the time served in Florida. Francis attorney Aaron Dyer said he had appealed the community service sentence.

Outside the courthouse, Francis said he was relieved the process was over and that he now felt free to say that he had been unfairly persecuted by the Justice Department.

"Of course I've been unfairly targeted by the government," Francis said. "What better target than Joe Francis?"

Judges Cannot Add Years To Prisoners' Sentences, High Court Rules (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court today struck down a part of California's 30-year-old sentencing law, which allows judges to add several years to a criminal's prison term.

The ruling could mean new sentencing hearings for several thousand state prisoners who were recently given longer terms. If their sentences are still being appealed, they can take advantage of today's ruling.

But the decision does not necessarily mean they will get lighter sentences.

Indeed, the Supreme Court's interest was not in whether prison terms are too long or too short, but rather how they are decided.

In a 6-3 ruling, the justices said California's sentencing law is flawed because it promises defendants a "middle term" prison term when they have been convicted of a crime, but it then allows judges to impose a much longer term based on "facts" decided by the judge alone. This extra prison time violates the defendant's right to a trial by jury, the court said.

Paradoxically, the solution may be to give judges even more authority to decide on a prison sentence, the high court said.

"The ball lies in California's court," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, apparently referring to the state Supreme Court. It could follow the lead of other states and "call upon the jury — either at trial or in a separate sentencing proceeding — to find any fact necessary to the imposition of an elevated sentence," she said.

Or it could do the opposite and "permit judges genuinely to exercise broad discretion with a statutory range" to impose a sentence, she said.

This curious result is the latest in a series of rulings in this decade in which the high court, though badly divided, has sought to readjust the balance between judges and juries when it comes to deciding prison sentences.

An odd coalition of its liberal and conservative blocs, led by Justices John Paul Stevens and Antonin Scalia, has moved to strike down sentences that were imposed based on facts found by the trial judges, not the jury.

In a New Jersey case, a defendant pleaded guilty to firing a shot into his neighbor's house, a crime with a 10-year maximum prison term. However, the judge sentenced the defendant, Charles Apprendi, to 12 years in prison after finding it was a racially motivated hate crime.

In a 5-4 decision in 2000, the court struck down the extra two years of prison time, saying the jury should have decided whether this behavior was a hate crime.

Since then, the court has struggled to decide whether this principle applies to midterm sentences, not just those that exceed the legal maximum for the crime.

The California case split the two new appointees. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. joined the Scalia-Stevens bloc to say California's system is flawed. Also joining the ruling were Justices David H. Souter and Clarence Thomas.

Meanwhile, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. spoke for the dissenters. He noted that the Supreme Court, with Ginsburg in the majority, had upheld the federal sentencing system two years ago by concluding its guidelines were advisory, not mandatory.

California's system is quite similar, he said. "The California sentencing law that the court strikes down today is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect from the advisory guideline scheme (in the federal system) that the court approved" two years ago, Alito said.

Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer voted with Alito.

In a separate dissent, Kennedy explained the difficulty of applying the court's new rule. Juries can decide some facts, such as whether a weapon was used or whether a large quantity of drugs was involved, he said. California's law refers to these facts as "sentence enhancements," and jurors are called upon to decide these facts.

But other facts are subjective. For example, did the defendant show remorse or cooperate with the prosecutors? "These are facts that should be taken into account at sentencing," but it makes sense for them to be "found by the judge," Kennedy wrote.

Prior to 1977, California's law set a maximum prison term for each crime and allowed judges and parole officials to decide how long a criminal would stay behind bars.

The new law replaced those open-ended prison terms with more precisely defined crimes and prison terms. For each crime, the law sets a lower, middle and upper term sentence.

The law also said the judge "shall order imposition of the middle term," unless the judge decides certain "aggravating circumstances" call for the upper term. Ginsburg pointed to this "shall order" mandate as the flaw that makes California's system unconstitutional.

DOJ_NMG_0120213

Today's ruling, in Cunningham vs. California, could mean a slightly shorter sentence for a Northern California man who was convicted of sexually abusing his child over several years.

This crime had a middle term of 12 years in prison, but the judge imposed the upper term of 16 years after finding the defendant was violent, a danger to the community and had perpetrated his crime against a vulnerable child.

In another California case, the court today refused to hear appeals from a former Carson official who was sentenced to 41 months in prison for federal corruption charges.

Roderick Keith McDonald, who served three terms on the West Basin Municipal Water District board, argued that federal prosecutors tried him in Orange County instead of Los Angeles County to keep blacks off the jury. McDonald, who is black, is the son of Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Torrance). She was not implicated in the crime.

The court, which has never ruled on whether a trial's venue could violate a defendant's constitutional right to due process, declined to take up the case. McDonald had enlisted former Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr and Eric Holder, who served in the Clinton Justice Department, to argue his case.

McDonald was convicted on 10 counts, including conspiracy to commit extortion, bribery and money laundering. Jurors acquitted McDonald on one count of mail fraud, two counts each of bribery and money laundering and told the judge they were split on eight counts.

Prosecutors said McDonald gave bribes to Carson City Council members for approving contracts. His sentence runs to Dec. 31, 2008.

In court filings, his lawyers argued that prosecutors moved his trial to Orange County, where the jury pool is only 2% African American, and not for the other Carson officials ensnared in the corruption case.

Ruling's Effect On California Inmates Is Probably Limited (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 22 — The Supreme Court decision on Monday that invalidated California's criminal sentencing law would probably affect only a small slice of the state's convicted felon population.

Over 90 percent of criminal cases here are resolved in plea agreements, which would be immune to challenges. Further, felons sentenced to life terms and those convicted under the state's three-strikes law would not be able to argue for an adjusted sentence.

But in a state with 173,000 inmates, thousands could be affected, lawmakers and criminal justice experts said, as they worked to puzzle out what the court's ruling meant and how to address it legislatively.

"We are very disappointed today," David LaBahn, the executive director of the California District Attorneys Association, said of the court's decision that the 30-year-old sentencing law gave judges authority that the Constitution places with juries. Mr. LaBahn added that prosecutors in the state would now move to force jury trials over plea bargains in some criminal cases.

"Will that slow down the trials?" Mr. LaBahn said, "Yes it will. Will there be arguments between prosecutors and defense lawyers over bifurcating the trial and sentencing portion? Yes. Some judges are going to be grumpy because it will add court days, but our folks will do what is right and just."

The ruling comes at a time when the state's Legislature is trying to come up with a solution to the problem of crowding in the state's prisons. Both Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Senate majority leader have proposed establishing a sentencing commission to address the issue.

The governor issued a statement saying that his office was trying to determine the impact of the ruling, adding: "I support longer sentences for criminals who deserve them. As governor, I will work to ensure that this decision will not be a threat to public safety."

Calif. Criminal Sentencing Law Tossed (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

DOJ_NMG_0120214

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court struck down California's criminal sentencing law Monday, saying it violated defendants' right to a jury trial by giving judges too much power to toughen sentences. The decision could require new sentences for thousands of convicts in the nation's largest state prison system.

The 6-3 ruling in the case of a California man who sexually abused his son reflects a seven-year trend in which the high court has limited judges' discretion in sentencing. The ruling ensures that juries, not judges, determine any aggravating factors, such as the viciousness of the act or the vulnerability of a victim, that increase prison time.

"This court has repeatedly held that … any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by a jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the majority.

The court's previous decisions on the issue were decided by a five-justice majority, with then-chief justice William Rehnquist regularly dissenting. On Monday, Chief Justice John Roberts, who joined the court after Rehnquist's death in 2005, voted with the majority to produce a six-justice bloc favoring limits on judges' authority.

At least nine states have changed their sentencing laws to meet the Supreme Court's jury requirement, which was most firmly established in a 2004 decision.

"It's possible that thousands of cases would have to be retried for the enhanced sentence," said California Attorney General Jerry Brown, who was governor in 1977 when the state's sentencing law took effect.

John Cunningham was convicted in 2003 of continuous sexual abuse of a child under 14. His son had lived with the boy's mother for his early years, then moved in with Cunningham and Cunningham's girlfriend when he was 10.

Under California's three-tier sentencing scheme, the crime warranted one of three terms — six, 12 or 16 years — depending on its severity. In Cunningham's case, the rules dictated that the judge sentence him to 12 years unless the judge found additional aggravating factors, such as great bodily harm to the victim. The judge gave Cunningham a 16-year sentence.

The sentence was upheld by a state appeals court, but Ginsburg said the four-year increase in Cunningham's sentence violated his Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial.

The justices rejected arguments by California officials that the state's sentencing system was flexible like the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines the justices narrowly upheld in 2005. Seven months earlier, in June 2004, the high court had invalidated a Washington state sentencing regime and cast doubt on several systems that allowed judges to determine aggravating factors.

As to how the California system can be fixed, Ginsburg wrote, "the ball lies in California's court."

Ginsburg said California can now have the jury find any facts necessary for a tougher sentence — as seven states have done — or write new legislation that gives judges broad discretion within a statutory range, which at least two states have done.

Dissenting were Justices Anthony Kennedy, Stephen Breyer and Samuel Alito.

Court Constrains Judges' Power In Sentencing (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The Supreme Court invalidated California's criminal sentencing law on Monday, ruling that the 30-year-old statute gave judges authority that the Constitution places with juries.

The 6-to-3 decision will require the California courts to reconsider thousands of sentences as the Legislature contemplates its options for amending the statute to meet the justices' objections.

While no other state is directly affected, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's forcefully worded majority opinion demonstrated that the Roberts court is committed to carrying out the full implications of the revolution in criminal sentencing that the court began seven years ago in Apprendi v. New Jersey.

In fact, with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. joining the majority, the court planted its stake more firmly than ever in what criminal law scholars and practitioners have taken to referring to as Apprendi-land.

That decision invalidated New Jersey's hate-crime statute, which gave judges the power to make the specific factual findings that converted an ordinary crime into a hate crime, with an enhanced sentence. The court ruled that the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury gave that role to juries.

That decision was followed four years later by Blakely v. Washington, which invalidated Washington's sentencing guidelines for giving judges the power to impose sentences beyond the normal range based on specific findings about the defendant's conduct.

And two years ago, in United States v. Booker, the court applied that reasoning to the federal sentencing guidelines, ruling that the guidelines could be deemed constitutional only if they were regarded as "advisory" rather than mandatory.

All three cases were decided by 5-to-4 margins, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist a consistent dissenter from the court's Sixth Amendment analysis.

So Chief Justice Roberts's vote with the majority on Monday strengthened the court's Apprendi majority, which cuts across the court's normal ideological lines and in addition to Justice Ginsburg consists of Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, David H. Souter and Clarence Thomas.

Writing the principal dissenting opinion on Monday, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. stepped into the shoes of his predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a strong dissenter from all the Apprendi cases. Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer also dissented.

Douglas A. Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University and a leading authority on sentencing, said the decision confirmed the Supreme Court as "the most liberal, pro-defendant court in the country on sentencing procedure."

The California law represented an early legislative effort to make sentences more uniform and predictable, an effort that Congress picked up when it adopted the federal guidelines system in 1984. Under California's previous system, judges imposed open-ended sentences, often one year to life, and left it to the parole board to determine the time an offender would actually serve.

The 1977 law adopted what is known as a determinate-sentencing approach. Each crime carried three possible sentences. The middle sentence was presumed to be the correct one unless the judge made findings that justified the higher or lower alternatives.

As the Supreme Court proceeded with the Apprendi cases, the California law looked increasingly vulnerable.

In the case the court decided on Monday, the law was challenged by a former police officer, John Cunningham, who was convicted of sexually abusing his young son and who received the longest of the three sentences, 16 years as opposed to the other options, 12 and 6 years.

The judge found that six aggravating factors, including the victim's vulnerability and the defendant's violent conduct, merited the highest sentence.

The California Court of Appeal upheld the sentence, ruling that the Sixth Amendment concerns were satisfied as long as the judge issued a sentence within the statutory range, in this instance 6 to 16 years.

That was not the correct analysis, Justice Ginsburg said in her majority opinion, Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551. She said the California law presented the judge not with a range, but with a "triad." The judge "had no discretion to select a sentence within a range of 6 to 16 years," Justice Ginsburg continued, adding:

"His instruction was to select 12 years, nothing less and nothing more, unless he found facts allowing the imposition of a sentence of 6 or 16 years. Factfinding to elevate a sentence from 12 to 16 years, our decisions make plain, falls within the province of the jury."

The California sentencing law, Justice Ginsburg concluded, "violates Apprendi's bright-line rule."

In his dissent, Justice Alito said that, to the contrary, the California system was "not meaningfully different" from the remedy the court endorsed, with Justice Ginsburg's concurrence, two years ago in the Booker case, on the federal sentencing guidelines.

By rendering the federal sentencing guidelines advisory, Justice Alito said, the court in the Booker case necessarily gave judges discretion to make factual findings to support their choice of sentence, a choice the court made subject to appellate review for "reasonableness."

Therefore, he said, the Booker decision "necessarily stands for the proposition that it is consistent with the Sixth Amendment for the imposition of an enhanced sentence to be conditioned on a factual finding made by a sentencing judge and not by a jury."

Next month in Rita v. United States, No. 06-5754, the court will hear arguments on whether a federal sentence within the guidelines range should be presumed to be reasonable.

Supreme Court Strikes Down California's Sentencing Law (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court yesterday struck down California's sentencing law and strongly reaffirmed the court's view that judges may not impose tough prison time based on factors that have not been determined by a jury.

The 6 to 3 decision orders California to overhaul its method of sentencing criminal defendants, which could mean shorter prison terms for thousands of state prisoners. For other states and the federal government, it was the latest in a series of rulings going back to 2000 that restrict a judge's ability to find the aggravating factors that would allow for tougher sentences.

"This court has repeatedly held that, under the Sixth Amendment, any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by the jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the majority.

It was a majority that gives credence to the justices' often-made complaint about attempts to peg them as either liberal or conservative.

The prevailing side in Cunningham v. California consisted of Ginsburg, Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia, John Paul Stevens and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. The newest justice, Samuel A. Alito Jr., wrote a dissent that was joined by Stephen G. Breyer and Anthony M. Kennedy, who also filed a separate dissent.

Roberts's decision to join the majority is especially important, according to Marquette University law professor Michael O'Hear and others who follow criminal justice issues; his predecessor, William H. Rehnquist, was on the other side. "Roberts's acceptance of jury-trial rights" means a solid majority exists for the future, O'Hear said.

The court's move began with Apprendi v. New Jersey, in which a 5 to 4 majority said that "any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."

The court expanded the finding in a 2004 ruling regarding the state of Washington, and in 2005 the court found federal mandatory-sentencing laws unconstitutional. The court held that to remedy the system, the mandatory guidelines must become advisory and appellate courts must review them for reasonableness.

Alito argued that California's law met the standards the court had set for the federal system. "The California sentencing law that the court strikes down today is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect" from the remedy the court offered in 2005, Alito wrote.

From the beginning, Kennedy and Breyer have opposed the court's resistance to systems that allow judicial discretion.

The debate may seem procedural rather than substantive, but the case that arrived at the court shows the impact.

Police officer John Cunningham was convicted in 2003 of molesting his young son, who had come to live with him and his girlfriend. Under California's Determinate Sentencing Law, Cunningham's crime was punishable by six, 12 or 16 years in prison. The law said that Cunningham should receive the middle term unless the judge found one or more "circumstances in aggravation."

The judge found six aggravating circumstances, including violent conduct, the boy's vulnerability and threats he made against his son. The only thing that the judge found in Cunningham's favor was that he had never been arrested before; he was sentenced to 16 years.

"We reserve that disposition because the four-year sentence elevation, based solely on a judge's fact-finding, denied Cunningham his Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury," Ginsburg read from the bench.

As for a remedy, Ginsburg said, "the ball lies in California's court." She noted that some states have responded to the court's rulings by amending their determinate sentencing laws to involve the jury in finding any facts that could elevate the sentence. Others have "chosen to permit judges to genuinely exercise broad discretion within a statutory range . . . without a mandatory middle," she said.

The court yesterday also unanimously struck down a lower court's decision that made it harder for prisoners to bring lawsuits alleging mistreatment. Jones v. Bock is one of many cases arising from the federal Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 to cut down on prisoner lawsuits.

Supreme Court Rejects California Sentencing Law (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 23, 2007

The Supreme Court on Monday struck down California's sentencing law because it gives judges too much power to increase sentences based on facts not found by the jury.

The 6-3 ruling in California v. Cunningham may throw into uncertainty a segment of recent sentences imposed in California under the state's 1977 sentencing law.

"California has some work to do, but it should not cause havoc in the courts," says Stanford Law School professor Jeffrey Fisher, who wrote a brief in the case for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and is a key strategist in challenges to sentencing laws. Fisher said defendants on direct review should get a "fresh look" at their sentences as a result of the ruling Monday.

The decision also signals that the newly constituted Roberts Court is committed to the Apprendi line of cases, which, since 2000, have recalibrated the balance between judges and juries in the sentencing process and upended both state and federal sentencing laws. In Apprendi v. New Jersey, the Court held that any fact that increases a sentence beyond certain parameters set forth in the sentencing statute must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt.

"Because the [California law] authorizes the judge, not the jury, to find the facts permitting an upper-term sentence, the system cannot withstand measurement against our Sixth Amendment precedents," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the majority.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. voted with the majority upholding the Apprendi precedents, whereas his predecessor William Rehnquist opposed the recent sentencing decisions. Justice Samuel Alito Jr. dissented Monday, as his predecessor Sandra Day O'Connor probably would have. Justice Anthony Kennedy, joined by Justice Stephen Breyer, also dissented, asserting, "In my view, the Apprendi line of cases remains incorrect."

At issue Monday was the case of John Cunningham, convicted in 2003 of repeatedly molesting his son. Under the law, his offense carried a prison term of six, 12 or 16 years. The judge is obliged to pick the middle sentence unless he can find aggravating circumstances justifying the upper level. In Cunningham's case, the judge found six aggravating circumstances and gave Cunningham the higher sentence. California appeals courts upheld the higher sentence, setting the stage for Supreme Court review.

Ginsburg's ruling did not specify how California should repair its sentencing law, but it pointed to a dozen other states that have modified their sentencing laws to respond to the Apprendi precedents. Some have placed more of the fact-finding with the jury, while others have given judges discretion within a statutory range.

"California may follow the paths taken by its sister states or otherwise alter its system, so long as the state observes Sixth Amendment limitations declared in this Court's decisions," Ginsburg wrote.

Former California Attorney General John Van de Kamp, of counsel at Dewey Ballantine, says the ruling "will certainly spark a lot of debate on overall sentencing policies in California." But he says the ruling will actually affect only a small number of criminal cases in the state.

Supreme Court's Striking Down Of California Sentencing Law Could Mean Shorter Prison Sentences (AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The U.S. Supreme Court struck down California's sentencing law Monday, reaffirming limits on judges' discretion and presaging shorter sentences for thousands of state prisoners.

DOJ_NMG_0120218

The 6-3 ruling effectively shaves four years off the 16-year sentence of former police officer John Cunningham, who was convicted of sexually abusing his son.

It is the latest in a series of high court rulings over the past seven years that limit judges' discretion in sentencing defendants. The court has held repeatedly that a judge may not increase a defendant's sentence based on factors that were not determined by a jury.

"This court has repeatedly held that, under the Sixth Amendment, any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by the jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the court, referring to an article in the U.S. Constitution.

Several states have changed their sentencing laws to require prosecutors to prove to a jury aggravating factors that could lead to longer sentences.

California had argued that a 2005 state Supreme Court decision interpreting the state's Determinate Sentencing Law effectively brought the state into compliance with the U.S. high court's rulings. The law instructs judges to sentence inmates to the middle of three options, unless factors exist that justify the shorter or longer prison term.

The state warned that its criminal justice system would be burdened by having to re-sentence thousands of inmates.

Rather than prescribing a way to fix the law, Ginsburg said, "The ball lies in California's court."

Justice Samuel Alito said in dissent that California's law "is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect" from the federal sentencing guidelines that have been approved by the Supreme Court.

There were just under a quarter-million felony convictions in the state in 2005. Data from the 1980s cited by the California Supreme Court suggests that roughly 15 percent of cases involving just one felony count result in sentences in which a judge, not a jury, finds an aggravating factor to justify the additional punishment.

But Peter Gold, Cunningham's lawyer, told the court that in many cases the standard term and longer option differ by just a year. In practical terms, many of those who might be affected by Wednesday's ruling might already have finished serving their time in prison.

Several justices suggested during oral argument in October that the state could tweak the law, rather than overhaul it, to remove constitutional violations.

Nine other states urged the court to uphold the California law.

Letting Juries Judge (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT on Monday overturned the 16-year prison sentence of a former California police officer convicted of molesting his 10-year-old son. Much as Californians may resent this ruling, which comes in a heinous case and could potentially trigger challenges to thousands of sentences, we should have seen it coming.

In theory, there's a neat division of labor between judges and juries in criminal trials. Juries decide whether a defendant did the crime; judges decide whether the defendant will do the time, and how much.

In reality, judges over the years have engaged in some serious fact-finding of their own in deciding how much punishment to mete out — too much fact-finding, in the view of the 21st century Supreme Court. In a series of decisions beginning in 2000, the high court has ruled that any fact connected to a crime that leads to a higher sentence "must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."

John Cunningham of Contra Costa County, who won his appeal Monday, received 16 rather than the prescribed 12 years in prison because of aggravating factors, including the "great violence" of his conduct. Those findings were made not by a jury but by a judge, as provided for in California's 1977 Uniform Determinate Sentencing Act. Writing for the court, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg reasoned that because California law "authorizes the judge, not the jury, to find the facts permitting an upper-term sentence, the system cannot withstand measurement against our 6th Amendment precedent."

In their last major pronouncement in this area in 2005, the justices, while striking down mandatory federal sentencing rules, said that such guidelines could nevertheless remain on the books if they were used as an "advisory" resource for judges. But on Monday, six of nine justices rejected the argument that the rules that produced Cunningham's higher sentence fell into that same flexible category.

Like its previous recent decisions on judicial sentencing, the ruling leaves both legislatures and judges considerable leeway. Legislatures can still establish minimum and maximum sentences, and judges (if state law allows) can choose a particular sentence based on characteristics of the perpetrator, including previous convictions.

But it is clearer than ever that if sentencing depends on the particular facts of the crime, then it is up to the jury, not the judge, to make that call.

Feds: Prison Cost-cutter Took Bribes (OREG)

By ASHBEL S. GREEN

The Oregonian, January 23, 2007

Allegations - Agents link the food purchaser for Oregon corrections to a four-year kickback scheme

Federal agents found more than $450,000 in cash in the home and safety deposit box of an Oregon prison official accused of taking bribes from companies that sell food for inmates' meals and snacks.

Farhad "Fred" Monem, who earns $75,500 a year as the food service administrator for the Oregon Department of Corrections, was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his home and office Jan. 10.

A federal judge Friday unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme and detail what agents discovered during their searches.

Monem's lawyer declined to comment Monday. No charges have been filed against Monem or others allegedly involved.

Federal prosecutors declined to discuss a timeline for arrests in the bribery scheme, which they allege included Monem's wife, Karen, and officials from food distributors and brokers in California, New York and Maryland.

Monem, 48, was considered a whiz kid at the prison system, credited with saving the state millions of dollars because of his shrewd working of the commodities market. Prison officials praised Monem for reducing the daily cost of prison food from $2.88 to $2.30, third lowest in the nation.

One food broker praised Monem's business savvy in a March 2002 profile in The Oregonian.

"He'll let you earn a living, but you're not going to get rich off him," said Doug Levene of 21st Century Supply.

Levene, who could not be reached for comment Monday, is one of several food industry officials accused in federal court records of taking part in a bribery scheme that included splashy Las Vegas casino meetings, a junket to a football game in Chicago between the Bears and the Green Bay Packers and the creation of a shell company allegedly controlled by Karen Monem.

Court records single out Levin & Lawrence, Inc., a wholesale food distributor based in Santa Clarita, Calif. The company buys bulk food, some of it labeled "distressed" because it was close to the expiration date, marks it up and resells it for a profit.

Ex-cons Duped Secretary In Coke Case, Lawyer Says But Feds Say Facts Show She Was In Cahoots With Accomplices (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 23, 2007

Prosecutors opened their case in the Coke secrets trial Monday by vowing to prove that former secretary Joya Williams conspired with two accomplices to try to sell product samples and confidential documents for more than $1 million.

"This case is about greed and poor choices," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Chartash.

But Williams' defense attorney, Janice Singer, said her client was taken advantage of by two lying ex-cons.

She said Williams copied and took home various work materials for innocent reasons and never intended for them to fall into the hands of the alleged accomplices.

One of them, Edmond Duhaney of Decatur, who is testifying for the prosecution, took the stand for a short time Monday before the court broke for lunch. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy in October and hasn't been sentenced. His testimony is expected to resume later Monday.

According to prosecutors, here's how the case unfolded:

An executive at archrival PepsiCo got a letter in May 2006 from someone named Dirk, who said he had four years' worth of detailed marketing records from Coke.

Dirk said the "very detailed and confidential information" would "ensure your company gains a very decisive position in the cola wars." The letter said some of the information involved Coke Blak, a new Coke-infused coffee product introduced by the company last year.

The letter writer said he would offer proof for free that he had valuable information but that PepsiCo better be ready to act fast.

PepsiCo faxed the letter to Coke executives, who contacted the FBI on May 24, 2006.

An undercover FBI agent posing as a PepsiCo go-between called the phone number listed for Dirk and reached Ibrahim Dimson, a New York resident. The agent negotiated to pay Dimson what amounted to a $5,000 deposit on June 8.

Dimson told the agent he had a product sample and they negotiated a $75,000 payment — $30,000 up front and $45,000 after the product was delivered.

By June 12, Coke had set up a camera at Williams' work station to record her movements. She worked as an administrative assistant for a marketing executive at Coke, scheduling his appointments and managing logistics for him. She also had access to his e-mails, prosecutors said.

On June 16, Dimson met with the agent at Hartsfield-Jackson Airport to make the exchange. The agent passed Dimson $30,000 in a Girl Scout Lemon Cooler cookie box. Dimson passed the sample in an Armani bag.

The next day, Duhaney got $8,000 from Dimson. He kept $2,000 and gave $6,000 to Williams. She deposited $4,000 into her bank account two days later.

On June 19, the camera at Williams' work station captured her putting a product sample in her bag. She also printed three copies of a an e-mail from her boss's account with the codename "project normandie."

On June 22, Dimson gave the undercover agent a list of documents he said he had from Coke. The two negotiated a $1.5 million payment. Dimson provided a bank account for a trucking business he set up.

A few days later, Williams was recorded taking more documents from Coke in a Staples box that was later found at Duhaney's house.

On June 29, the agent paid Dimson $10,000 through a wire transfer. Dimson then wrote a check to withdraw the money.

Dimson was arrested July 5 at a Marriot hotel near Perimeter Mall. Agents searched the homes of Williams, Dimson and Duhaney.

Prosecutors say the plot started in Nov. 2005, when Williams asked family friend Edmond Duhaney to come to her Norcross apartment. There he showed her stacks of documents from Coke. She told Duhaney she couldn't sell the documents because she signed a confidentiality agreement, but that Duhaney could, prosectors allege.

Duhaney, a convicted cocaine dealer, shopped the documents around but no one was interested until he reached Dimson, a man he had met in prison in Alabama.

Dimson, who served time for white collar fraud, flew to Atlanta to see the documents. The two then conspired with Williams to organize and sell the materials.

Defense attorney Singer, appointed by the court to defend Williams, told jurors that Duhaney and Dimson plotted the conspiracy behind Williams' back. She said Williams was taken advantage of by two "seasoned cons."

Singer said Duhaney had asked Williams for help with his resume, and during a visit to her apartment he saw the boxes of Coke documents.

"He saw an opportunity and began hatching his scheme," Singer said of Duhaney.

Singer said Williams, who grew up in Decatur and has a business degree from Georgia State University, was in her dream job. But health problems and demands of the job took their toll. Williams' performance was "forgetful" and flighty" and she wasn't getting her work done, Singer said, adding that co-workers and her boss took notice and she feared being fired.

Williams began copying every document and e-mail she touched to prove she was doing her job, Singer said. She didn't copy them to give to Duhaney or Dimson, Singer insisted.

Singer said Williams carried out materials in plain view and pointed out with surveillance tapes that her desk was in plain view of other workers.

Singer said when Duhaney saw the documents, he brought in Dimson to look at them because of his business experience.

Dimson then began romancing Williams, Singer said. Duhaney also convinced Williams to let Duhaney stay with her while he got back on his feet. It was a pretense to get access to the Coke documents, Singer said.

"At no time did Joya give these two cons anything," Singer told the jury.

Coke Espionage Case Moves On (WXIA)

By Jon Shirek

WXIA-TV, January 23, 2007

A government witness testified in Atlanta on Monday that a Coca-Cola employee stole secret documents from company headquarters, then recruited him to try to sell the documents to rival Pepsi.

But the now-former Coke employee blames her accuser, and insists she had nothing to do with any of it.

The former Coke employee who is on trial is Joya Williams. She could go to prison for up to ten years if she's convicted of the single count against her -- conspiring to steal and sell Coke's trade secrets.

In court, the prosecutor said that the case against Williams is a case about greed.

The prosecutor, Randy Chartash, showed the jury surveillance photos of Joya Williams at her desk at Coke's headquarters in Atlanta last year -- taken after the FBI began investigating her -- showing Williams filling her personal bag with company documents, and with bottles of brand new Coca-Cola drinks that were in development.

Then the jury heard a family friend of Williams, Edmund Duhaney, testify that Williams invited him to her apartment a year ago and showed him the Coke secrets that she had taken piled on her coffee table.

He said she told him the material would be worth a lot of money to Coke's competitors, such as Pepsi, and she needed his help.

So, Duhaney testified, he and another man, Ibrahim Dimson, launched a scheme to write a Pepsi executive that they had "very detailed and confidential information about Coca Cola's marketing campaigns for the next 4 years."

And they offered to sell the secrets to the highest bidder -- never knowing that Pepsi told Coke about the letter, Coke told the FBI, and the FBI set up the sting that led to the arrests last summer of Williams and the two men.

The two men pleaded guilty.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, told the jury that Williams was always taking work home with her, including confidential Coke documents and other items, all openly, in full view of Coke security -- nothing sinister about any of it.

Not in any way, shape or form, Singer said, was Williams ever involved with the two men to steal Coke secrets and sell them.

The men stole the confidential material from Williams' apartment, Singer said, and then blamed Williams when they got caught.

The government's evidence against Williams involves and includes the Coke secrets she is accused of trying to sell. So Coca-Cola has several attorneys sitting in the courtroom, conferring with prosecutors and with the judge, to make sure no Coca-Cola company secrets are disclosed in open court, but only to the jury.

The trial is expected to last up to two weeks.

Secretary Stole Coke Secrets, Jurors Told (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 23, 2007

ATLANTA · A former secretary at The Coca-Cola Co. was angry at her employer for not treating her well and hatched a plan to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker to sell to rival PepsiCo Inc., a co-defendant testified Monday at the woman's conspiracy trial.

Edmund Duhaney, who pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to testify, told jurors that Joya Williams said the documents and product samples -- which include information about the company's new coffee-infused drink, Coca-Cola Blak -- could be worth a lot of money to a competitor.

"She made a statement, `This happens all the time in corporate America' -- that Pepsi, the rival company, would be interested in this," Duhaney said, recalling an April 2006 meeting with Williams and another co-defendant, Ibrahim Dimson.

Duhaney also testified that Williams was angry at the world's largest beverage maker.

"She felt she wasn't being treated right at her job," Duhaney said. He added, "She let it be known that, `People think I'm stupid, but I'm not stupid.'"

Duhaney said Williams told him she had been planning the scheme for some time, copying confidential documents little by little.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Williams remains free on bond pending the outcome of the trial. Duhaney and Dimson have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing.

Williams, Duhaney and Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged conspiracy was foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Chartash told jurors during his opening statement Monday that Williams was the one who first approached the two co-defendants in the case about selling Coca-Cola documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched to rival Pepsi.

But defense lawyer Janice Singer said the case is really about two ex-cons who duped Williams and conspired behind her back.

Subpoenas Raise New Questions (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 23, 2007

A flurry of subpoenas issued late last year to three powerful House committees and two staffers are raising new questions about House policies on document retention as well as internal House rules governing response to subpoenas.

A U.S. district court in San Diego sent subpoenas to the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees late in the year, according to notices in the Dec. 27 and Jan. 4 editions of the Congressional Record.

Elizabeth Phillips, an Appropriations staffer, and Rebecca Kuhn, who formerly worked as ex-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's (R-Calif.) executive assistant, were also subpoenaed to testify, according to letters they submitted to then-House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), as required by House rules.

The subpoenas originally carried a Jan. 11 deadline, but the assistant U.S. attorney's office in San Diego has extended it to Jan. 31 to give the new Democratic majority and new leaders of the three committees time to "compile documents that are responsive to the subpoena," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.)

The subpoenas stem from the case against Cunningham, a former member of the Appropriations and Intelligence panels who is serving eight years in prison for accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for earmarking government contracts. A grand jury in San Diego has been considering evidence against Brent Wilkes, a defense contractor who is accused of conspiring with Cunningham.

The U.S. attorney's office in San Diego first requested thousands of pages of documents from the panels last spring through a letter to the House general counsel. The subsequent subpoenas are an indication that federal prosecutors were concerned late last year that the committees were not voluntarily handing over the previously requested files, which, according to media reports, include classified documents relating to secret CIA contracts and a 59-page classified report into Cunningham's activities produced last fall by an investigator working on an internal probe for the House Intelligence panel.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), ranking member on the House Intelligence Committee, said in an interview that he was surprised by the subpoena because the committee was "working with" the Department of Justice last fall.

"… All of the sudden we got popped with a subpoena," he said in an interview Thursday.

Josh Holly, a spokesman for Republicans on the House Armed Services Committee, said that his boss, then-Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), and top panel aides also were in the process of cooperating with prosecutors and were even setting up a time for the U.S. attorney to meet with Hunter and committee staff when the subpoena came.

Holly said the aides had reviewed the correspondence between Cunningham and the committee and "nothing came up as improper."

Spokesmen for other committee chairmen or ranking members either declined to comment or did not respond to calls for comment. Prosecutors in the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego also declined to comment on the subpoenas, as did a Justice Department spokesman.

House leaders now must decide whether to invoke the Speech or Debate Clause, which provides protections for members of Congress and staff, just as House GOP and Democratic leaders did in May after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

But the timing of the subpoenas' public disclosure raises other questions about internal House policies.

It is unclear when the committees received the subpoenas and whether the then-GOP committee chairmen who received them chose to wait until after Congress formally adjourned in December to disclose them publicly as a way to deflect attention.

The House rule governing responses to subpoenas only dictates that a member, officer or staffer notify the Speaker in writing "promptly."

And the Speaker has broad latitude in when he or she must respond to a notification. If the subpoena comes during a recess, the rules only state that "notification is not required until the reconvening of the House, when the notification shall promptly be laid before the House by the Speaker," according to the rules.

A Hastert spokesman declined to comment on when the subpoenas were served.

"Any good lawyer can argue what the definition of 'promptly' means," said Stan Brand, a former House general counsel.

In fact, in late December, the Los Angeles Times reported that former Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) had received a subpoena for documents before the election as a part of an escalating Justice Department corruption probe against him but had failed to report that subpoena to the House, as the rules require.

A review of the Congressional Record details a letter dated Dec. 14, which Weldon sent to Hastert, acknowledging the subpoena. The letter, however, did not appear until early January because Weldon had sent it after Congress adjourned for the year. Weldon lost his reelection race to Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

Weldon's attorney, William Canfield, said that he could not recall exactly when his client first received the subpoena, but believed it was before the election.

"My instinct tells me it was before the election," Canfield said.

The late disclosure of Weldon's subpoena, as well as the separate subpoenas to the committees and staffers, which all came after Congress formally adjourned, also raise questions about whether anyone in the House did anything to protect the documents, electronic or otherwise. According to two outside sources, the Chief Administrative Officer's office routinely erases the contents of members and staffers' computers once they leave the House.

Once subpoenas are issued, however, leaders in the House and Senate, as well as the general counsel, are legally required to make an effort to preserve documents and ensure they are not being inadvertently or purposefully deleted or destroyed. Because of the Democratic takeover, Republicans lost numerous committee staffers, making efforts to maintain documents even more important.

"If no one took any steps to protect these documents," Brand said, "then that's a major legal problem."

Several calls to the House general counsel's office were not returned.

DOJ_NMG_0120224

House Administration Committee spokeswoman Janice Crump declined to comment about what became of the computers of staffers who were let go after the election, referring all questions to the general counsel's office. In response to a question about Weldon's electronic documents, she said that House policy allows all members who are leaving the House for any reason to remove their entire content of their hard drives and take it with them.

"It was done this way to get out of the middle of any possible litigation to allow the Justice Department to contact the member about any information that was either on the computer or was part of his records while he was here," she said.

Generally, she said, members are allowed to take their papers with them and "this is just the 21st-century way of saying that they can take their electronic records with them."

Hoekstra said he met with the committee's Republican and Democratic counsels late last week and walked away confident that no relevant Intelligence panel documents were destroyed.

"There is no concern on anybody's part that there might have been documents of interest that somehow have gone into a shredder or e-mail wastebasket," he said. "Anything or everything that might be of interest is fully available."

Hoekstra explained that the committee found and saved any and all relevant e-mails when it conducted an internal investigation into the Cunningham matter last year. Hoekstra was angered when Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), who served as the panel's ranking member at the time, released the internal report before the election. The report triggered concerns about how Cunningham used his status and influence over committee staff to get Pentagon contracts for political supporters.

"We are the only committee that when this Cunningham thing started, went out in a bipartisan basis and selected an independent attorney to come in and take a look at anything and everything that went on in the committee," Hoekstra said. "… And [that material is] still available."

Hoekstra, along with the general counsel, and House leaders are still determining whether to hand over that material along with any other documents that fall under the subpoena.

"House counsel along with the general counsel [and Democratic and GOP leaders] will have discussions with Justice to see exactly what the most effective and most appropriate way to address [the subpoena are]," he said.

Prison Stay Sliced For Ex-school Boss (MACD)

Judge decides Gardiner didn't know of other bribes, inflated bills

Disgraced educator John Gardiner was placed in a wheelchair to be returned to prison Monday after a judge refused a plea for home confinement but did slice five months off Gardiner's original sentence.

Advertisement

Gardiner, the former superintendent of East Detroit Public Schools, had sought a reduced sentence for his conviction in what has been called the largest public corruption scandal in Macomb County history.

However, U.S. District Court Judge Patrick Duggan issued a new sentence of 41 months in a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va., reduced from the original sentence of up to 46 months for convictions on racketeering and extortion.

"Dr. Gardiner has maintained he is not guilty and he has the right to feel that way, but a jury has found him guilty," Duggan said.

Monday's sentencing hearing was ordered after the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Duggan made an error at Gardiner's original sentencing because of confusion over mandatory sentencing guidelines.

At Monday's hearing, it was possible for the judge to add another year onto the original sentence. Instead, Duggan's new calculation resulted in a range of 37 to 46 months, and he opted for five fewer months.

Gardiner, who has been in prison for 22 months, will likely now be released from prison in March of 2008 instead of August 2008.

The 74-year-old Gardiner was among 20 people named in a 35-count indictment handed down by the U.S. Justice Department. They were charged with accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts, vacations, cash, and home improvements financed by contractor William Hudson Jr.

In return, Gardiner and others helped arrange lucrative contracts for school bond work to Hudson, who also is in prison for his part in the scandal.

In deciding a new sentence, the judge had to decide whether Gardiner's conduct furthered the overall conspiracy and whether the loss to the district could have been reasonably foreseen by the former superintendent while in office.

Margaret Sind Raben, Gardiner's attorney, argued that the former superintendent was not aware of some $2 million in inflated bills submitted by Hudson. She said Hudson had his own relationship with assistant superintendents who approved the doctored bills that gave Hudson more money than he was owed while working on a bond construction program for East Detroit Public Schools.

Raben also pointed out Gardiner's deteriorating health should be a factor in reducing the sentence because he is legally blind and has health issues.

John Engstrom, the assistant U.S. Attorney for the case, said Gardiner accepted $150,000 in bribes from Hudson to have "willful blindness" to paperwork Hudson submitted for payment.

Gardiner accepted a $40,000 down payment for a new home from Hudson along with home improvements, and $12,000 for a house down payment for Gardiner's daughter, according to the Justice Department.

Hudson took in at least $2.4 million legally as the contractor for a $30 million bond issue for East Detroit.

The Justice Department also contends Gardiner drew up a phony contract for Hudson to use to obtain a $600,000 loan from the Bank of Bloomfield Hills when Hudson needed money to pay off his tax debts to the IRS. That showed Gardiner was aware of the criminal enterprise beyond East Detroit, according to Engstrom.

Duggan said it was a "close question" as to whether Gardiner was fully aware of the inflated bills. "He could be criticized for now being more careful," the judge said.

In the end, Duggan said he did not find evidence that Gardiner had a larger role in the conspiracy or knew how much it would cost East Detroit Public Schools.

When Gardiner was asked if he wished to make a statement, the ex-superintendent slowly stood, with his hands on his hips, and continued to maintain his innocence.

"Being involved in the business matters of the district was not my favorite thing," he said. "If I failed on that extent, I apologize."

Engstrom said Gardiner has only tried to minimize his involvement with the conspiracy by blaming his underlings.

"He has shown very little or no remorse to the school district. He's only concerned about his reputation in the future," Engstrom said.

After Monday's hearing, the U.S. Marshal's Service placed Gardiner in a wheelchair and prepared to take him back to a federal prison in Milan, Mich., where he will be housed until he is airlifted back to West Virginia to finish his sentence.

"Bye bye," he said to his wife and daughter as he was wheeled from the courtroom.

CDC Adviser Arrested For Urinal Incident (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

A prominent public health expert who is a top adviser to federal health agencies was arrested on suspicion of public indecency in an airport men's room.

Dr. Hugh H. Tilson, 67, was arrested Jan. 16 at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport after a plainclothes police officer said he saw Tilson masturbating at a urinal while watching other men urinate.

Tilson, a part-time faculty member at the University of North Carolina's School of Public Health, has advised the government and industry on health issues and co-authored an influential 1988 report on the future of public health in the U.S.

Tilson recently co-chaired a task force advising the Atlanta-based federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on setting agency priorities and goals. He was visiting Atlanta last week for a senior leadership retreat with CDC Director Julie Gerberding and others.

CDC spokesman Glen Nowak said Monday that agency officials had just learned of Tilson's arrest. The agency had no comment "because it's a law enforcement matter," he said.

Tilson could not immediately be reached for comment at his UNC office or Raleigh, N.C., home, or through his university e-mail.

UNC officials issued a statement that clarified that Tilson is not a classroom instructor. "The university takes the charges seriously. We think it is important to let the Georgia judicial system resolve the case," the statement said.

Public indecency is a city code violation, which is considered of less consequence than a misdemeanor, according to a police report. Tilson posted a $500 bond and was released, and is to return to Atlanta next month for a court appearance.

Ex-Church Official Guilty In Porn Case (AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

(AP) - BRIDGEPORT, Conn.-The former music director of a church where former President Bush once worshipped pleaded guilty on Monday to possessing child pornography.

Robert F. Tate, 64, of Greenwich, admitted possessing between 150 and 300 pornographic images of children, some engaging in sexually explicit conduct. Prosecutors said some children in the images were younger than 12 years old.

"Yes, your honor. I regret to say I did it," Tate told a federal judge.

Tate was the longtime music director of Christ Church in Greenwich, where former President George H.W. Bush attended while growing up. Funeral services for his parents, Prescott Bush Sr. and Dorothy Walker Bush, were held there.

At his last hearing in December, President Bush's aunt and other members of the church attended to support Tate.

Tate faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced April 12.

Judge To Review Inquiry Into Leaks In Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

A federal judge Monday said she would personally review the government's investigation into the disclosure of confidential documents in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping case, amid claims that the latest leak was triggered by a previously unreported FBI interview of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian.

U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer's decision followed an acrimonious hearing at which attorneys for Pellicano and for Kerkorian's longtime attorney, Terry Christensen, complained that the leaks to the New York Times had severely hurt their clients' rights to a fair trial.

The defense attorneys also pointedly questioned why authorities had not identified the source of the leaks after nine months of investigation.

"This is horrendous," Christensen's attorney, Terree Bowers, said of the leaks. "It is trampling on Mr. Christensen's presumption of innocence."

Last April, the judge issued a protective order to prevent the disclosure of evidence compiled against Pellicano, Christensen and six other co-defendants in a wide-ranging wiretapping case that has rocked legal and Hollywood circles. After the New York Times printed the first of several articles that quoted sealed FBI interview reports in the case, the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego opened an investigation into the leaks.

Two weeks ago, the newspaper published — and posted on its website — excerpts from audio recordings of conversations between Pellicano and Christensen. Attorneys for Christensen had challenged the government's right to use the recordings against their client on the grounds of attorney-client privilege. At the time, they also argued that authorities were so concerned about the tapes' admissibility that they had interviewed Kerkorian "in what appears to be an illicit attempt to get him to inadvertently waive the attorney-client privilege."

In the latest court documents, Bowers suggested that the government, fearing that the tapes might be ruled inadmissible, had decided to leak them.

"Faced with such a result, it is most likely that someone from the prosecution took this illegal and drastic step of ensuring that members of the public got to see excerpts and listen to the recordings," Bowers said in the latest court filing.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, said, "We have honored at all times Mr. Kerkorian's claim of attorney-client privilege."

Mrozek said he would not comment on what he called "the latest conspiracy theory being floated by people associated with the defense."

San Diego Assistant U.S. Atty. Robert Ciaffa, who is directing the leak investigation, said he would not comment about that probe while it is underway. As is standard practice, the leak investigation is being conducted by another U.S. attorney's office to ensure its independence.

A spokeswoman for Kerkorian's Tracinda Corp. declined comment about the interview, which sources say lasted about two hours.

Bowers urged Judge Fischer to hold a hearing on the leaks, and to subpoena the New York Times reporters to testify. To bolster his argument, Bowers cited the BALCO case, in which two reporters from the San Francisco Chronicle face 18 months in federal prison for refusing to disclose who leaked them grand jury testimony about steroid use in professional sports. In court documents, Bowers also charged that the government's investigation of his client "has been fraught with government deceit, obfuscation, sensationalism and injustice from the minute [it] began."

Catherine J. Mathis, a spokeswoman for the New York Times, said the newspaper would continue to assert the reporters' right not to reveal how they obtained the court documents and recordings.

Subpoenas Sought Against 2 Times Reporters (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

A defense lawyer in the case involving Anthony Pellicano, the Hollywood private eye accused of masterminding a long-running wiretapping ring, called yesterday for two New York Times reporters to be subpoenaed to find out who leaked them recordings of conversations and other evidence in the case.

On Jan. 11, The Times printed excerpts of 33 recorded conversations that Mr. Pellicano had with Terry N. Christensen, a lawyer for Kirk Kerkorian, the billionaire Hollywood mogul. The newspaper also put audio excerpts of the conversations on its Web site. Mr. Christensen has also been charged in connection with the wiretapping.

In papers filed last week in federal court, Mr. Christensen called on the judge, Dale S. Fischer of United States District Court, to force the two reporters, David M. Halbfinger and Allison Hope Weiner, to reveal their sources.

In a hearing yesterday in Los Angeles, Terree A. Bowers, the lawyer representing Mr. Christensen, told the judge that the reporters might be “criminally liable” for their actions. He said in a telephone interview after the hearing that he told the judge that their posting of the conversations on the Internet violated his client’s presumption of innocence.

The judge asked Mr. Bowers to spell out specifically what relief he is seeking and how he would like her to deal with the case. In a statement, Catherine J. Mathis, a spokeswoman for The New York Times Company, said: “We believe it is critically important for reporters to be able to protect their confidential sources of information and will continue to advocate for their ability to do so.”

The judge also said she wanted to meet privately with Robert Ciaffa, the assistant United States attorney in San Diego, who is investigating the source of information leaked to The Times over the last year in what the government has said was a violation of the judge’s order. Mr. Ciaffa, who did not attend the hearing, said in a telephone interview that he had no comment.

Judge Fischer also indicated yesterday that she was studying a similar case involving two reporters for The San Francisco Chronicle who have refused to reveal their sources and are facing up to 18 months in jail. The reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, published federal grand jury testimony in which athletes admitted to using steroids supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as Balco. The jail terms, as well as a $1,000-a-day fine imposed on The Chronicle, have been suspended pending an appeal, to be heard in March.

The trial of Mr. Pellicano has been delayed until August because of the complexity of the case, the volume of evidence and lawyers’ scheduling conflicts.

Man Killed After Officer Is Shot (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The handcuffed suspect apparently got a gun hidden in his pants and opened fire on police investigating an assault in the Westlake district.

A man who was handcuffed by police during an early morning arrest Monday in the Westlake district of Los Angeles managed to reach for a gun hidden in his pants and opened fire, seriously wounding a veteran officer, according to several LAPD sources familiar with the investigation.

Rampart Division training officer Andy Taylor, 37, was rushed by ambulance to Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, where he was treated for a gunshot wound to the shoulder and chest.

The 12-year veteran, who was in stable condition, also was hit in his bulletproof vest.

Police Chief William J. Bratton said the officer could be released from the hospital as early as today.

Bratton said he would withhold comment on the specifics of the shooting until he was presented with a full preliminary briefing by investigators with the Los Angeles Police Department's Force Investigation Division.

Department officials said Taylor was one of several officers who responded to an apartment building in the 600 block of Coronado Street about 5 a.m. after a report of an assault there.

According to the LAPD sources, who spoke to The Times on the condition that they not be named, the officers questioned several men in a second-floor residence at the multiunit complex.

A rookie officer, whom department officials did not identify, searched and handcuffed one of the suspects before leading him out into the hallway where Taylor was standing, the sources said.

As the officers talked to the other men, the suspect reached into his pants and pulled out a handgun, firing at least two shots that struck Taylor, the sources said.

Two other officers emerged from the apartment, firing multiple times before killing the suspect.

The dead man suffered at least two gunshot wounds.

Department officials said four people — two men and two women — were taken into custody. The women were later released; at least one of the men was held on a parole violation.

At a morning news conference, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa blamed gang violence for the increase in assaults against police officers, though it was unknown if gangs were involved in Monday's incident.

"One of the reasons why we're targeting gangs, and we're not sure who these suspects are … is because too much of this kind of activity occurs in [the] city of Los Angeles and we've got to do something about it," Villaraigosa said.

Bratton expressed concern that the shooting was part of a spike in attacks on officers so far this year compared with last year.

He said there have been 10 instances in less than a month in which suspects have shot at officers.

LAPD statistics show that although attacks on police increased to 109 last year from 99 in 2005, they are still down from 2002, when there were nearly 130 incidents.

But the numbers also show that the increase in the last three years mirrors an uptick in reported gang crime. Gangs have been tied to several recent officer shootings.

Earlier this month, 13-year LAPD veteran Mark Wilbur was shot in the thigh while he and other officers were investigating a report of armed gang members at a house in Panorama City.

In August, Officer James Tuck was seriously injured when a man with an AK47-style assault weapon opened fire on him during a traffic stop in Montecito Heights.

In perhaps the most high-profile incident, Officer Kristina Ripatti was left paralyzed from the chest down when she was shot in June by an armed robber who also was described as a gang member.

Former Bolivar County Official Changes Plea In Katrina Kickback (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 23, 2007

CLEVELAND, Miss. - Former Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown pleaded guilty Monday to receiving a cash kickback from Hurricane Katrina relief funds.

Brown, 29, made the plea Monday in U.S. District Court in Aberdeen. He remains charged with witness tampering.

Brown, who had been administrator in Bolivar County since April 2004, was not taken into custody and will continue under his current $20,000 bond and supervised release until sentencing.

Brown was arrested by FBI agents at his office on June 6 for requesting and accepting kickbacks from David Spikes, as well as witness tampering.

Spikes, who owns Nternet Solutions in Pace, was hired to develop and maintain a Web site for the county to assist displaced Katrina residents who evacuated there. The Federal Emergency Management Agency reimbursed the county $48,402 for the Web site.

The indictment also charged that Brown used intimidation and threats to try to influence the testimony of Spikes' wife, Monique Spikes, to a federal grand jury.

The Boliver County Board of Supervisors suspended Brown without pay, then fired him in August.

A date for his sentencing is not yet known. Chief Judge Glen H. Davidson will handle the sentencing. Brown faces up to $500,000 in fines and up to 20 years in prison.

Iberia Parish Man, Morgan City Residents Plead Guilty To FEMA Fraud (DA)

By Kyle Jackson

The Daily Advertiser, January 22, 2007

MORGAN CITY— Two Morgan City residents and one New Iberia man pled guilty Monday after attempting to defraud FEMA.

According to a news release from Donald Washington, U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Louisiana, the following three individuals pled guilty before U.S. District Judge Tucker Melancon:

Richard Hufnagel, 40, of New Iberia, admitted to applying for emergency benefits following Hurricane Katrina, claiming that he lived in a warehouse in New Orleans during the storm.

Hufnagel received $55,000 in FEMA aid for flood damage he claimed to hae suffered.

Investigations into Hufnagel's claims found that he was living in a hotel room in Gretna prior to the hurricane.

Morgan City resident Shannon Sylvester, 19, received $2,000 in disaster relief funds shortly after Hurricane Katrina in 2005, claiming she had to evacuate her New Orleans residence as a result of the storm.

However, investigations into Sylvester's claim proved that she'd never lied in New Orleans and her primary address was in Morgan City.

Ashley Clark, 22, also of Morgan City, received $4,665 worth of FEMA aid after filing a claim for damages done to her residence as a result of Hurricane Rita.

All three defendants have yet to be sentenced.

When sentenced, each defendant could face up to a maximum of 10 years in federal prison and a fine of $250,000.

Ridgeland Woman Sentenced For FEMA Fraud (WLBT)

WLBT-TV Jackson (MS) Online, January 22, 2007

A Ridgeland woman pled guilty and was sentenced for FEMA fraud related to Hurricane Katrina Monday.

Tabuthia Bell was sentenced to three years of probation with forty hours of community service.

Bell was accused of submitting a false claim to fema for Hurricane Katrina disaster assistance funds.

She received 2-thousand dollars from fema by providing a false address in Ridgeland and claiming hurricane damage at that address.

Bell has already made full restitution to FEMA.

Cockfighting's 'Cultural Tradition' Kept Alive In USA (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Immigration has helped fuel the popularity of cockfighting, a common practice in some countries that is illegal in most of the USA.

Statistics are hard to come by, but law enforcement officials and animal rights groups in places such as Denver, Houston and Santa Barbara County, Calif., say they've seen a surge. Others question whether there's just more attention on the activity because police are cracking down.

Cockfighting is illegal in every state except Louisiana and New Mexico.

"It's definitely on the rise," says Wayne Pacelle, head of the Humane Society of the United States. Pacelle says the Internet has helped connect cockfighters. He also cites increased involvement of immigrants from countries such as Mexico and the Philippines. "It's legal in a lot of places where there's significant immigration to the United States," he says. "You're seeing participation from people of those nations."

Mark Kumpf of the National Animal Control Association acknowledges there can be a cultural link. He doesn't think cockfighting is on the rise, though. What's up, he says, is enforcement.

Police are aggressively busting cockfighting operations, from fights to bird smuggling, because crimes such as drug dealing, assault and gambling often are associated, he says.

On Sunday, authorities raided a cockfight in Boydton, Va. Mecklenburg County Sheriff Danny Fox says 122 people were cited for violating the state's ban, 22 were arrested by Homeland Security officials and accused of being in the country illegally, and 126 birds were seized.

Kumpf says authorities also are motivated by concerns that cockfighting may contribute to the spread of bird flu. In Asia, it is suspected in some cases of spreading bird flu to humans, and, through smuggling, from country to country, the World Health Organization says.

In cockfighting, razor blades or sharp metal spurs called gaffs are strapped to the legs of specially bred roosters. Spectators place bets and watch the birds battle, often to the death.

U.S. Rep. Elton Gallegly, R-Calif., says fear of bird flu is one reason he is sponsoring a bill that would make it a felony to transport a bird or animal across state or national borders for fighting. It also would prohibit interstate and foreign commerce in cockfighting implements such as gaffs.

In Denver, the number of informal backyard fights is up, says Doug Kelley, director of the Division of Animal Care and Control. "It's normally a couple of households getting together for what they think of as a friendly competition," he says.

Animal control officer James Lopez says the practice is especially popular in Denver's Mexican community. "It's legal in Mexico, so a lot of people come up here and feel they should be able to do it here, too," he says.

The Santa Barbara County sheriff's department broke up four cockfighting rings last year, three run by Hispanics and one by Hmong, Sgt. Erik Raney says.

About 150 birds were confiscated in one case after a drug bust led to a broader investigation. "We often find that the people arrested have other criminal records," Raney says.

Cockfighting has increased "at an alarming rate" in the Houston area, says Sgt. Mark Timmers of the Harris County Constable Precinct 6. He says the number of fighting roosters seized doubles every year. Last year, it was about 800.

In New Mexico, Diana Orosco VanHoozen takes talk of cockfighting personally.

Once her two daughters were old enough to walk, they helped her feed and handle the roosters, she says. Her birds, numbering about 130, represent family and cultural tradition to VanHoozen. A self-described "fifth-generation cockfighter," she raises, breeds and fights roosters.

"This has been in our family for hundreds of years," says VanHoozen, 36, of Las Cruces, who traces some of her lineage to Mexico. "It's Mexican culture. Anywhere you go in Mexico, you can find a cockfight."

Some New Mexico lawmakers, animal rights groups and others want to make cockfighting illegal. Last month, Gov. Bill Richardson backed the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0120231

In Louisiana, state Sen. Arthur Lentini plans to introduce a bill to ban cockfighting when the Legislature convenes in April, according to his assistant, JoAnn Loebig.

VanHoozen calls New Mexico's effort discrimination. "I want to be able to still practice my cultural tradition," she says.

State Sen. Mary Jane Garcia, a Democrat, counters, "Whose culture are we talking about?"

Garcia's grandparents are from Mexico. She says her family has never participated in cockfighting.

Garcia has been trying to get a cockfighting ban in New Mexico for 18 years. Last week, she introduced a bill to make cockfighting — or attending a fight — a felony.

A 2004 Albuquerque Journal poll found that 66% of registered state voters would support a law banning cockfighting. Among Hispanic voters, 59% favored a ban. "To me, it's an animal-cruelty issue. It's barbaric and gruesome," Garcia says. "It's an illegal and unethical practice. They allow young boys to go in there and gamble."

Garcia acknowledges that cockfighting is still common south of the border. "It's still practiced a lot in Mexico, but we're not in Mexico anymore," she says.

Most cockfighters and spectators in New Mexico are Hispanic, says Ronald Barron of the New Mexico Gamefowl Breeders Association.

"At least 95% of the people raising game fowl in the state are Hispanic," he says. "It's part of the Hispanic tradition."

Fred Hawley, professor of criminal justice at Western Carolina University, has done research on cockfighting.

"Like any other folk practice, it's been spreading along with a number of other folk practices, like folk healing, into areas that attract large Hispanic populations," he says.

Hawley and Pacelle say cockfighting is also popular with rural whites.

Cockfighters take the practice from their native countries because they feel pride in the tradition, Hawley says. "For people who have been doing it for generations, this is symbolic and important," he says.

Timmers cautions against generalizing about ethnic groups. He says, "There are no cultural boundaries when it comes to cockfighting."

CIVIL LAW:

Maryland Couple And Their Company To Pay $1.5 Million Over Federal Contract Suit (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

COSMOS to Pay $1.5M to Settle Suit

BALTIMORE (AP) -- A Potomac couple and the company they run will pay $1.55 million to settle allegations that they submitted false claims on federal contracts, a case that involved a whistle blower who worked for the company.

Robert Yin and Karen Kaufman-Yin, along with their Bethesda-based company COSMOS Corp., allegedly submitted the claims for contracts with the National Science Foundation, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Justice Department.

Yin is the president of COSMOS while Kaufman-Yin is the vice president and chief financial officer. The company provides research, analysis and other services to government agencies and private organizations.

According to federal prosecutors, COSMOS improperly charged government contracts for costs that dealt with the company's operations, including marketing, bid proposals and administrative labor. The company is also accused of shifting labor costs from private contracts to its government contracts.

The allegations were made in a whistle blower lawsuit filed by former employee Jennifer H. Pobiak under the federal False Claims Act. The law allows Pobiak to receive money as part of the settlement after the government took over the case. Pobiak's share will be $263,500.

Wrongful Imprisonment Case Against FBI Winding Down (AP)

By Denise Lavoie

AP, January 23, 2007

BOSTON - Two men who spent decades in prison for a 1965 gangland slaying they didn't commit wept on the witness stand as they recounted what the years behind bars did to them and their families.

But Justice Department lawyers made it clear Monday that theirs will not be the kind of emotional case presented by the men who are suing the government for wrongful imprisonment and malicious prosecution.

Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said the government will not offer testimony from a single live witness. Instead, the government will rely on depositions from several people involved in the 1965 murder case.

The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and two other men who died in prison after they were convicted in the 1965 killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan. They say the FBI cannot be held liable for the results of a separate state investigation.

Attorneys for the men, however, say the FBI knew the men had been framed for Deegan's killing, but hid evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men to protect a Mafia hitman and FBI informant, Joseph "The Animal" Barboza.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza.

The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

Limone, Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison - Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco - are suing the federal government for $100 million.

Lawyers for the men are expected to finish presenting their evidence Tuesday after 19 days of testimony. Lipscomb told U.S. District Judge Nancy Gertner she expects to start and finish the government's case Tuesday, through depositions and exhibits. Final arguments are scheduled for Feb. 27. Gertner will decide the jury-waived case.

Nicotine Manipulation Confirmed (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Any doubts that the tobacco industry has surreptitiously raised the nicotine content of cigarettes should be laid to rest by a study from researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health. They confirmed last year's discovery of the nicotine increase by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health and went on to identify how the tobacco companies designed their cigarettes to accomplish this.

These manipulations were discovered because Massachusetts requires manufacturers to use a more realistic test to measure how much nicotine is deliverable to typical smokers and requires companies to report design features of their cigarettes. When Harvard researchers reanalyzed the data they found that the nicotine yield per cigarette rose by an average of 11 percent between 1998 and 2005, a conclusion contested by the industry.

Harvard researchers concluded that the companies managed this by using tobacco containing a higher concentration of nicotine and perhaps also by slowing the rate at which cigarettes burned — thus increasing the number of puffs per cigarette. The companies presumably hoped that additional nicotine would hook more new customers and keep old ones from breaking the habit.

Their continued bad behavior makes it imperative for Congress to grant the Food and Drug Administration the authority to regulate tobacco products, including the power to reduce nicotine levels and demand extensive data from the companies. The Senate overwhelmingly approved such legislation in 2004, only to have House Republicans block it. With new Democratic majorities in both houses, it is time to rein in this rogue industry.

Trial Resumes In Noxubee County Reverse Discrimination Case (AP)

JACKSON, Miss. - The federal trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County entered its second week Monday with more testimony anticipated from whites who claim their right to participate in the election process has been violated.

Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites.

Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population.

On Friday, two white witnesses said Brown had threatened to challenge their right to cast ballots in the party's 2003 primary. In addition, an unsuccessful white candidate for Noxubee County supervisor told the federal judge he was unfairly treated by the defendant as to how absentee ballots were counted in a close race against the eventual black winner.

Federal prosecutors want U.S. District Judge Tom Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped.

Cheri Anne Eaves and Kari Hardy testified on Friday that Brown accused them of being disloyal Democrats and had threatened to try to deny their right to vote in the 2003 Democratic primary. Brown allegedly had put them on a list he circulated of 174 white voters he would challenge as ineligible to participate in Democratic Party election because they were closet Republicans.

"I was angry that anybody would have the right to say I couldn't vote," Eaves said.

Despite the threat of being challenged at the polls, she told Lee she did vote in the Democratic primary. Hardy said she did not vote.

Both women testified that they didn't understand why Brown could question their right to vote. They said they hadn't voted in Republican primaries before. Mississippi has open primaries for the two political parties to hold and doesn't require voters to register as Democrat or Republican.

Brown claims the U.S. Justice Department is misconstruing as racial intimidation his attempts to keep Republicans from voting in Democratic primaries. However, the Justice Department alleges that the "relentless voting-related discrimination" is based on Noxubee County blacks trying to shut whites out of the process.

Candidate's son claims Noxubee ballot challenges dismissed

A black Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee official said she was going to follow her own law in counting absentee ballots during a 2003 primary election, a white candidate's son testified Monday.

"I was not allowed to make challenges," said Richard Heard, whose father was a candidate for county sheriff.

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

A trial on the lawsuit is in its second week in U.S. District Court in Jackson. District Judge Tom S. Lee will decide the case.

The Justice Department is still presenting its side.

Wil Colom, attorney for the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and Chairman Ike Brown, said his clients believe the complaints are imagined. Colom said most of the charges regarding election discrepancies are normal election errors and miscues that happen every year in every county in America.

Heard testified that he remembered seeing one absentee ballot where the signature didn't match the name on the application and questioned pollworkers about it.

"I said over and over something is wrong with this ballot," he testified.

But Heard said the woman in charge at the polls eventually said "We aren't going by state law but my law today."

Heard said he also was concerned that an absentee ballot he notarized for a white voter was rejected.

On cross-examination, Colom asked Heard if he actually saw the white voter's ballot rejected.

Heard said he was told it was rejected.

"You're going by what someone told you?" Colom asked Heard.

Colom asked Heard if he knew that only 15 absentee ballots were rejected and only two of those were from white voters. More than 1,200 total votes were cast in the election.

A black voter also testified for the government on Monday.

Nikki Nicole Halbert said she filed an absentee ballot but the signature on the envelope wasn't hers.

Colom objected that the government ambushed the defense with Halbert's testimony.

On cross-examination, Halbert said she had no reason to believe her ballot wasn't cast as she filled it out.

Limits On Prison Suits Are Eased (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Twelve years ago, Congress passed a law intended to make it harder for prisoners to file lawsuits challenging prison conditions as illegal or unconstitutional. On Monday, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously that a federal appeals court had overstepped its bounds by making prisoner lawsuits even harder to file than Congress intended.

The barriers the lower court had put in place "cannot fairly be viewed" as a correct interpretation of the law, the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said for the court. Unless Congress explicitly provided otherwise, Chief Justice Roberts explained, courts should apply to prisoners' lawsuits the same procedural rules they apply to any other lawsuit and "should generally not depart from the usual practice under the federal rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns."

The ruling was greeted with relief by advocates for prisoners' rights, who said the lower court's approach had threatened to make it all but impossible for an inmate not represented by a lawyer to navigate the procedural hurdles to get a case accepted for a hearing.

"A loss would have been devastating," said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the National Prison Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, which filed a brief in support of three Michigan inmates whose separate cases were consolidated by the court for a single decision. Dismissed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, their complaints about their treatment are now reinstated.

Ms. Alexander said the decision, Jones v. Bock, No. 05-7058, marked the first time in a half-dozen rulings that the Supreme Court had not adopted the most unfavorable possible interpretation of the Prison Litigation Reform Act.

At issue was the Sixth Circuit's interpretation of the law. The appeals court, which covers Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee as well as Michigan, adopted three rules to carry out the law's requirement that before going to federal court with a complaint about prison conditions, an inmate must first "exhaust" any administrative remedies provided by the prison.

First, the appeals court held, this requirement meant that inmates had to prove they had exhausted their remedies, in contrast to the ordinary federal rule that places on the defendant the burden of showing, as a defense, that the plaintiff had failed to meet an exhaustion requirement. Second, prisoners could not sue anyone they had not first named during the internal grievance process. And third, a lawsuit that contained a mixture of exhausted and unexhausted claims should be dismissed in its entirety.

In his opinion on Monday, Chief Justice Roberts said "we understand the reasons" for the Sixth Circuit's approach. He noted that prisoners' lawsuits accounted for nearly 10 percent of all civil cases filed in federal court and that many are without merit.

But he added that the circuit's choice of its "more onerous pleading rules" was not based on the statute. "The judge's job is to construe the statute — not to make it better," he said.

Justices Overturn Restrictions On Inmates' Lawsuits (AP)

Associated Press

WASHINGTON – A unanimous Supreme Court signaled Monday that some courts are going too far in barring lawsuits by inmates complaining about their treatment.

In an opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts, the court overturned procedural obstacles in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that led to dismissal of civil rights complaints brought by three Michigan inmates.

The appeals court in Cincinnati covers the states of Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky. Federal courts in the circuit allowed just 18 of nearly 500 inmate civil rights suits to proceed, a recent American Civil Liberties Union study concluded, making the circuit the most restrictive in the country for such lawsuits.

The Republican-controlled Congress passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act in 1995, seeking to slow a flood of federal lawsuits.

The law requires prisoners to go through a lengthy administrative grievance process before they may sue in court.

The law worked – too well, according to critics. Nearly 42,000 civil rights petitions were filed in 1995 before the law took effect. Five years later, the number was down to 26,000, according to the Justice Department.

"Today's decision will at least help to ensure that the courthouse door is not completely shut," ACLU legal director Steven Shapiro said in a statement.

Roberts wrote that under the prison reform act, inmates are not required to demonstrate that they have exhausted the administrative complaint procedure. The chief justice said a lawsuit is not necessarily invalid just because a defendant was not named in the inmate's earlier administrative grievance. In addition, Roberts wrote, the prison litigation law does not require dismissing the entire lawsuit when an inmate fails to exhaust some of his claims administratively.

The Supreme Court is "not insensitive to the challenges faced by the lower federal courts in managing their dockets and attempting to separate ... needles from haystacks," Roberts wrote.

But the chief justice added that adopting "different and more onerous pleading rules ... should not be done on a case-by-case basis by the courts."

The cases are Jones v. Bock, 05-7058, and Williams v. Overton, and Walton v. Bouchard, 05-7142.

Long Beach Awaits Hate-Crime Verdict (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

LONG BEACH, Calif. -- A crowd of black teenagers and three young white women stood on a street corner on Halloween night. A male voice cried, "I hate [expletive] white people!" The crowd surged, and someone cracked one of the whites in the head with a skateboard, dropping her to the ground. That much is not in dispute.

Who is responsible and how this could happen in the port city of Long Beach, which prides itself on its diversity and tolerance, has been the subject of arguments in court, civic forums and private living rooms here ever since.

Ten defendants -- nine female and one male, ages 12 to 18 -- were charged with assault for allegedly beating and kicking the women, giving one 12 facial fractures and another a concussion. Eight of the teenagers are also charged with a hate crime. Their trial has dragged on since early November.

This week attorneys are expected to finish closing arguments and a judge will render verdicts. The city is waiting uneasily to find out whether it will live up to its self-image as a unified, tolerant community or dissolve into racial hostility.

City leaders have reacted to the racial flare-up with alacrity, sending out volunteers to the victims and organizing community forums to denounce racism.

Yet some African Americans express frustration that city leaders have not been more visible in their community. Some are also angry at the local newspaper, which initially covered the victims' story that they were attacked, without reporting that some witnesses called it a mutual fight, or that the arrested teenagers have no criminal history and are accomplished athletes on a local high school track team.

DOJ_NMG_0120236

As the Rev. O. Leon Wood Jr., the black pastor of the North Long Beach Community Prayer Center, said: "When we're in a situation where whites are on the receiving end of a problem, there appears to be a little more sensitivity added to the issue."

Meanwhile, conservative radio hosts took up the cause of the victims, calling Long Beach a dangerous place for white people.

And the victims, their attorney said, have been fearful of retaliation. During the course of the trial, a witness for the prosecution had her car rammed repeatedly by another vehicle while she was in court testifying. Police called it gang-related witness intimidation.

"I'm very nervous about what's going to happen when there are verdicts," said Doug Otto, the victims' attorney.

Long Beach, like neighboring Los Angeles, has a history of racial tension to match its diversity. In the 1920s, it had a Ku Klux Klan chapter and redlining that kept housing segregated.

The port is now the second-busiest in the country, and the city is a hodgepodge of bobbing oil derricks, leafy streets and run-down apartment buildings filled with newly arrived Latinos, working-class blacks and whites, and refugees from Vietnam and Cambodia.

"This city has made great strides since the Rodney King riots" in 1992, Long Beach Mayor Bob Foster said in an interview. That unrest started in South Central Los Angeles 15 miles away and spread to neighboring Long Beach, destroying more than 300 businesses there.

City officials often refer to a 2000 USA Today study of the 65 largest cities that found Long Beach to be the most diverse. Of Long Beach's 462,000 residents, 36 percent are Latino, 33 percent white, 14 percent black and 12 percent Asian.

Twenty-three hate crimes were reported in the city in 2005, down from 66 in 1998. The drop is steeper than an overall dip in Los Angeles County in the same period. So the Halloween beatings came as a shock.

Laura Schneider, 19, Michelle Smith, 19, and Loren Hyman, 21, were out for a night of fun on a street in a mostly white, middle-class neighborhood where residents deck out their houses for Halloween, prosecutors said. About 40 black teenagers, also in the neighborhood to trick-or-treat, began throwing lemons and small pumpkins at them and taunting them about their race.

When a boy cried out his hatred for whites, "the crowd surged" and began to beat the women, Deputy District Attorney Andrea Bouas argued in court. Hyman's jaw and eye socket were fractured, and Schneider suffered a concussion.

Parents of the arrested teenagers do not dispute the injuries, but they contend that police arrested the wrong children.

Defense testimony in court has bolstered their argument. Neighbors who called 911 on Halloween night reported black boys, not girls, beating the white women. Most of the arrested teenagers were identified by a passerby who recalled their clothing, not their faces. Her credibility was seriously eroded on the witness stand.

"Our hearts go out to the victims," Allene, the mother of a 16-year-old defendant who would not give her last name to protect her daughter's identity, said at a public meeting here Saturday. "We pray for them, because this should never happen to anyone. But our kids are incarcerated based on hairstyles, earrings, dark clothing. . . . It's a rush-to-judgment case."

But the victims are "absolutely convinced that these defendants are among those who attacked them," said Otto, their attorney.

"We haven't heard that anyone is planning on moving, so eventually when this is over people will get back to life," said Anitra Dempsey, coordinator of the city's human dignity program's youth and gang task force. "When the case was first reported there was outrage that this would occur anywhere, and particularly here. [But] Long Beach is one city, and we are not going to be divided or defined by this one event."

Former Exec In Irvine Says He Was Fired Over Religion (LAT)

By Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

Discrimination suit alleges car wax manufacturer had expected him to be 'on fire for Jesus.'

A former executive of an Irvine car wax manufacturer alleges in a lawsuit that the company fired him because he had not pursued "a Christian lifestyle" and wasn't "on fire for Jesus."

Atticus O. Firey, 34, of Newport Beach contends Meguiar's Inc. committed religious discrimination when it fired him in July after nearly 10 years with the company. Company president Barry Meguiar repeatedly urged Firey, then the chief operating officer, to attend church, the suit alleges, and told him he was "robbing this company of the blessing of God by not being on your knees and on fire for Jesus."

Meguiar, who is host of a cable TV and radio program called "Car Crazy," did not return a call seeking comment. His lawyer, Richard Ruben, said religion had nothing to do with Firey's firing. He said the company's senior management decided to terminate Firey because his job performance was sub-par, with a management style that was "demeaning" and "negative."

"The company was suffering economically, and Mr. Firey was not showing up at the office and was only sporadically attending to his duties," Ruben said.

He added that the company's management includes "people of all religions" and characterized the lawsuit as a "publicity stunt." He said he expected a judge to throw out the suit, because Firey had previously agreed to submit to arbitration, rather than go to the courts, should such a dispute arise.

The suit, filed Friday in Orange County Superior Court, says Meguiar sat in Firey's office and read to him from the Bible, thrust Christian books on him and demanded he read them and forced managers to attend prayer meetings. When Firey asked about a promised bonus, the suit says, Meguiar said he would not give it to him until Firey joined a Christian church.

Confronted with his behavior, the suit says, Meguiar said he had the right to manage the business, which has some 300 employees, by the tenets of Pentecostal Christianity.

The company hired and fired employees based on religion, the suit says, with Meguiar tutoring executives on how to interview prospective employees in a way that elicited information on their religious beliefs. In one case, Meguiar asked a candidate whether he thought he would go to heaven or hell if he died today, the suit says. When the candidate said he was a Catholic trying to lead a virtuous life, the suit alleges, Meguiar replied that merely "being a good person and following a works-oriented religion" would not save him from hell.

Firey, who is Meguiar's former son-in-law, alleges in his suit that in another instance, his boss tried to block the hiring of an employee because she was living "in sin as a fornicator" with her boyfriend.

"If there were two candidates and one was a Christian but had lesser skills than a non-Christian, Mr. Meguiar would pick the Christian," the suit alleges. In one case, the suit says, Meguiar blocked the hire because he was not "Christian" and accepted a weaker candidate who went to church.

Stuart Jasper, Firey's attorney, said the lawsuit was necessary because the company had "reneged on its obligation to pick an arbitration service." The lawsuit asks for unspecified damages and asks the court both to compel arbitration and to prevent the company from continuing the alleged discriminatory practices.

Jon Gunnemann, a professor of social ethics at the School of Theology at Emory University in Atlanta, said all companies have a "corporate culture," often with powerful implicit signals — such as what kind of jokes are acceptable — that define their boundaries.

"You learn very quickly what can get you hired and what can get you fired," he said. "Almost every business does have a corporate culture which functions not much differently from explicit religious belief. It's not easy to say why the one is all right and the other is not."

Va. Delegate Proposes Juneteenth Measure (WP)

By Amy Gardner

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

RICHMOND, Jan. 22 -- The Virginia lawmaker who caused an uproar last week by questioning the need for a state apology for slavery proposed a measure Monday that would commemorate the freeing of the last U.S. slaves in June 1865.

Del. Frank D. Hargrove Sr., a Republican from Hanover County near Richmond, said he has been deluged with at least 4,000 phone calls and e-mails at his home and office since he inflamed the House of Delegates by saying that blacks should "get over" slavery and that apologizing for slavery was no more necessary than asking Jews to apologize for "killing Christ."

Hargrove said the vast majority of people who contacted him said they support his views, but he also said that he never intended to offend blacks or Jews. He offered the resolution in part to reach out to those he offended, he said.

"I think we can all agree that the end of slavery was a good thing," Hargrove said.

Black lawmakers said they are happy to support Hargrove's resolution to celebrate Juneteenth, but not if it is meant to replace theirs, which calls for Virginia to apologize for its role in slavery. The resolution is intended to coincide with the state's celebration of the 400th anniversary of the English settlement of Jamestown, where slaves first arrived in 1619.

"I can't question anybody else's motives," said Sen. Henry L. Marsh III, a Richmond Democrat and a sponsor of the apology proposal. "But obviously that resolution doesn't address the issues that we are trying to address."

Hargrove's resolution would celebrate Juneteenth, the widely observed name for the June 19, 1865, event in Galveston, Tex., in which federal troops are believed to have informed the country's last slaves that they were free. A number of organizations and jurisdictions celebrate Juneteenth to commemorate the moment when emancipation, foreseen in President Abraham Lincoln's 1863 Emancipation Proclamation, was finally recognized across the nation.

But Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond), another sponsor of the slavery apology, said it's one thing to recognize the end of slavery and quite another to offer an apology for Virginia's extensive role in it. McEachin thinks an apology is necessary to heal a state and a nation still divided by race.

Last week, the Richmond lawyer objected to Hargrove's assertion that "not a soul in this legislature" had anything to do with slavery. McEachin said he still hears stories from his 102-year-old grandmother about her parents, who were slaves in Virginia and North Carolina.

"Virginia didn't have anything to do with the Emancipation Proclamation," McEachin said. "It had a lot to do with establishing slavery here."

Hargrove said his measure is not intended to replace the apology. "I have no problem with that one going ahead," he said. "I won't vote for it, but I don't intend to block it, either."

Ga. Legislature Chimes In On Delta's Fight Against Takeover Bid (AP)

By Greg Bluestein

AP, January 23, 2007

ATLANTA - Georgia's legislative leaders signed a letter Monday urging the Justice Department to reject a takeover bid facing Delta Air Lines, the Atlanta-based carrier locked in a corporate battle to remain a stand-alone company.

The lawmakers said in the letter that a merger between Delta and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. would result in skyrocketing air fares and reduced competition.

"The tremendous amount of overlap between the route networks of these carriers will drive significant consolidation, reduce flight choices, increase fares for our consumers, affect jobs and have a negative impact on our region," the legislators said in the letter, which was addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The ceremonial signing by House Speaker Glenn Richardson and Senate President Pro-tem Eric Johnson drew a gaggle of reporters and lawmakers. It represents the latest attempt by Delta to bring its boardroom struggle into the public.

The airline, the nation's third-largest, has reached out to Atlanta's business and civic leaders and organized public rallies to protest the takeover bid launched by its archrival in November 2006.

US Airways hasn't backed off. After Delta's board rejected one proposal, US Airways upped its offer by 20 percent, making the merger's total value roughly $10.2 billion. The increased offer is set to expire Feb. 1 unless creditors indicate they support the due diligence process, which would open up Delta's books to US Airways.

Delta chief financial officer Ed Bastian, who attended Monday's event, said the airline's board will likely vote on the deal this week.

The airline is credited with helping to transform Atlanta's airport into the world's busiest and the city itself into an economic engine of the Southeast. But Delta was sent reeling after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. It filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in 2005, reporting a $2 billion loss.

Bastian said the company has rebounded since then and is making "great progress" in turning its fortunes around. In a reorganization plan filed in December, the company said it plans to emerge from bankruptcy by the middle of this year as a stand-alone carrier.

General Assembly Backs Delta On Merger Attempt At The Capitol (ABH)

By Vicki Eckenrode, Morris News Service

Athens (GA) Banner-Herald, January 23, 2007

ATLANTA - State lawmakers supporting Delta Air Lines' efforts to stave off a takeover from US Airways are sending a letter to federal justice officials reviewing the merger proposal.

A dozen Republican and Democratic legislators Monday signed the note to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, urging his office to carefully review US Airways' "hostile takeover bid."

"Along with the constituents we represent in Georgia, we also are very concerned about the significant loss of competition and the likely impact on air fares and regional concentration this merger will create," the letter states.

Legislators also on Monday introduced resolutions in the House and Senate voicing support for Atlanta-based Delta.

US Airways is offering Delta's creditors more than $10 billion in cash and stock to accept the merger.

Delta is fighting the offer and wants to emerge from bankruptcy this year standing on its own.

Delta's creditors have not yet weighed in on the bid. But if it is approved, the deal still will have to receive approval from the Justice Department because of antitrust questions.

A U.S. Senate committee on Wednesday also is expected to look at how the proposed merger would effect competition and air service on routes where the two airlines overlap.

State Senate Transportation Committee Chairman Jeff Mullis, R-Chickamauga, said state lawmakers sent the message to the Justice Department "to ensure that we do everything in our power that we see to keep Delta a Georgia company and here in our great state."

Delta Chief Financial Officer Ed Bastian, who attended a news conference Monday for the letter's signing, said the company remains on track to exit bankruptcy.

Airline officials have spent recent weeks rallying local governments, civic leaders and businesses across the state to fight the proposal on a public relations front.

Sen. Chip Pearson, R-Dawsonville, said he was concerned that a merger would reduce the number of flights in Georgia and effect businesses across the state.

"Those in secondary markets, such as Savannah, Augusta and Columbus, will be faced with higher air fare and fewer flight options," said Pearson, chairman of the Senate Economic Development committee. "The loss of Delta Air Lines would be a huge loss for the entire state of Georgia, not just the metro (Atlanta) area."

US Air's Offer For Delta Loses More Ground With Creditors (WSJ)

By Corey Dade, Susan Carey And Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

As a Senate committee prepares to take testimony tomorrow on consolidation in the airline industry, US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile $10.1 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. appears to be losing traction among creditors who will determine the fate of the Atlanta airline, according to people familiar with the matter.

After digging into the details of the US Airways offer -- which was sweetened 20% less than two weeks ago -- and hiring former Continental Airlines Inc. Chairman Gordon Bethune to help analyze its prospects, the Delta creditors' committee has grown skeptical of the proposed merger, these people said.

Separately, talks about a possible merger between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. have been put on hold, without a framework for a deal and without specific plans for further negotiations, according to people familiar with the thinking of both sides.

Delta creditors encouraged the talks, which culminated in a series of "detailed, specific conversations" among senior managers from the companies regarding potential structures, processes and timetables for a transaction, according to a person knowledgeable about the matter. A combination of Delta and Northwest remains "a very viable option," according to one person close to the situation, but isn't likely to be pursued until both airlines emerge from bankruptcy protection this year, if ever. Delta intends to leave Chapter 11 proceedings in April and has made its own proposal to creditors to emerge as a stand-alone company. Northwest hopes to emerge from bankruptcy-court protection in the second quarter.

The US Airways bid, which expires Feb. 1, is by no means dead. The situation could change, say people familiar with the situation, especially if Delta and its creditors have difficulty reaching agreement on issues such as board composition and compensation for the airline's management and employees. US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said yesterday that he has had no indication creditors are lining up against his bid. "We've given them what we think is a compelling offer," he said.

In a flurry of behind-the-scenes meetings over the past week, representatives from the creditors' committee and Delta have been trying to iron out issues related to the airline's hope to emerge from bankruptcy protection as an independent carrier. Issues have included how the Delta board will be selected, compensation for senior management, and how to compensate nonunion front-line Delta employees, according to several people close to the discussions.

Delta creditors and the executive search firm Spencer Stuart recently spent more than a day interviewing current board members, some of whom likely will remain. The unsecured creditors' committee also has begun assembling a slate of potential directors, according to several people close to the process. Mr. Bethune's name has been floated as a possible board chairman, but not all creditors support that option. Mr. Bethune has said he isn't looking for a job.

The makeup of the board would be pivotal if Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein keeps his pledge to retire after guiding the airline out of bankruptcy protection. The creditors' committee is seeking a strong hand alongside Delta's in selecting the directors, preferring members open to a merger that would keep Delta competitive in an anticipated wave of industry consolidation.

In his testimony tomorrow, Mr. Grinstein is expected to reprise his criticisms of the US Airways deal, which he says would cost thousands of Delta employees their jobs, severely diminish competition in many U.S. markets, and fail to pass antitrust scrutiny due to both airlines' concentrated operations on the East Coast. Some people involved in the Delta case believe the creditors are cooling on the US Airways offer, not for those reasons but because they think Delta management wouldn't cooperate to see the transaction through the antitrust process and other necessary steps.

Mr. Parker is expected to defend the merits of the merger, including $1.65 billion in cost and revenue synergies he promises will create a more-efficient and financially secure airline, similar to the merger he engineered in 2005 between America West Holdings Corp. and US Airways.

In a recent letter responding to questions from Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, Mr. Parker said the merger would offer New York travelers "more reasonable fares" and flights to every city served by the two airlines. "It simply doesn't follow that consolidation should or will lead to higher fares, and we have our own track record -- nationally and in New York -- to prove it," he said in the letter.

Cemex Extends $11.7 Billion Takeover Bid For Rinker (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Miriam Steffens

Bloomberg, January 23, 2007

Jan. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Cemex SA, the world's third-largest cement maker, extended its $11.7 billion hostile takeover bid for Australia's Rinker Group Ltd. by two months while it waits for U.S. regulatory approval.

Cemex's $13-a-share offer for Australia's biggest building materials company will now end March 30, the Monterrey, Mexico- based company said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today.

Cemex wants to buy Rinker because of its business in the U.S., which is focused on Florida, Arizona and Nevada, the fastest-growing states. The deal would make it the world's biggest cement maker. Cemex Chairman Lorenzo Zambrano said today the offer is ``compelling" while Rinker has described it as 36 percent too low.

Shares of Rinker fell 8 cents to A$18.22 at the market close in Sydney, which equates to $14.36 using today's exchange rate. The stock has gained 31 percent since Cemex made its bid on Oct. 27.

Rinker Chairman John Morschel on Nov. 29 said the Mexican company could ``offer a lot more," citing a report by adviser Grant Samuel & Associates Pty. which valued the stock at up to $17.74.

Cemex is offering to pay Rinker's shareholders in U.S. dollars, saying they can choose to be paid in Australian dollars at the exchange rate prevailing at the time of settlement.

U.S. antitrust regulators on Nov. 30 said they needed more information from both companies before being able to make a ruling on the proposed deal.

Earnings Report

This also gives Rinker more time to find alternatives to the Cemex offer. The Sydney-based company will report third-quarter earnings on Jan. 30, when it may face questions from investors on its defense strategy.

``The longer the process drags out, the more it plays into Rinker's hands in that the worst of the downturn in the Florida housing market may be in the past," Goldman Sachs JBWere Pty. said in a trading note today.

The Department of Justice's request for information was an indication Cemex may have to sell some assets in Arizona and Florida, where both companies have strong market positions, according to Andrew Dale, an analyst at Macquarie Bank Ltd. in Sydney.

The regulators intervened in Cemex's takeover of Britain's RMC Group Plc for 2.3 billion pounds ($4.5 billion) in 2005, allowing the purchase only on condition it sold RMC's ready-mix concrete operations in Tucson, Arizona, within six months to preserve competition.

Cemex's bid for Rinker would be the biggest takeover of an Australian company after a record year of acquisitions. Proposed takeovers in the country jumped to $200 billion last year, from $111 billion in 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

Cemex is advised by Citigroup Inc. UBS AG is assisting Rinker on its defense.

'Sticky' 3M Antitrust Lawsuits Finally Losing Their Grip (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, January 23, 2007

The company is poised to close the books on 10-plus years of antitrust litigation

With a proposed settlement worth nearly $40 million, office supply giant 3M is poised to close the books on more than a decade of litigating antitrust suits.

In a series of suits, a competitor and purchasers accused 3M -- the maker of Scotch tape and Post-It Notes -- of abusing its monopoly power in the market for transparent tape by driving a competitor out of business.

The $39.75 million settlement in Bradburn Parent/Teacher Store Inc. v. 3M -- a class action brought by direct purchasers and retailers -- comes on the heels of a trio of settlements reached last year.

In court papers filed last week, plaintiffs lawyers asked U.S. District Judge John R. Padova to grant final approval of the settlement and to award them attorney fees of $13.9 million and nearly $1 million in litigation costs for their 11,000 hours of work over four years.

In August, Padova approved a $28.8 million settlement in Meijer Inc. v. 3M, a class action brought on behalf of large-volume retailers who were excluded from the Bradburn case.

And court papers show that 3M also struck deals with two big retailers that had opted out of the Meijer case -- Kmart and Publix Supermarkets Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0120242

All of those suits stemmed directly from a 1997 suit, LePage's Inc. v. 3M, which resulted in a $68 million verdict in 1999 and a finding that 3M had set out to monopolize the market for transparent tape.

LePage's, a competing supplier of tape, had accused 3M of using illegal tactics to drive it out of business.

To do so, the suit said, 3M offered "bundled" rebates to large retailers for reaching sales goals in several categories of 3M products. In reality, the suit said, the rebates could be earned only by removing LePage's products from their shelves.

At trial, LePage's had argued that it landed significant contracts to provide retailers such as Staples and Kmart with "private label" or store-brand tape, but lost those accounts when 3M offered the "bundled rebates" since they could be earned only if the retailers purchased targeted amounts of several 3M products.

The effect of the bundled rebate program, LePage's said, was to force the retailers to drop LePage's as a supplier.

A jury agreed and in an October 1999 verdict awarded LePage's $22,828,899 in damages -- a figure that was automatically trebled by Padova, for a total judgment of $68,486,697.

On appeal, 3M won the first round when a three-judge panel of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the verdict, saying the case was fatally flawed because there was no evidence that 3M had ever slashed its prices to below-cost levels.

But the case was later reargued before a 10-judge en banc panel, which reinstated the verdict by a vote of 7-3. Writing for the majority, Circuit Judge Dolores K. Sloviter said LePage's had a valid antitrust claim because the evidence showed that 3M had set out to "kill" the niche market LePage's had created for discount "private label" tape.

The U.S. Supreme Court later refused to take the case up in an order handed down on the final day of its term in June 2004.

But for 3M, the litigation was hardly over because retailers responded to the suit by filing class actions that said the LePage's verdict had proven that the company was selling its tape at "supra-competitive" prices.

If the Bradburn settlement is approved by Padova, 3M will finally be finished with a 10-year stretch of litigation that has likely cost it well in excess of $200 million -- and that's not even counting the defense lawyers' fees.

In the court papers filed last week, the Bradburn plaintiffs team -- R. Stephen Berry, J. Daniel Leftwich and Gregory Baruch of Berry & Leftwich in Washington, D.C., and Charles M. Jones and Billy N. Jones of Jones Osteen & Jones in Hinesville, Ga. -- argued that the settlement is an excellent result that is likely to bring about few or no objections from the class members.

By recovering more than 40 percent of the class members' damages, the settlement is "in the top tier of antitrust settlements nationwide," the brief said.

Courts analyze the fairness of a class action settlement on the basis of a nine-factor test, and the plaintiffs team argues that the Bradburn settlement easily passes that test.

The suit was a highly complex one, they argue, and was litigated up to the point of trial. If not for the settlement, however, the case would likely have continued for years in post-trial motions and appeals.

But despite having strong claims and winning several key pretrial rulings, the plaintiffs' team also said the case was not without significant risks.

Among the issues that posed a challenge, they said, were proving that 3M's anti-competitive conduct had not only harmed LePage's, but had also harmed purchasers by driving up prices, and that "ongoing monopolization" after 1999 had harmed the class members.

And while the plaintiffs had an expert witness who was ready to testify that the purchasers suffered between $82 million and $96 million in damages, the brief said, lawyers for 3M would have called experts who would have insisted that none of the class members were overcharged since tape prices were declining or stabilized during the class period.

In their fee petition, also filed last week, the plaintiffs lawyers asked Padova to award them more than $13.9 million in attorney fees, equal to 35 percent of the settlement fund.

The petition notes that the $39.7 million settlement is the "highest single damages recovery against 3M, since the Meijer class settled for $27.7 million and the LePage's verdict, prior to trebling, was $22.8 million."

As a percentage of purchases, the brief said, the Bradburn settlement recovers about 18.5 percent of the class members' purchases, while the Meijer class recovered just 2 percent.

Kmart and Publix, both of which opted out of the Bradburn class, also settled for 2 percent of purchases, the brief said.

In an affidavit filed along with the fee petition, law professor Geoffrey Hazard said he believes a fee award of 35 percent -- despite being a higher percentage than is awarded in most class actions -- is "appropriate and justified" due to the value of the settlement.

Hazard said courts often approve antitrust settlements in which the class will recover only a small fraction of its damages -- often less than 20 percent -- while the Bradburn settlement recovers between 41 and 48 percent of the damages. And comparing the Bradburn settlement's recovery of 18.5 percent of purchases to the 2 percent of purchases settlements in the Meijer, Kmart and Publix cases, Hazard said, shows that the Bradburn settlement "is an exceptionally good one."

Qantas Bidders Try To Reassure Labor Unions (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The buyout group bidding for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. met with union officials yesterday, promising not to cut services or send maintenance operations offshore, amid fears about jobs and working conditions.

However, unions said they wanted legally binding guarantees to protect staff and would continue talks with the buyout consortium, Qantas and the Australian government.

The Airline Partners Australia consortium, which includes Macquarie Bank Ltd., Allco Finance Group Ltd., Allco Equity Partners Ltd. and North American private equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Onex Corp., said it talked with representatives from the Transport Workers Union and the Australian & International Pilots Association.

"We reassured the representatives that Airline Partners Australia supports the existing management's approach and it will be business as usual for Qantas and its employees," APA director Bob Mansfield said. He said the support extended to Qantas' 10 billion Australian dollar (US$7.9 billion) fleet-renewal program over the next five years, its substantial training program, and continuation of its two-brand carrier strategy.

Peter Somerville, chief executive of the pilots association, which represents more than 2,300 Qantas technical flight crew, described the meeting as "cordial, but frank."

REIT To Consider Another Takeover Bid (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Equity Office Properties, which agreed in November to be bought by a private equity company, the Blackstone Group, for $36 billion, including debt, said yesterday that it would begin discussions with a rival group that has offered to top that price.

Equity Office, the nation’s largest office landlord, with 585 buildings in 24 metropolitan areas, also said it would open its books to the challengers, a consortium led by Vornado Realty Trust.

Raising the stakes in what was already the largest buyout battle ever, Vornado and its partners, Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital, proposed last week to pay $52 a share for Equity Office, or 7.2 percent more than what Blackstone has offered. Vornado, a real estate investment trust that owns more than 100 million square feet of office, retail and showroom property, said its offer would include about $10.6 billion of its stock.

Setting a Jan. 31 deadline for the Vornado group to submit a formal proposal, Equity Office said it continued to recommend approval of the Blackstone merger.

A Blackstone spokesman, John Ford, had no comment, except to point out that the Blackstone deal could close three days after Equity Office shareholders approve the transaction. The vote is scheduled for Feb. 5.

Record Labels Contemplate Unrestricted Digital Music (NYT)

By Victoria Shannon

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

CANNES, France, Jan. 22 — As even digital music revenue growth falters because of rampant file-sharing by consumers, the major record labels are moving closer to releasing music on the Internet with no copying restrictions — a step they once vowed never to take.

Executives of several technology companies meeting here at Midem, the annual global trade fair for the music industry, said over the weekend that at least one of the four major record companies could move toward the sale of unrestricted digital files in the MP3 format within months.

Most independent record labels already sell tracks digitally compressed in the MP3 format, which can be downloaded, e-mailed or copied to computers, cellphones, portable music players and compact discs without limit.

The independents see providing songs in MP3 partly as a way of generating publicity that could lead to future sales.

For the major recording companies, however, selling in the MP3 format would be a capitulation to the power of the Internet, which has destroyed their control over the worldwide distribution of music.

Until last year, the industry was counting on online purchases of music, led by Apple's iTunes music store, to make up the difference.

But digital sales in 2006, while 80 percent ahead of the year before, grew slower than in 2005 and did not compensate for the decline in physical sales, according to an industry report released in London last week.

Even so, the move to MP3s is not inevitable, some insiders warn.

Publicly, music company executives say their systems for limiting copies are a way to fairly compensate artists and other copyright holders who contribute to the creation of music.

But privately, there are signs of a new appreciation in the industry for unrestricted copies, which could be sold as singles or through subscription services or made freely available on Internet sites that support advertising.

The EMI Group said last week that it would offer free streaming music on Baidu.com, the leading Web site and search engine in China, where 90 percent of music is pirated. EMI and Baidu also agreed to explore developing advertising-supported music download services. This summer EMI licensed its recording to Qtrax, an ad-supported music distribution service.

Experiments by Yahoo — last year it offered a handful of tracks from Norah Jones, Jessica Simpson, Jesse McCartney and Relient K without any digital restrictions — will continue this year, David Goldberg, vice president and general manager of Yahoo Music, said in an interview at Midem. Two of the major labels, Sony BMG and EMI, agreed to the tests in 2006.

In a handful of European countries, especially in France, consumer frustration has led to government proposals to legislate interoperability.

"There is a groundswell, and I say that on the basis of private conversations," said Rob Glaser, chief executive of RealNetworks, which sells digital music protected against piracy through the Rhapsody subscription service.

"It will happen between next year and five years from now, but it is more likely to be in one to two years," he said.

Legacy Issue: How Bush Is Preparing An About-turn To Tackle Climate Change (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

In his quest for a defining legacy beyond the Iraq war, tonight a chastened President George W. Bush in his State of the Union address will put energy security - reducing US dependence on foreign oil - at the heart of his political agenda for his final two years.

It is not a new issue for the former oilman. He trumpeted it in 2001, cemented by an energy strategy he summed up as: "We darn sure have to do a betterjob of finding more supply. We can't conserve our way to energy independence."

But this year will see a transformation in this view. In his past five State of the Union speeches, Mr Bush made no reference to global warming. Tonight he will make an explicit link between the demands of energy security and the environment, says Tony Snow, White House spokesman. "Energy and environmental policy are linked, for the simple reason that the president has talked about getting rid of an addiction to oil, and looking for alternative sources of energy which do not contribute to greenhouse gases or global warming."

The fact that Mr Bush is even talking about his actions on climate change, and will set out how his own policy helps address it, marks a profound departure from the past. Yet there remain doubts about whether the White House is willing to embrace more radical energy efficiency initiatives, or abandon its policy of the first six years of seeking to expand the supply of domestic oil.

The shift comes amid radical changes affecting Washington, from the shake-up in Congress in favour of the Democratic party to a freakish change in weather patterns. Last month the capital enjoyed a winter heatwave: Mr Bush went cycling as temperatures reached the 70s Fahrenheit (above 21 degrees Celsius), way higher than normal. Last year was the hottest in 112 years in the US.

On the other coast, normally warm winters have turned frigid and newspapers have been full of pictures of fresh California oranges on trees covered in icicles. This month the fate of weight-losing polar bears became front-page news when the White House for the first time conceded that climate change was a grave threat to their future. Dirk Kempthorne, interior secretary, said: "We are concerned the polar bear's habitat may literally be melting."

Yet the fact that Mr Bush will be talking about a linkage is one of the clearest signals that he feels the need to defend his efforts to cut greenhouse gases and address his image as a climate change sceptic, impassively looking on as the earth warms. Senior aides say he has been frustrated by the barrage of leaders admonishing him on global warming, from Tony Blair's constant solicitations to interventions by Angela Merkel, the German chancellor. Ban Ki-Moon, the new United Nations secretary general, last week also sandbagged him in the Oval Office on climate change.

Finally, it marks an acceptance that Democrats have transformed the Washington agenda, forcing a focus on a different kind of energy policy that gives high priority to climate change and energy efficiency. Interest in that agenda is evident in the box office success of former vice-president Al Gore's film, An Inconvenient Truth, a story of the impact of climate change that has grossed $24m (£12m, €19m) in the US. Last week Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House of Representatives, created the first ever select committee to focus on climate change and energy independence and called for an energy independence package by July 4.

Within their first two weeks in office, senators have introduced at least eight bills proposing mandatory limits on greenhouse gas emissions, including one from Republican Senator John McCain. That compares with just one substantive carbon bill in 2003 and two in 2005. In the first 100 legislative hours, the House voted to rescind $14bn in tax breaks for oil companies granted by the Bush administration.

Proposals to raise fuel economy standards for US vehicles, which remain below those of China, are receiving more attention. The powerful House environment and public works committee has seen a U-turn from the chairmanship of Republican Jim Inhofe, who called the threat of catastrophic climate change "the greatest hoax", to that of Barbara Boxer, who calls it a "crisis".

"Energy policy has become high politics. The concept of energy independence is embraced across the political spectrum, offering a starting point for talking about energy," says Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "The shift in Congress ensures this will be at the centre of debate for the next two years. It ties together national security, climate change, the future of the Middle East, the US relationship with Latin America and of course the burning political issue of what people pay the pump."

The resonance of the phrase "energy independence" is evident in the number of citations in the US press, rising from 1,245 in 2003 and 3,370 in 2005 to 6,082 last year. All the front-runners to be the Democratic presidential nominee in 2008 use it. Hillary Clinton wants to cut dependence on foreign oil in half by 2025. Senator Barack Obama wants to cut oil imports by the amount imported from the Middle East by 2025. Senator Joe Biden has conceded that the overall goal is "grandiose" but important.

Democrats' embrace of the ideal has convinced Mr Bushthat energy independence offers a chance for bipartisan co-operation. "The president wants this as a legacy issue and the Democratic congress needs to show it can get results in the next year," says Robert Hormats, vice-chairman at Goldman Sachs and former economic policy adviser to Henry Kissinger.

In fact, energy independence is something both parties could always agree on. President Richard Nixon first put it on the map when he launched Project Independence after oil prices jumped from $3 a barrel to $11. "In the year 1980, the United States will not be dependent on any other country for the energy we need to provide our jobs, to heat our homes and to keep our transportation moving," he predicted.

Gerald Ford sagely pushed the date back to 1985, but made progress introducing federal standards for energy efficiency for cars. In 1977 President Jimmy Carter called the energy crisis the "moral equivalent of war" and wore a woollen sweater in the White House in a sign of his personal conservation effort. Two years later he pledged: "This nation will never again use more foreign oil than we did in 1977 - never" and set the goal of "cutting our dependence on foreign oil by one-half by the end of the next decade".

All these initiatives, while slowing the rate of growth in US energy dependence, proved quixotic. Oil imports made up 35 per cent of US petroleum supplies in 1973. They have risen steadily since then to 40.5 per cent in 1980 and 66 per cent now, according to the Energy Information Administration. Dependence on imported oil has risen since Mr Bush took office, when it stood at 58 per cent.

George Shultz, former secretary of state, sees a stark change from three decades ago when he chaired task forces for Nixon on the oil import system and as Treasury secretary coped with the first big oil price explosion. The array of forces in favour of energy independence is stronger now, he says.

"The big difference I think is that in 1968-73, it was largely economic," he says. "Now there are people concerned about the environment, economics, national security. Those are very different constituencies and there is a chance they can interact together and produce something that will be different."

These constituencies, which have formed an unusually unwieldy coalition on energy independence, include national security hawks, dubbed "green hawks", concerned about dependence on oil from a volatile Middle East and oil giants such as Russia that use energy as a political weapon. The group includes Mr Shultz; John Deutch and James Woolsey, two former CIA directors; James Schlesinger, former defence secretary; and retired officers such as Air Force General Chuck Wald.

"Look where the money from high oil prices is going," says Mr Shultz. "Iran is rolling in money. Venezuela is rolling in money. Russia is consolidating an autocracy using oil money. We just hope Saudi Arabia keeps producing, because it is vulnerable."

The hawks find themselves strange bedfellows with trade unionists and the powerful Midwest farm lobby, which is eager to fan concerns about foreign oil in order to sustain the massive subsidies for ethanol, a renewable fuel created from corn. - Evangelical Christians have joined the coalition in order not to "destroy Creation": last February 86 evangelical leaders launched the Evangelical Climate Initiative.

US companies have also become more engaged, driven by self-interest, a desire to pre-empt punitive legislation and concern about the sprawling patchwork of regulation introduced by different states, such as Arnold Schwarzenegger, governor of -California (see right). A total of 22 states now require a fixed percentage of their electricity to come from renewable sourc es.

An alliance of 10 of the biggest US corporations yesterday joined environmental groups to demand caps on greenhouse emissions, to cut these by up to 30 per cent over the next 15 years. "Companies have concluded it is not 'if' but 'what' in terms of a carbon regime," says Mr Yergin. A Cera survey of electric utility chief executives and finance directors showed 85 per cent expected mandated restrictions within 10 years.

The Bush administration has been identified with efforts to boost US supply, to reduce dependence on foreign oil. Now, however, it could face more pressure to focus on energy efficiency, such as raising fuel economy standards.

On renewable fuels, the record has been mixed. The administration has shifted from backing hydrogen fuels in 2003 to ethanol last year. The $2bn it set aside for loan guarantees in renewable fuels has been snarled in bureaucracy. According to the General Accounting Office, the Department of Energy's budget for energy research and development fell by 85 per cent in real terms from 1978 to 2005 and has generated only "incremental progress in reducing costs for renewable energy technologies".

The White House therefore needs a bigger commitment to show that it is serious. Mr Bush is expected to set an aggressive target for how much ethanol US refiners must mix with gasoline, an attractive policy given the popularity of ethanol. "Carrots tend to work better than sticks," says Mr Snow. It has, however, ruled out imposing economy-wide caps on greenhouse gases. That sets it on a collision course with Capitol Hill. An industry lobbyist says: "Energy policy has been the creation of Congress. Almost anything Bush says in the speech is irrelevant the day after he says it."

Oil companies, demonised by many Democrats as "Big Oil", are fearful of the momentum against them. As Red Cavaney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, put it in a speech last week: "Bad energy legislation has a decades-long shelf life, through both its adverse direct effects as well as its chilling effect on investment through fear of 'what's next'."

CEOs Urge Bush To Limit Greenhouse Gas Emissions (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

On the eve of the State of the Union address, the chief executives of 10 major corporations urged President Bush to embrace mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in order to stem climate change.

But yesterday White House spokesman Tony Snow said that binding caps on carbon dioxide emissions would not be part of the president's proposals tonight. And a member of the corporate delegation said that last week the White House canceled a meeting with the executives that had been scheduled for yesterday morning.

"The President has always believed, when it comes to climate change, that the best way to achieve reductions is through innovation," Snow said, "and to figure out ways to come up with energy sources that are going to meet our economy's constant demand for energy, and at the same time, do it in a way that's going to be friendly for the environment."

There has been widespread speculation about what Bush might say about climate change tonight. Several legislative proposals have emerged in Congress with different ways for addressing climate change.

Major corporate leaders have been changing their position on climate change for the past year or two, and many of them are convinced that some form of regulation of or tax on carbon emissions is inevitable. With many states talking about coming up with their own laws, corporate leaders have started to urge the federal government to establish a nationwide standard.

"We can and must take prompt action to establish a coordinated, economy-wide market-driven approach to climate protection," the executives said in a letter to Bush. In an interview later, Jeffry E. Sterba, chairman of PNM Resources, a New Mexico utility, said that it was better to act now than to be forced to act in a "precipitous way" later.

The executives support a system that would create a cap on emissions, give allocations to companies based on past emissions and allow firms to trade allocations to meet gradually declining emission targets. The system, similar to one being used in Europe, would have far-reaching implications for utility rates, power plant construction, energy efficiency and American automobiles.

The executives' plan would slow the growth in greenhouse gases over the next five years, then reverse that growth and cut annual emissions by 70 percent to 90 percent of today's levels in 15 years.

Jeffrey Immelt, chairman of General Electric, pointing to initiatives in California and a group of Northeastern states, said "this is happening already." In addition to Immelt and Sterba, the group included the chief executives of Lehman Brothers Holdings, PG&E, Alcoa, Caterpillar, BP America, Duke Energy, DuPont and FPL Group.

Snow said that he thought Bush's proposals "address in a comprehensive and realistic way concerns about greenhouse emissions, and also their primary sources."

NEW CONSENSUS In Climate Controversy, Industry Cedes Ground (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The global-warming debate is shifting from science to economics.

For years, the fight over the Earth's rising temperature has been mostly over what's causing it: fossil-fuel emissions or natural factors beyond man's control. Now, some of the country's biggest industrial companies are acknowledging that fossil fuels are a major culprit whose emissions should be cut significantly over time.

A growing number of these companies are pushing for a mandatory emissions limit, or "cap." Some see a lucrative new market in clean-energy technologies. Many figure a regulation is politically inevitable and they want to be in the room when it's negotiated, to minimize the burden that falls on them.

The broadening, if incomplete, consensus that fossil fuels are at least a big part of the global-warming problem signals real change in the environmental debate. The biggest question going forward no longer is whether fossil-fuel emissions should be curbed. It's who will foot the bill for the cleanup -- and that battle is heating up.

Yesterday, 10 companies, including industrial giants that make everything from bulldozers to chemicals to electricity, joined environmental groups in calling for a federal law to "slow, stop and reverse the growth" of global-warming emissions "over the shortest period of time reasonably achievable." Tonight, President Bush, whose administration has rejected such caps as economically unacceptable, will deliver a State of the Union address in which he's expected to announce a bigger push for such things as low-emission alternative fuels.

In the center of the regulatory cross hairs are utilities. They're the world's biggest emitters of carbon dioxide, the global-warming gas that's produced whenever fossil fuels are burned. Written one way, a cap would help utilities in the Southeast or the Midwest, which burn lots of coal, a particularly carbon-intensive fuel. Written another way, a rule would help utilities on the West Coast, the Northeast and the Gulf Coast. They use mainly natural gas, which produces lower CO2 emissions than coal, and nuclear energy, which produces essentially no CO2.

Auto makers and oil producers also are worried about a potential cap, and they're lashing out at each other. The Big Three auto companies are making speeches and running advertisements calling on Big Oil to crank out more low-carbon alternative fuels such as corn-based ethanol. Big Oil, in its own speeches and ads, says the auto makers should build more-efficient cars.

Lobbying on the issue is ramping up. The American Iron and Steel Institute, which opposes any emission cap, this month assigned an executive who had been working broadly on environmental issues to focus specifically on global warming. Some companies that oppose a cap argue it would raise their costs and hurt their competitiveness against rivals in developing countries such as China, where no cap exists.

DuPont Co., the chemical giant, heartily endorses a cap in part because it figures it would help boost demand for energy-efficiency products the company makes.

Entergy Corp., a utility that's also pushing for a cap, had a lobbyist in the room last week when Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, announced a carbon-cap bill. Entergy would likely benefit from her measure because the company's fuel mix includes a lot of low-carbon fuels.

"It was a hand-holding, kumbaya moment," says Brent Dorsey, Entergy's director of corporate environmental programs. "Every company is going to be playing to their own strengths and weaknesses" in the regulatory battle that's breaking out over global warming, he adds.

Among scientists, a broadening consensus has developed that fossil-fuel emissions are contributing to global warming; the debate has been over whether they're the main cause. In 2001, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a United Nations body that periodically assesses climate science, cited "new and stronger evidence that most of the warming observed over the last 50 years is attributable to human activities." In 2005, representatives of scientific societies from 11 countries, including the U.S., called the science "sufficiently clear to justify nations taking prompt action."

Still, uncertainties remain. Among them, the U.N. panel noted in its 2001 report, is the extent to which "natural factors" unrelated to human activity play a role in the rising temperatures. The U.N. panel is set to release its next climate-science report Feb. 2.

Fossil fuels provided 80% of global energy in 2004, and they're on track to provide 81% in 2030, according to the International Energy Agency, a Paris-based energy watchdog for Western industrialized countries.

Significantly curbing their emissions would require sweeping technological change, from more-efficient power plants and cars to the potential injection and burial of massive amounts of CO2 underground.

Another possibility would be to reduce the rate of growth in fossil-fuel consumption by supplementing the fuel mix with alternatives, from nuclear power to crops to the wind and the sun.

Outside the U.S., many countries already have modest experience in emissions caps, thanks to the Kyoto Protocol. The treaty, which hasn't been ratified by the U.S., requires ratifying nations collectively to cut their emissions 5% below 1990 levels by 2012.

Several Northeast states and California already have announced plans to impose emission caps of their own. And a handful of proposed federal caps are under consideration in Congress. The least stringent is one from senators led by Jeff Bingaman, a New Mexico Democrat. By 2030, it would raise gasoline prices 12 cents per gallon, according to a study issued this month by the U.S. Energy Information Administration, and slow the rate at which U.S. coal consumption increases.

The federal proposals differ in the structural details of the "cap and trade" system they would set up to regulate CO2 emissions. Under such a system, the government would set a ceiling on how much CO2 the U.S. economy -- or whichever sectors lawmakers pick -- could emit each year. It would ink a corresponding number of pollution permits, each entitling the bearer to emit one ton of the gas.

Then, based on complex allocation rules it devises, the government would divide up the permits among companies. Those companies could buy and sell permits among themselves on a greenhouse-gas market like a Kyoto-related one already under way outside the U.S. Companies that decide it's too expensive to cut their own emissions enough to comply with their government cap would go to the market and buy extra emission permits from companies that ended up with more than they needed. The theory behind the market is to create an economy of scale that reduces everyone's cost.

Other regulatory structures are possible, including a straight tax on CO2 emissions. Politically, a cap-and-trade system is more popular than a tax. Environmentalists like the severity of an absolute ceiling on the amount of CO2 companies can emit. Industry likes the flexibility of a market in which permits to pollute can be bought and sold.

And cap-and-trade systems already are in use. The U.S. has had one for more than a decade to curb the pollution that causes acid rain, a regulation widely viewed as successful.

Still, Steven Rowlan, director of environmental affairs for Nucor Corp., one of the biggest U.S. steelmakers, warns U.S. industry is in for a shock if Washington follows Europe and imposes a global-warming cap. The U.S. steel industry already has gotten more energy-efficient in recent years, he says, so it would be unfair to require it to make further emission cuts while its competitors in the developing world, where emissions are rising fastest, remain free from a cap. The steelmaking process itself emits large amounts of CO2.

A smarter tactic, he says, would be for the U.S. to slap trade restrictions on developing-world steelmakers requiring them to meet minimum environmental standards as a condition for exporting their products to the U.S.

"The biggest hammer that the United States has is its market," Mr. Rowlan says. "And that, more than anything we do domestically, will have the greatest impact on greenhouse gases." Nucor, based in Charlotte, N.C., is considering running ads to drive this point home.

DuPont, on the other hand, is actively promoting an emissions cap. It thinks a cap would help its business. DuPont makes materials used in such devices as solar cells, wind turbines, fuel cells, and lightweight automobiles -- all of which are likely to be in higher demand in an economy in which CO2 emissions carry a cost.

"We think there is a lot of market opportunity," says Linda Fisher, a former U.S. Environmental Protection Agency official who's now DuPont's chief sustainability officer.

But DuPont, based in Wilmington, Del., doesn't want just any cap. For one thing, it wants a cap that covers all sectors of the economy -- not one that's limited to utilities, as are some proposals pending in Washington. The more industries covered by a cap, the more potential customers for DuPont's environmental products.

DuPont also wants a cap to award companies credit for past emission cuts they've made. DuPont already has invested to significantly cut its emissions.

Utilities, for their part, are split on whether they want a cap -- and, if so, what kind. Where a utility stands on this issue depends largely on where in the country it sits.

Duke Energy Corp., based in Charlotte, is the country's third-largest burner of coal, though it also has significant nuclear assets. It's pushing for permits to be distributed based on the amount of CO2 a utility has emitted in the past -- a system that would protect big coal burners such as itself.

James Rogers, Duke's chairman and chief executive, notes that Duke already is assuming in its investment decisions that it will have to pay for carbon emissions. So it has begun investing in new plants that will burn coal more cleanly than today's plants do. He argues any cap should ensure adequate permits to utilities making such investments. "It's going to take several decades to bring this on," he says of the technology. "We shouldn't have an economic scheme that puts an undue economic burden on regions of the country that are reliant on coal."

Given Duke's coal reliance, it might seem strange that Mr. Rogers has emerged in recent years as perhaps the U.S. utility industry's most outspoken proponent of a global-warming constraint. His position is a bit "awkward," he notes, because he also serves as chairman of the Edison Electric Institute, the electric industry's Washington trade group, which opposes any mandatory global-warming cap. He's set to speak on three panels discussing global warming this week at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Mr. Rogers, wearing his Duke hat, says he's just being realistic. He has concluded a cap is coming -- and that his shareholders are likely to do better if he can influence the details. "If you're not at the table when these negotiations are going on, you're going to be on the menu," he says. "This is about being at the table."

Fighting Duke and other coal-burners are utilities such as Entergy. Based in New Orleans, it uses a lot of natural gas and nuclear fuel. Unlike Duke, Entergy wants permits to be distributed based on a utility's total electricity output -- a system likely to give low-carbon generators such as itself excess permits they could sell.

Duke's Mr. Rogers says that would amount to a "windfall" for low-carbon utilities. "Even though they don't need allowances, they would get them, just because," he says.

Entergy's Mr. Dorsey says his company isn't asking for a windfall. The permits Entergy would get amount to "a revenue stream that we will need to build a new nuclear plant," he says. Still, he allows, "because of our natural gas and nuclear, we will fare better than most" under a carbon cap.

Auto companies also are jockeying to shape a potential carbon constraint to their advantage. They've been playing this sort of regulatory game for years.

They already face a kind of carbon limit in the federal government's longstanding fuel-economy standards for cars and trucks, because vehicles that burn less gasoline emit less CO2. Those rules give auto makers extra credit for building versions of their conventional vehicles they've modified to run on either gasoline or ethanol. Very few of those vehicles actually wind up running on anything but gasoline. But the credits let the auto makers build more thirsty sport-utility vehicles and pickup trucks -- the industry's bread and butter, particularly when oil was cheaper.

Auto officials who declined to be named said the industry probably will accept some toughening of the fuel-economy standards. But in return, it may seek bigger credits for selling vehicles that burn less oil, including those that can run on ethanol.

At the same time, auto makers want to ensure other industries get hit. In a speech last week in Detroit, Rick Wagoner, General Motors Corp.'s chairman and chief executive, said his company plans to build more ethanol-capable and electric-powered vehicles. But he also stressed "important roles for other industries, like oil and electric utilities, to name a few." He called for more tax credits and subsidies for alternative fuels.

The oil industry itself is mobilizing -- including Exxon Mobil Corp., the Irving, Texas, oil giant that in the past has been outspoken in its questioning of global-warming theories. Scientific questions remain, says Kenneth Cohen, Exxon's vice president for public affairs, but "we know enough now -- or society knows enough now -- that the risk is serious and action should be taken." Exxon isn't calling for an emission constraint, but it's starting to talk about how it wants one structured if one is imposed.

In November, Rex Tillerson, Exxon's chairman and chief executive, called in a speech for "steps now to reduce emissions in effective and meaningful ways." Then he listed two: boosting automotive fuel economy and cutting emissions from coal-fired power plants.

Springtime For Ethanol (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol industry's major lobbyist, works out of cramped offices that it shares with a lawyer near Capitol Hill. Pictures of ethanol plants from its 61 board members hang everywhere. "We're about to run out of wall space," said Bob Dinneen, the association's president.

DOJ_NMG_0120251

The association may only have six staff members but it is now bursting with energy, a far cry from the early days when its founder, a South Dakota farm boy who was convinced America needed to break the stranglehold of foreign oil, quit in frustration after four years.

After three decades of surviving mostly on tax subsidies, the industry is poised tonight to get its biggest endorsement from on high that it has a long-term future as a home-grown alternative to gasoline.

In his State of the Union address, President Bush is expected to call for a huge increase in the amount of ethanol that refiners mix with gasoline, probably double the current goal of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012.

While the details of the proposal are not known, 15 billion gallons of ethanol would work out to more than 10 percent of the country's current gasoline consumption, and is far beyond the current capacity of about 5.4 billion gallons.

At least half of the new ethanol would come from corn, signaling the administration's support to the Midwest farm states that have benefited the most from the recent ethanol boom.

For an industry once dominated by the will of a single powerful producer, Archer Daniels Midland, ethanol has come a long way, joining the oil industry and producers of major agricultural commodities as an entrenched political force in Washington. And it now enjoys a powerful role in presidential politics because of Iowa's status as one of the first states to select delegates to the parties' nominating conventions.

But with dozens of new ethanol plants coming online this year, the ethanol lobby is facing a critical point. The political reality is that corn's days as the chief crop for making the fuel may be numbered.

Corn-based ethanol can only marginally reduce America's dependence on foreign oil. But it does little, if anything, to improve energy efficiency, and the mounting concern of some politicians is that relying on corn is leading to collateral damage in other parts of the agricultural economy and threatening the nation's status as the leading corn exporter. The big increase in the works may mean consumers would end up paying more at the supermarket.

So the ethanol lobby and its political supporters now face the challenge of trying to maintain the momentum of ethanol's feel-good story before the potential negative consequences of the rapid ramp-up become all too apparent.

Clutching the reins these last five years is Mr. Dinneen, a longtime Washington lobbyist who joined the association in 1988. He recalled his early years there as a pitched war with the oil industry. "I would wake up in the morning and try to think of a way to vilify the oil guys," he said.

Today, to keep the ethanol train moving, ethanol makers are cozying up to the oil industry, forming political alliances and enlisting executives from companies like Chevron as they race to make a quicker transition to cellulosic ethanol made from nonfood crops, like switchgrass.

Otherwise, public support could turn against the fuel, which yields a third less energy than petroleum-based gasoline and still relies on a federal subsidy of 51 cents a gallon to remain competitive.

"We are no longer debating whether this makes sense, if this public policy should be pursued," Mr. Dinneen said. "The discourse now is how much ethanol can we produce, how quickly can we produce it and what is the pathway for greater production of domestic renewables."

That pathway, at the moment, relies on commercializing cellulosic ethanol made from crops like switchgrass or wood chips, which today is twice as expensive to produce as ethanol made from corn.

Some analysts, though, believe that politics has already trumped economics. "Once we have a corn-based technology up and running the political system will protect it," said Lawrence J. Goldstein, a board member at the Energy Policy Research Foundation. "We cannot afford to have 15 billion gallons of corn-based ethanol in 2015, and that's exactly where we are headed."

Mr. Goldstein said that rather than speed up the process of producing more ethanol, Congress should "step back and reflect on the damage we have already done."

By contrast, ethanol advocates in Congress are pushing to accelerate research into cellulosic sources with the stated goal of speeding the timetable for when corn can be supplemented — or supplanted — as the chief ethanol crop.

"We need additional funds for transitioning to making more energy crops for our national security," Senator Tom Harkin, an Iowa Democrat and the new chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, said in an interview earlier this month."

The agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns, said there will be an "adjustment period" for ethanol that will last a few years. But he is confident that more corn will emerge to ease the pain of higher grain prices, as seed companies improve yields and farmers shift their acreage from other crops. "When you look at the whole constellation of issues, and advancements that are out there, it is a very encouraging time for agriculture," Mr. Johanns said in an interview.

The race to crack the code to produce cellulosic ethanol more efficiently has attracted dozens of researchers, venture capitalists and even the interest of major oil companies like BP and Chevron. Vinod Khosla, a major venture capitalist who has poured money into seven different start-up companies, has been pushing Washington lawmakers to set more aggressive targets to ensure that the demand for corn moves beyond corn. "If I am going to take the risk, the market has to be big," Mr. Khosla said.

The Renewable Fuels Association is trying to balance the competing concerns. The organization was not always interested in rapid expansion, particularly if that meant allowing competition for A.D.M. from sources like Brazilian sugar. David Hallberg, the association's founding president, said he left after four years in the job partly because he grew tired of disputes with A.D.M. executives over the future direction of the industry.

"I thought my job was to grow the industry to be as large as it could be," said Mr. Hallberg, who denied he was forced out. "That isn't what our bigger members always wanted."

By the time Mr. Hallberg left the organization in 1985, oil prices had plummeted to $9 a barrel, making ethanol uneconomic as a fuel. The industry turned its efforts toward selling ethanol as an oxygen enhancer for gasoline that could lift octane and reduce carbon monoxide.

With the influence of Dwayne O. Andreas, A.D.M.'s longtime chief executive and now chairman emeritus, Congress passed the federal excise tax in 1978 that gave ethanol its primary subsidy, a credit worth 51 cents per gallon of ethanol, or $21 per barrel of oil. Mr. Andreas had powerful friends in Congress, including Senator Robert J. Dole, a Republican from Kansas who rose to majority leader and who pushed consistently over the years to retain the ethanol subsidy.

In those early days the influence of Mr. Andreas and A.D.M.'s generous contributions to both Republicans and Democrats kept ethanol alive. The company also held greater sway within the organization because of its great weight as an ethanol producer. Even today, at around 25 percent of total ethanol capacity, A.D.M. remains the largest maker.

At first, the ethanol producers had few allies. The National Corn Growers Association was agnostic about ethanol at best, and the American Farm Bureau opposed ethanol, worrying that it could raise the price of livestock feed and cut into exports, Mr. Hallberg said.

That began to change in the late 1980s when the groups began to work together to supply ethanol to some 30 cities as a gasoline additive in the winter months. Those months were also when A.D.M.'s wet mill corn processing plants made more ethanol.

While the ethanol and corn forces preferred their wintertime plan, they later threw their support behind a federal proposal to implement a reformulated gasoline with an "oxygenate" — either ethanol or methyl tertiary-butyl ether — in nine of the country's smoggiest cities. The program took effect in 1995.

Ethanol's big breakthrough came over the battle to ban M.T.B.E. After gasoline spills in California revealed that M.T.B.E. could corrode groundwater, the Renewable Fuels Association and the corn growers were among those pushing ethanol as an environmentally safer alternative.

California banned M.T.B.E. in 1999 and requested a waiver from the federal oxygenate standard, arguing it could make a cleaner-burning gasoline without ethanol. President Bush rejected the waiver, spurring an ethanol construction miniboom.

In 2001, Mr. Dinneen took over as president, focused on reaching détente with the oil industry. To win approval for the renewable fuels standard, he eventually cobbled together an unlikely coalition of consumer groups, the American Petroleum Institute and environmentalists like the Natural Resources Defense Council.

The fuel standard Congress approved in 2005, which called for a ramp-up of ethanol use to 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, ended up lighting a fire under the industry. When oil prices shot over $50 a barrel, ethanol became profitable, and then President Bush set off an industry building boom when he said last January that "America is addicted to oil."

It helped that the mix of ethanol's advocates had been changing. About a decade ago farmers began investing in ethanol plants; today more than half of the 110 ethanol plants in production are at least partly owned by farmers. The ownership by farmers brought home the rural benefits of the ethanol industry more directly.

The association's expanding board, which is 10 times the size it was some 20 years ago, has also become more diverse and less beholden to the business agendas of its biggest members.

As ethanol expands, Mr. Dinneen dismissed the concerns of some economists that its explosive growth could threaten exports and livestock prices, and that a potential investment bubble could burst before cellulosic ethanol has a chance to hit the market.

"I don't get all that worried that we are building too fast," he said. "I am not bright enough or foolish enough to try to control the market."

Ethanol Production Booming On Demand (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The energy agenda in Washington has been long dominated by oil interests, but in a reversal of political fortunes, these days it is Big Oil fighting to preserve its tax incentives and the ethanol industry that is adding new ones.

President Bush may up the ante tonight in his State of the Union address, many analysts think, by setting new targets for ethanol use or encouraging automakers to shift to engines capable of handling E85, a fuel that is 85 percent ethanol.

The ethanol industry is already on a roll: This year's production will surpass the mandate set for 2012 -- 7.5 billion gallons -- in the Energy Policy Act of 2005. And investors drove up the stock prices of ethanol companies yesterday in anticipation of Bush's speech. Though the stock market fell, shares of VeraSun Energy Corp. soared 7.2 percent and Pacific Ethanol Inc. jumped 7.6 percent. (One senator has invited VeraSun's chief executive to attend Bush's speech.) Bush may have trouble matching proposals made by Democratic lawmakers and farm-state Republicans. Sens. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) have proposed raising to 60 billion gallons a year the amount of ethanol that oil companies must mix into automotive fuel supplies by 2030. That would amount to 3.9 million barrels a day, more than a third of current gasoline consumption.

Bill Wicker, communications director at the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said that biofuel and ethanol executives and lobbyists keep the committee's fuels expert busy "from the time she gets in in the morning until the time she grabs her coat to go home. It's a pretty steady stream of customers."

But an increasing number of economists and energy experts are questioning whether the benefits of producing ethanol -- especially ethanol made from corn -- have been oversold. They say that rising ethanol production is driving up corn prices, adding to summer smog and draining investment from other energy projects.

"We think that corn-based ethanol will grow to about 10 percent of the total gasoline pool, which is a significant number. It's the same level as Indonesia's oil production," said Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "But then you really do run into the fuel-versus-food tradeoffs, which we're already beginning to see some signs of."

There are 111 ethanol refineries nationwide, with the capacity to produce more than 5.4 billion gallons annually, according to the Renewable Fuels Association. There are 78 ethanol refineries and eight expansions under construction with a combined annual capacity of more than 6 billion gallons.

Lester R. Brown, president of the Earth Policy Institute, said that existing ethanol refineries plus refineries under construction will gobble up half the U.S. corn harvest in 2008. That in turn will set up a global competition between rich automobile users and poor food consumers, Brown said.

Even at current levels, ethanol production is driving up demand for corn, and corn prices as a result. Many foods rely on corn feed and corn sweeteners, so prices could rise as well for a wide variety of goods. Because the United States accounts for 40 percent of the global corn harvest, higher corn prices here will affect consumers worldwide, Brown said. Last week, Mexican President Felipe CalderÃ³n sought to defuse anger over the rising price of corn tortillas by persuading producers to accept voluntary price controls.

Ethanol also has foes in the environmental community. Because ethanol is a less stable compound than other additives, in the summer it evaporates easily and contributes to greater smog levels.

Meanwhile, an effective tariff protects American-made ethanol from cheaper imports from Brazil and elsewhere.

Many ethanol boosters say that the industry will move away from corn to cellulosic sources. But it remains unclear whether that technology will work. In December, when the Joint Committee on Taxation calculated the five-year cost of a tax break for the builders of cellulosic ethanol plants, the low cost suggested that it expected no more than one plant up and running by 2012.

Economists have also been warring over the question of how much energy it takes to produce ethanol. Most experts say that distilleries produce slightly more energy than they consume. But growing more corn has other costs, such as greater soil erosion and pesticide use. The numbers vary widely depending on process and location.

While the controversy continues, so does the boom. An economist at Iowa State University has calculated that when the ethanol distilleries under construction in Iowa are complete, the state will become a corn importer. But with the early start of the 2008 presidential fray, few politicians will suggest putting the brakes on corn ethanol for fear of alienating voters in Iowa caucuses, the first contest for presidential candidates.

Internal Rifts Cloud Democrats' Opportunity On Warming (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin And Michael Grunwald

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The House Democrats had not quite finished their "100 hours" agenda when they met in the Capitol basement Thursday morning, but Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) was already looking ahead. As her colleagues ate bagels and turkey sausage, she warned that their next challenge would be a lot tougher than popular issues such as student loans and ethics reforms. For her next act, she planned to take on global warming.

Democrats, she explained, had to show a sense of urgency about the carbon emissions that threaten the planet, and so she was creating a select committee on energy independence and climate change to communicate that urgency. The new committee, she said, would help the caucus speak with one voice -- even if it trampled the turf of existing committees.

Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), a close Pelosi ally, raised his gavel and asked whether anyone had anything else to say, in the same pro forma way that question is posed at weddings. "One, do I hear anything?" he asked. "Two do I hear, 2 1/2 do I hear, three." Emanuel's gavel came down. "The caucus meeting is over."

Pelosi's power play demonstrated her seriousness about climate, a complex issue that may be as legislatively difficult and politically treacherous as health care was in the 1990s. But it also reflected her seriousness about imposing discipline on her caucus and preventing a return to the days when long-serving Democratic chairmen ran their committees as independent fiefdoms.

Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (Mich.) -- the longest-serving House member and a legendary defender of his committee's prerogatives as well as the carbon-emitting auto industry of his home state -- had made it clear that he expected to lead the party's global-warming debate in a rather leisurely fashion. Pelosi was end-running him.

When "Big John" chaired Energy and Commerce from 1981 to 1995, the prickly power broker displayed a prominent photo of the Earth to illustrate his view of the panel's jurisdiction. Now the photo is back, along with Dingell's determination to resist interference. A few hours after Pelosi presented her plan to the caucus, Dingell convened the 31 Democrats on Energy and Commerce. Predictably, he saw Pelosi's new committee as a recipe for duplication, incompetence and the suppression of democracy.

Less predictably, Dingell was supported by a longtime Energy and Commerce rival, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, a California liberal who agrees with Pelosi about global warming and persuaded her to co-sponsor his own aggressive climate bill last year, but who also wants her to respect her chairmen. That's because he chairs the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, where he plans to hold hearings on his bill. At the Energy and Commerce meeting, he warned that Pelosi might be scheming to write bills out of her own office.

"That's the way the Republicans did it," Waxman said.

DOJ_NMG_0120255

Those are fighting words in the new majority, and some Energy and Commerce Democrats are willing to fight. Several with mixed feelings about drastic carbon regulations -- including Rep. Rick Boucher, who represents a coal-heavy Virginia district and chairs the subcommittee on energy and air quality -- discussed working with Republicans to defeat the new committee on the House floor.

The strict emissions cuts that Pelosi supports had no chance in the GOP Congress, but they still face an uphill climb. Carbon-reliant industries including coal, oil, agriculture and manufacturing will resist any strong legislation, a position that will pose serious dilemmas for Democrats in districts where those industries and their unions hold sway. Some representatives of low-income minority districts are also concerned that a climate bill would slap heavy energy costs on their constituents.

Even if Pelosi manages to finagle a bill through the House, there is the problem of the Senate, where global-warming skeptic James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) has lost his chairmanship to climate-conscious Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) but has threatened a filibuster. And President Bush seems unlikely to sign anything too far-reaching.

That is why some environmentalists want Pelosi to delay until she can send a bill to a more sympathetic president in 2009, and why some Democrats want her to delay so they can use the issue against Republicans in 2008.

"It's a briar patch," said one industry lobbyist. "I can understand why Pelosi wants to hold hearings to show the Democrats care, but I can't believe she really wants to try to legislate."

But Pelosi and her leadership team believe action will be good politics as well as policy, branding climate as a Democratic issue while showing the caucus that recalcitrant chairmen are no longer free to freelance. Pelosi had already warned Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) not to use the Judiciary Committee to try to impeach Bush, and she denied her rival Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) the gavel of the Intelligence Committee. Less than two hours after the mutinous Energy and Commerce meeting, she stood up to Dingell as well, holding a news conference to declare her select committee a done deal.

"It says to the American people, we are about the future," she said.Act Fast vs. Go Slow

Rep. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.) is worried about the future on a hotter planet, and the posters in his office show why. There's Glacier National Park, where Inslee believes "there will be no glaciers in 50 years." There's Mount Rainier, where alpine meadows are retreating as higher temperatures push the tree line higher. There's a photo of his 28-year-old son, Connor, skiing down Washington's Stevens Pass; two years ago, there was so little snow on the mountain that Connor could only work on the ski patrol for a few days.

For the first decade of Inslee's congressional career, Republicans controlled Congress, and emissions-reduction rules were about as likely as new gun restrictions or same-sex marriage rights. But now Inslee and many of his colleagues speak with a fervor reminiscent of the GOP revolutionaries who seized the House in 1995 and immediately wanted to shake things up.

"The flat-Earth society has been removed from power," Inslee said. "This opens the door to meaningful change."

Inslee is just a back-bencher on Energy and Commerce, but he is already trying to hash out details of climate change legislation. Last week, he spent an hour on the phone with Duke Energy chief executive Jim Rogers, who has endorsed a limit on carbon emissions. They delved into the details of how a limit could work, how to promote cleaner technologies, how it is easier to sequester carbon in the soil in Indiana than in North Carolina.

Inslee has no patience for the go-slow crowd that thinks Democrats would be smarter to grandstand the climate issue in 2008, then work with an eco-friendlier president in 2009. He wants to get to work.

"This should not be a planning year," he said. "This should not be a debating year. This should be an action year."

Dingell represents the other side of the debate, the side that is quick to point out that overzealous restrictions on emissions could decimate the U.S. economy. He wants to hold extensive hearings on climate change, to investigate the problem, if in fact it is a problem, and what it might cost to try to address it. That is the way he has dealt with issues since he came to Congress during the first Eisenhower administration. He says global warming will be a priority for his committee, but clearly not the only priority.

"We've got Medicaid, Medicare, health insurance, prescription drugs," Dingell said. "We've got leaky underground storage tanks."

Leaky underground storage tanks? When Glacier National Park is melting?

DOJ_NMG_0120256

"Superfund isn't being properly administered," he continued. "We have safe drinking water . . . what else?" His chief of staff, former auto lobbyist Dennis Fitzgibbons, mentions telecommunications, and Dingell is back to his list: Net neutrality. Universal service. "We have to address high-definition television, and a similar issue with regard to radio . . . "

Pelosi and her allies may think CO2 is more important than HDTV, but Dingell will not be rushed. He mentions that the politics of carbon are "substantially similar, if not identical" to the politics of the Clean Air Act, which required a decade of debate before it was amended in 1990 to deal with acid rain. He does not mention that his own opposition was the main obstacle to action, or that environmentalists -- who had loved his work on the Endangered Species Act and other wildlife protections -- dubbed him "Tailpipe Johnny" during the acid-rain debate.

Dingell is an older bull now; at 80, he sometimes walks with a cane, and his hearing aid doesn't seem to work as well as it once did. But he is still a formidable figure on the Hill, and he grumbles that it takes time to build consensus.

"I could bring up a bill like that," he said with a snap of his fingers. "It would take about a week, and I could get it on the floor a week or so after that, and I can give you the absolute certainty that it will not become law. I'm not sure you want that, do you?"

But Pelosi draws her power from the Inslees of the caucus, and they believe that the time for deliberation has passed. Inslee is careful to pay homage to Dingell, "one of the most brilliant people I've ever met in public policy, but he rejects the chairman's comparison of global warming to acid rain."

"The challenge we're facing is a hundredfold more critical," Inslee said. "We need to address this on an emergency basis." And he believes that Pelosi, with support from green manufacturers and green evangelicals as well as the usual green groups, will break the logjam on Capitol Hill -- with or without Dingell's help.

"She is willing to make a few omelets, which is to say, break a few eggs," Inslee said.A Question of Tactics

In the old Congress, with J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) as speaker of the House, the "majority of the majority" ruled. Policies were hashed out inside the GOP caucus, which was dominated by conservatives; Hastert's team then pressured the entire caucus to back them. The result was a steady tack to the right -- and eventually, electoral disaster, especially for GOP moderates.

Pelosi has promised a more open and bipartisan process and has said she will not drag her caucus to the left. But global warming could be a telling test. Inslee's support for fast and aggressive legislation to reduce emissions is probably supported by a majority of House Democrats -- but not a majority of Congress.

On the other hand, when Dingell and Boucher talk about building consensus around a moderate bipartisan approach that respects the concerns of industry, the Earth-on-fire crowd suspects a do-nothing approach. The top Republican on Dingell's committee, Rep. Joe L. Barton (Tex.), has done more to block climate legislation than any other House member, with the possible exception of the top Republican on Boucher's subcommittee, Hastert.

"Industry is an important part of the equation," Boucher said.

But there are options beyond Inslee's strong-and-fast and Dingell's modest-and-slow.

Waxman's bill, for example, is extremely strong, mandating an 80 percent cut in emissions by 2050. Waxman is known as a dogged street fighter as well as a dealmaker; after feuding with Dingell for years over acid rain, they forged the compromise that led to the 1990 amendments. But while he believes that global warming may be irreversible if emissions do not start to decline within a decade, he does not see how Democrats can get strict emission limits past Bush. So he seems content to hold hearings that will expose GOP intransigence.

"Quite frankly, this is not a bill that's going to pass in six months, or even two years," he said.

While Waxman is willing to wait for radical change, other Democrats are pushing for lesser reductions with greater speed. For example, five-term Rep. Tom Udall (N.M.) has been lobbying for a "third way" between nothing and a hard-and-fast emissions limit, offering corporations a "safety valve" of modest fees if they cannot meet pollution targets.

Udall comes from a green pedigree -- his father served as interior secretary, and his uncle was a longtime conservationist congressman -- but some environmentalists dismiss his plan as a recipe for inaction. When Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) proposed a similar plan in 2004, the Environmental Defense Fund ran ads criticizing him in his home state.

Still, Udall has enlisted a Republican co-sponsor, Wisconsin Rep. Tom Petri, in hopes of engineering a quick compromise. He says the perfect should not be the enemy of the good.

"I wrote this bill with the idea that Bush can sign it," he said. "Our idea is to start now."

But as long as Dingell wields his gavel, starting anything might be tough. Last October, Udall approached Dingell in the Democratic cloakroom and handed over some information about his bill. Dingell never got back to him. In an interview in his office, which is dominated by heads of animals he has shot and photos of presidents he has worked with, Dingell recalled his friendships with Udall's father and uncle, but brushed off questions about Udall's bill.

"If I thought it was a good idea, I would have already done it," he said.Gearing Up for Showdown

A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that only 27 percent of Americans approve of Bush's handling of global warming, so it's easy to see why Pelosi welcomes a confrontation. That is one reason she asked Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a Bush-bashing environmentalist and a Pelosi loyalist, to lead her new committee. In April 2005, when Bush walked hand in hand with Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah after asking him to produce more oil, Pelosi asked Markey to deliver the party's response to Bush's radio address.

"She does believe, along with Iraq, that this is a big issue on which we have to take on the president," Markey said.

Industry lobbyists say they expect to endure a lot of unpleasant climate hearings during this Congress, but they are not too worried about draconian legislation. They do not think the House or the Senate can pass anything too stringent, much less override a Bush veto. And they say their focus groups show that the public's eagerness to do something about global warming droops after hearing warnings of serious economic consequences.

With trillions of dollars at stake, it is reasonable to expect industry-funded ads to raise those alarms, in the vein of the "Harry and Louise" spots that helped sink President Bill Clinton's health-care plans.

"If you're a Democrat in a moderate district, this is not the kind of vote you want to take," said Myron Ebell, director of global-warming policy for the Competitive Enterprise Institute, an industry-funded think tank. "I think Democrats are really going to disappoint the enviros over the next two years, because all they're going to do is talk."

In fact, it's not clear that environmentalists would be all that disappointed. They believe the public is moving in their direction, as climate-friendly actions by companies such as Wal-Mart and states such as California help build pressure for a national solution. Many of them think two years of hearings could set the stage for a Waxman-style bill that a Democratic president -- or a climate-conscious Republican such as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) -- could sign in 2009.

"If we can get some real facts into the public domain, keep educating the American people, lay down some principles about what kind of bill is acceptable and help get the next Congress ready to act, that would be a success," said Ana Unruh Cohen, a global-warming expert at the liberal Center for American Progress. "You know, Bush is still the president."

And Dingell is still the guy with the gavel. He and Boucher are already planning hearings on global warming, and they have invited former vice president Al Gore to testify. ("Al's a good friend," Dingell said. "So was his father.") But Dingell warns that he is a "fairly fussy, careful legislator."

Pelosi is pushing for action by July 4. She wants to show Americans that Democrats care. And she wants to show Dingell that a new guard is running the show.

"We shouldn't get hung up on procedural matters," Emanuel said. The select committee, he said, is "continuing to remind people this is a different Congress, with different priorities."

Climate Panel Creates Lobbying Stir (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 23, 2007

Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) found an unlikely ally in his spat with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) over a new climate-change panel: former committee chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas).

While Barton and Dingell have butted heads on energy policy, the two were like-minded in their opposition to a select committee on climate change that would operate outside the bounds of their own committee.

Dingell compared the panel, which Pelosi is pushing as a way to draw attention to the issue of global warming, to “feathers on a fish.”

Keeping with the avian theme, Barton’s spokeswoman Lisa Miller called the effort “a publicity machine with wings.”

DOJ_NMG_0120258

The spat threatened to draw energy lobbyists, who largely had sat on the sidelines this session, into an awkward intra-caucus fight between two people — Dingell and Pelosi — it doesn't pay to upset.

Pelosi has put global warming and energy independence near the top of her priority list, after having successfully pushed through the Six in '06 agenda. She has said she wants a climate-change bill on the floor by July.

A select committee on global warming "will give us the opportunity to gather state-of-the-art scientific research, focus public attention on these urgent issues, and support the work of the authorizing committees," Pelosi said in a letter to colleagues.

After the select committee was announced, Barton quickly gathered about 15 Republican energy lobbyists in a meeting on Capitol Hill where he implored them to ask members they knew to vote against the creation of the committee.

"He said, 'Let's support Dingell on this,'" one lobbyist who attended the meeting said.

In an effort to ease opposition from Dingell and others, Pelosi wrote in her memo that the select committee would not have legislative authority and would be disbanded after two years. But the idea still makes members nervous, particularly those close to fossil fuel industries that would be among the hardest-hit under carbon dioxide caps. Dingell is a longtime supporter of the domestic auto industry, which could find it tough to comply with a tough global-warming bill.

"That's what they always say," one Democratic aide said of the limits the Speaker has put on the committee.

Lobbyists come into play because the creation of a select committee likely requires a floor vote.

Energy lobbyists largely sat out the debate on the tax subsidies, believing their efforts would be of more use in the Senate, where a closer voting margin improves the chances to alter some aspects of the package.

But the climate-change panel seemed to create a bigger stir on K Street. Democratic energy lobbyists began quietly to do their own whipping, fearing the select committee signaled a shift to the left on climate change.

The issue holds "enormous consequences" for their clients, one of the lobbyists said.

"It's game-changing for the entire economy," the lobbyist said.

Increasingly, however, businesses are coming forward seeking clarity on the issue of climate change. General Electric, DuPont, Alcoa and Duke Energy announced the creation of a coalition to press the administration and Congress to address global warming through efforts like a mandatory cap on carbon dioxide.

Democratic lobbyists, meanwhile, concentrated on members from energy-producing states, so-called oil-patch members already a little peeved at the repeal of billions of dollars in tax breaks the industry now receives, and on the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), one of the most powerful subgroups within the Democratic Caucus.

Lobbyists argued, according to a Democratic aide and a lobbyist, that traditional committee structure is more suited to the interests of the Blue Dogs and the CBC, which has several members in charge of congressional panels.

A select committee likely requires a floor vote. Lobbyists said Speaker Pelosi could still create a lesser panel — a task force, for instance — that wouldn't require a vote.

Energy and Commerce Democrats met Friday, after which Dingell wrote a memo that summed up his position: "This entity would exist for a fixed period of time and can take the form of a Speaker's Committee within the Democratic Caucus or a Task Force of the House," the memo stated.

But a source close to the Speaker said a vote is likely to be held, although given the remaining confusion over what authority the panel would possess, the vote is likely to be delayed until after this week.

Some Dems Angry With Rep. Markey And New Energy Panel (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 23, 2007

"Let's get in his grille," said Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.), referring colloquially and aggressively to Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass.).

Weiner was talking to fellow Democrats on the House Energy and Commerce Committee panel last Thursday; they were disgruntled about Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) plan to take away some of their turf by creating a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming with Markey at its head.

"Guys from Boston are soft," Weiner added, according to sources at the private meeting last Thursday, and said they should constantly preempt Markey by holding Energy and Commerce panel hearings a day before any scheduled hearing by the new select panel. If Markey traveled to Stockholm, Energy and Commerce members would travel to Stockholm, he said. Lawmakers and aides present chuckled.

Some liberal Democrats are said to be frustrated with Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), the Energy and Commerce chairman, who is closely allied with the auto industry and opposes some measures, such as increasing gas mileage standards, to reduce greenhouse gases.

But a cross-section of members are frustrated with Markey.

Energy and Commerce committee members worry that creating a select panel would set a bad precedent. (The Homeland Security panel started as a temporary committee, but is now permanent.) They debated why a task force could not accomplish some of the same goals, said sources in the room.

"Members are angry with Markey because he already had a platform on these issues with three good committee assignments," said a senior Democratic aide. "Now it looks like he's trying to take away more from other members to add to his own portfolio."

Another senior Democratic aide who is an ally of Markey said, "The Speaker is turning to Markey because his past assignments ensure that he knows what he's talking about, and also because he has frequently helped the party by stepping aside when extra slots were needed on his other committees, and here again, this new select committee helps the Speaker by creating extra slots to help members get good assignments."

Since the Democrats recaptured the House, Markey has angled to move up the committee ladder. He is the third-ranking Democrat on the House Energy and Commerce Committee and serves on the Homeland Security and Natural Resources committees.

Markey suggested late last year that he wanted to head the House Resources Committee. Rep Nick Rahall (D-W.Va.), now chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, had been the ranking Democrat, but Markey had more seniority.

Markey also expressed interest in reclaiming his seniority on the U.S. Helsinki Commission, which is part of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, but Pelosi named Rep. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.) to the post, Democratic sources said.

Markey, 60, arrived in Congress in 1976 after winning a special election. He's become known for his expertise on telecommunications, energy and health issues. But he also is considered a media hound and his critics noted his penchant for foreign travel and being seen at A-list gatherings, such as last year's Academy Awards and the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Markey spent the weekend in Boston and returned to Washington yesterday. No further decisions had been made, said a committee aide.

The only lawmaker on Pelosi's side was her longtime friend, Rep. Anna Eshoo (D-Calif.). She said the panel was a "great idea" and didn't understand what everyone was worried about, according to Democratic sources familiar with the discussion.

The drama did not end Thursday.

On Friday, Dingell met Democratic Reps. Markey, Henry Waxman (Calif.), Rick Boucher (Va.), Bart Gordon (Tenn.), Bobby Rush (Ill.) and Albert Wynn (Md.). He wrote in a memo that "we should work with Markey toward achieving the Speaker's objectives of creating a communications entity through a different structure."

That's not quite how Markey remembered it, David Moulton, Markey's chief of staff, wrote in an e-mail.

"Rep. Markey appreciated the dialogue that the members had this morning. It was constructive and helpful," he wrote, adding that Markey did not share the same recollection of the meeting as some participants. The consensus, as far as there was one, was that the select committee would not have legislative power and it would last two years.

"He did not agree, however, that what Pelosi had proposed needed to be restructured," Moulton wrote.

Pelosi wrote in a memo released Friday, "This [committee] will be a bipartisan entity with no legislative authority [and] will be created only for the current Congress, and will not be extended beyond that date."

If the proposed select committee were transformed into a task force, the committee chairmen would have more say in legislation. In 1982, former Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) forced the House Democratic Caucus to adopt a rule that gives committees five legislative days to review, consider or report on any legislative measure taken by an ad hoc task force, according to a Congressional Research Service report.

'Energy Independence' (WSJ)

By Daniel Yergin

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

A cry is being heard across the nation, and loudly so in Washington. It is the call for "energy independence," and it will be at the center of the national energy debate over the next several months, providing the rationale for new policies and expansion of existing ones. Indeed, one might even anticipate a "declaration of energy independence" this July 4.

But what does "energy independence" mean for a $13 trillion economy that uses the equivalent of 50 million barrels of oil every day? Is it realistic and achievable? Or is it rhetorical overreach that will lead, as in the past, to disappointment and cynicism, the kind that drives the cycles of inconsistency in energy policy and leaves the U.S. no less vulnerable? The latter is more likely -- at least without a realistic appraisal of the U.S. position and the country's possibilities. But "energy independence" can provide a constructive framework for policy if it is properly thought through and the realities are recognized. * * *

With geopolitical turmoil, volatile prices and continuing reminders of the international political power of oil, the concept of energy independence is compelling and deeply appealing. In fact, it has been appealing for quite some time. The idea was introduced by Richard Nixon in November 1973, three weeks after the Arab oil embargo, when he introduced "Project Independence" and pledged that the U.S. would, within seven years, "meet our own energy needs without depending on any foreign energy source." It was a bold assertion but one that puzzled his own advisers. "I cut the reference to 'independence' three times from the drafts, but it kept being put back," recalled Richard Fairbanks, a drafter of the speech. "Finally, I called over, and was told that it came from the Old Man himself." Nixon knew that energy independence was something that Americans would crave after the 1973 oil shock: He deliberately modeled his Project Independence on John F. Kennedy's Apollo goal of getting a man on the moon within a decade.

Back then, the goal may have seemed only somewhat unlikely. After all, when Nixon began his political career after World War II, the country already had a long history of energy independence -- and then some. For it had actually been the world's No. 1 oil exporter; indeed, out of seven billion barrels of oil used by the Allies in World War II, six billion were produced in the U.S. By the late 1940s, the U.S. had become a net importer of oil, although the real surge in imports did not begin until the 1970s.

It proved much easier to get a man on the moon than to make a nation energy independent. In the three and a half decades since Nixon, the U.S. has gone from importing a third of its oil to importing 60%, and that share is set to continue rising. The country is on a similar path for natural gas (which is about 25% of our total energy usage). North American supply has flattened out. Yet large amounts of new natural-gas-fired electric power generation have been added over the last decade, which means that demand will increase. Natural gas is also used in the making of ethanol, adding to the demand growth. This means growing imports of liquefied natural gas -- LNG -- rising from 3% of our current demand to more than 25% by 2020.

All of which suggests that thought needs to be given both to what energy independence means and what can be achieved. For, right now, the U.S. is moving at some speed in the opposite direction, toward greater integration into the global energy markets.

How dependent is the U.S.? If we look at total energy -- including coal, nuclear and a small but growing share from renewables -- the country is over 70% self-sufficient. Oil -- refined into liquid fuels for transportation -- is where most of the current dependence comes from. The risks do not owe to direct imports from the Middle East, contrary to the widespread belief. Some 81% of oil imports do not come from that region. Thus, only 19% of imports -- and 12% of total petroleum consumption -- originates in the Middle East

Our largest source of oil imports is Canada. It's also the source of most of our current natural gas imports, via pipelines. One can hardly say that either Canada or energy imports from Canada constitute a major threat to national security. The energy trade is part of a normal trading relationship with the country with which we're conjoined economically and which just happens to be our biggest trading partner. Our second largest source is Mexico, with which we are also in a dense relationship. Mexico depends upon oil for about a third of total government revenues.

The picture becomes more complex when one turns to our third largest source of oil imports, Venezuela. The once much-discussed "hemispheric energy solidarity" loses much of its resonance when balanced against the "21stcentury socialism" of Venezuela's Hugo Chávez. After all, President Chávez is currently nationalizing the private sector, has on occasion threatened to embargo oil shipments to the U.S., and is putting much effort into fashioning an anti-U.S. alliance, the latest manifestation being the visit of Iranian President Ahmadinejad to Caracas. These are not the actions one normally associates with a good friend or a reliable trading partner.

Yet the source of imports is significant only up to a point. Energy security is a global issue. Although oil around the world varies greatly in terms of physical qualities and transportation costs, there is only one world oil market. So disruptions and loss of supply in one place radiate throughout the global market -- and global politics -- affecting consumers everywhere. Even if the U.S. did not import a drop of oil, it would still be vulnerable to turmoil involving oil outside its borders.

What are the prospects for "energy independence" in the way that Richard Nixon defined it 34 years ago -- that is, 1930s-style "autarky" and total self-sufficiency? Based on where we are today, very small, at least for a couple of decades. In terms of vehicles, as pointed out in our new study on "Gasoline and the American People," only about 8% of the auto fleet turns over every year. So the lead times are long for more efficient vehicles to enter the fleet. Ethanol, derived from corn, is on track to grow to about 10% of our total gasoline pool in a few years. This is certainly not inconsequential; it represents diversification and is equivalent to creating a new Indonesia-level oil-producing country in America's Midwest. But signs are already evident of an upper bound on corn-based ethanol, as the fuel-versus-food trade-off pushes up corn prices, setting off vocal protests from livestock growers and dairy farmers and, in due course, from those who buy breakfast cereals and soft drinks made with high fructose corn syrup.

What about technological advances that provide new answers? There is a "great bubbling" all along the innovation frontier of energy, ranging from conventional energy and efficiency to, especially, renewables, alternatives and "clean tech." Activity this wide-ranging has never been witnessed before. The impact could well be considerable, or even transformative. One would be very hard-pressed today, however, to say when and what form this impact will take.

In the end, if energy independence is presented as self-sufficiency, it will likely fall flat. And, as prices run through their cycles, disappointment will undermine the longer-term commitments that are required for a sound energy future. Today, quite simply, cutting ourselves off from global energy markets is not realistic.

But, if the goal of energy independence is understood differently, to mean energy security -- resilience, robustness, reduced vulnerability -- then it is much more useful.

This kind of definition recognizes that trade, in itself, is not bad. At the same time, it emphasizes the central goal of diversification -- encouraging investment and higher levels of research and development in both alternative and conventional energy sources. It means a new push for energy conservation, higher energy efficiency, lower energy intensity -- a theme that German Chancellor Angela Merkel will make the centerpiece of her agenda as chairman of the G-8 countries later this year. It certainly requires a consistent commitment to pushing the innovation frontier in ways that, eventually, lead to economically competitive alternatives and new technologies.

And it requires an understanding that this kind of energy independence -- as measured in energy security -- actually requires interdependence with other nations, both consumers and producers of energy. Indeed, how we manage our relations with other countries and other regions is a very essential ingredient for our own energy well-being.

Mr. Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, is writing a book on energy and geopolitics.

Getting Hydrogen Cars To Live Up To Their Hype (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120262

The Ford Edge gliding along the George Washington Memorial Parkway doesn't have spinning rims or a booming sound system. The bling in this SUV is the technology. The vehicle runs almost silently. It needs no gas and releases no polluting exhaust.

The HySeries Edge, which is to be unveiled at the Washington Auto Show today, is a plug-in hybrid with an electric drive powered by a battery and a hydrogen fuel cell. Its arrival intensifies the competition to manufacture a mass-market electric hybrid that reduces reliance on gasoline and curbs the emission of greenhouse gases.

But the futuristic Edge vehicle is Ford's only one, and it cost $2 million to build. To get a car like this into the showroom for sale to the public will require the automotive and energy industries to leap high technological hurdles. The infrastructure to deliver alternative fuels such as hydrogen is in its infancy, and engineers are puzzling over how to mass-produce a lightweight, inexpensive and safe electric battery.

Because development costs are steep, the industry is hoping President Bush will announce his intention to increase research funding during his State of the Union speech tonight. Already the government pumps millions of dollars into the development of automotive technology. The carmakers frame their latest request as a battle cry against Japanese rivals, whose fuel-efficient models have cut sharply into the U.S. market. They have asked for as much as $500 million for battery research and development.

The Edge plug-in, a vehicle Ford calls the first drivable plug-in hybrid from a major auto company, is one result of a $44 million matching grant from the government, which has gone into a variety of projects. Its on-board fuel cell is used to recharge the battery while driving; it has a range of 225 miles with fuel cell recharging. The vehicle also can be plugged in for recharging.

Its appearance on the roads around the District tries to trump General Motors' entry in the race. This month, GM revealed an electric plug-in hybrid with a small gas engine. But while GM's vehicle, the Volt, looked sharp under glass on the floor of the Detroit auto show, there was no road-ready version.

"We are past this being a science experiment," said Mujeeb Ijaz, who directs Ford's hydrogen plug-in Edge project. "It's a tough road to commercialize. It takes support."

The Department of Energy is finalizing a comprehensive plug-in plan, according to industry and government officials who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not been announced. The goal is to get plug-ins on the road within the next several years.

During the Clinton and Bush administrations, the federal government has spent hundreds of millions of dollars a year on advanced automotive technology. Joseph Romm, an Energy Department official in the late 1990s, estimates the total expense at $3 billion since the early 1990s.

President Clinton launched an initiative called the Partnership for a New Generation of Vehicles. The goal of the program was to deliver an advanced hybrid family sedan that could get 80 miles per gallon.

The Bush administration revised the program when it took power. In his 2003 State of the Union address, Bush said the goal of the government's auto policy would be to advance hydrogen technology in cars.

"As soon as George Bush got elected, the U.S. car companies walked away from the partnership and didn't continue developing hybrids," Romm said. "And the Japanese did. As a result, they ended up the leaders."

Producing electric batteries for automobiles presents several challenges. The preferred technology is found in lithium-ion batteries, which are smaller and lighter than others and have the capability to store two to three times as much power. But without the benefits of mass production, the batteries are still far too costly.

Battery engineers are also working on the safety problems of lithium-ion batteries. Under certain conditions, some of the materials in the batteries are unstable and can ignite or explode when packed together. Scientists have been working on reducing the risk, but technologies needed for those improvements make the batteries less powerful and less effective. Engineers are also testing to make sure the batteries can survive a 15-year lifetime without malfunctions.

Ford's Ijaz said the biggest hurdle is getting the costs down. Among the vehicle's other expenses, fuel cell technology is dependent on precious metals such as platinum.

"History shows that we are making the steps," he said. "Before, there were no fuel cell cars. Ford has 30. We've cut the weight of fuel cell power by half. The auto industry is pushing forward."

Judge Moves 'Divine Strake' Court Hearing Up To Jan. 31 (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

A federal judge has pushed forward by one day a scheduled hearing on a proposed non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would generate a mushroom-shaped dust cloud in the Nevada desert.

Judge Lloyd George cited a scheduling conflict in moving the date of the telephone conference call to January 31st. A Justice Department lawyer from Washington is due to provide an update of the federal Defense Threat Reduction Agency proposal. No date has been set for the blast.

It would involve detonating a 700-ton ammonium nitrate and fuel oil bomb at the Nevada Test Site -- about 85 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

Government officials call the test important for gathering data about penetrating hardened and deeply buried targets. Critics have called it a surrogate for a low-yield nuclear "bunker-buster" bomb.

They say it'll scatter dust contaminated nuclear weapons tests at the test site. The explosion has been postponed since Western Shoshone tribe members and "downwinders" in Utah and Nevada filed suit last year.

Judge Revisits Land-use Plan Suit (SLT)

By Joe Baird, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, January 23, 2007

Feds, environmental groups argue that claims of harm from Grand Staircase plan won't hold up

The federal government and environmental groups got a do-over Monday in their bid to dismiss a lawsuit filed by Kane and Garfield counties that seeks to overturn the Grand Stair- case-Escalante National Monument's land-use plan.

U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart originally heard arguments to dismiss the suit last fall, then recused himself. Judge Bruce Jenkins replaced Stewart, and opted to hear the arguments for a second time at the Moss Courthouse in downtown Salt Lake City.

But where Stewart seemed skeptical of the government's contention that the counties could show no harm from the monument plan - and thus had no standing to bring the suit - Jenkins appeared dubious that the counties could make their claims stick without laying out more specifics.

Jenkins also challenged the counties' argument that they have been permanently tied to the decisions made by the Bureau of Land Management in 1999 that regulated travel, water diversions and other land uses in the monument.

"What statute do you point to showing that this is a final agency action?" Jenkins asked Shawn Welch, the counties' attorney, during the nearly two-hour hearing.

The counties have claimed that there is a large network of county-owned roads that criss-cross the 1.8 million-acre monument that the BLM has refused to recognize.

"The BLM knows what is out there. They know there were historical uses. We'd like the court to look at the record," said Welch.

Welch also charged that the BLM's refusal to allow the diversion of monument water to Kane County usurps the authority of the state engineer and is illegal.

Justice Department attorney Tom Snodgrass once again argued that the counties have failed to prove any road ownership claims beyond four routes that were recognized in the land-use plan - and thus could show no harm.

"The plan leaves the door wide open for the counties to come [to court] and prove their claims," added attorney Ted Zukoski, representing the Southern Utah Wilderness Alliance.

Snodgrass reiterated that the counties' water claims also fall short, saying that the monument's water resources are backed by federal law.

Jenkins took the dismissal request under advisement, though also indicated a quick decision would be forthcoming.

Lack Of Budget Could Hurt Nuclear Energy Revival, Official Says (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The senior member of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission warned on Monday that the failure of Congress to pass a detailed budget for the current fiscal year could damage the nuclear renaissance that the government tried so hard to encourage with the energy bill of 2005.

No one has applied for permission to build a power reactor since the 1970s. But with the incentives offered by the federal government in 2005, utilities are considering building about 20 reactors, and several of them are expected to apply for authorization this year.

The commission member, Edward McGaffigan Jr., said that if the commission received applications this year, "we basically are going to have to put them on the shelf, because we're not going to have the folks to work on the applications until well into calendar year 2008."

Congress passed only 2 of the 11 spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, 2006, those covering the Pentagon and the Homeland Security Department. The rest of the government has been operating under a "continuing resolution," a stopgap measure that finances most agencies at the previous year's levels. Democrats say they plan to extend that resolution through Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year.

According to the nuclear commission, under a continuing resolution its budget would be lower by $95 million, or about 12 percent, compared with the level approved by the House and Senate Appropriations Committees but never by the full Congress.

Most of the commission's budget comes from fees paid by companies licensed to use radioactive material. The agency has been arguing on Capitol Hill that giving it the amount already approved by the Appropriations Committees would require only $13 million of general tax revenues.

Mr. McGaffigan said that if the commission could not process applications, some companies wanting to build would decide to wait. But he said that "some, seeing the instability, may disappear" and build coal plants instead.

Earlier this month, Mr. McGaffigan, saying he had metastatic melanoma, told the White House that he would serve only until a successor could be confirmed. He spoke Monday at a meeting with reporters organized by Platts, an energy information company.

Mr. McGaffigan also said that the Energy Department should begin looking for alternatives to Yucca Mountain, in Nevada, for disposing of nuclear waste. When he came to the commission in 1996, he said, the opening of the repository was said to be 14 years away; now it is probably 20 years away.

"There's just tremendous uncertainty," he said, "and each year that passes, we're not going to get any closer to Yucca under the current circumstances." He said the government should look for a site where there was local cooperation.

Keeping Up With Nigeria (NYT)

By Karin Lissakers

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

IN the last six months, media coverage, Congressional hearings, lawsuits by private citizens and a scathing report by the Interior Department's inspector general have exposed a litany of failures in the department's management of oil and gas leases on public lands and waters.

These failures have lost the government billions of dollars in royalties. They have become so glaring, in fact, that there is even speculation that the president, a good friend to the energy industry, might speak about them in his State of the Union address tonight.

If he does, he would only be about a term-and-a-half too late. Our government's record on resource revenue management — a bipartisan record, one should add — looks more like that of a corruption-ridden failing state than that of an advanced industrial country. Many of the same failures we criticize elsewhere — for example, the mismanagement of the Iraqi oil industry — are rampant here.

Like the Iraqi government, the United States government lacks the systems to determine exactly how much oil and gas is being produced on federal properties. Private lawsuits and state investigations have exposed systematic underpayment by companies on gas leases, yet the Interior Department relies on these companies to tell the government how much they owe, with no independent verification.

The department's inspector general, Earl E. Devaney, found that the government's bookkeeping is so poor that it does not actually know how much money it recovered, nor how many audits it conducted. The inspector general also found the department unable to verify quantities and prices for payments-in-kind (when the government takes a share of the oil and gas instead of cash), which are a growing portion of the royalties the government collects.

Interior's mismanagement is compounded by the secrecy that surrounds the entire enterprise. Though these are payments to the government for oil and gas extracted from public lands, companies are not required to disclose either payments or production levels to the public. The department says such data must be protected, because it could reveal pricing strategies and cost structures.

Such secrecy is contrary to the public's right to know what is being done on public lands. It is also contrary to an emerging international standard of transparency and accountability regarding oil, gas and mining revenues — standards that the United States is pressing developing countries to adopt.

What's more, energy companies have shown a willingness to comply with these standards. BP almost got kicked out of Angola for trying to disclose its payments there without Angola's permission. Newmont and other mining companies have started posting on their Web sites information about taxes and fees they pay to individual governments. Statoil, a large international operator, is required by Norwegian law to report, country by country, all taxes paid at home and to foreign governments.

ExxonMobil, ChevronTexaco, Shell, Total, Anglo American and many other international oil and mining companies are part of the international Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative — under which they report all royalties, taxes, fees, bonuses and payments-in-kind.

In some countries that take part in the initiative, company payments are lumped together before publication. Nigeria, however, requires individual disclosure. Surely the United States should not have a lower standard of disclosure than Nigeria.

Congress, with the president's encouragement, should insist that the United States practice at home the transparency it preaches abroad. It should enact a requirement that all companies extracting oil, gas and other minerals from federal lands publicly report all of their production on those lands and all royalties and other payments made to the federal government from that production.

Only then can the American public have confidence that the taxes owed by those who have benefited from the use of our public lands are being properly accounted for and fully collected.

Troubled Waters (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

THE PROMISE of massive redevelopment in the District -- new neighborhoods, office buildings, parks, retail complexes, and baseball and soccer stadiums, with the Anacostia River as an urban centerpiece -- could wind up mired in muck. As reported in distressing detail by staff writer David A. Fahrenthold, the river is disgracefully dirty, brimming with trash, toxic chemicals, dead animals, diseased fish and raw sewage. At least the Potomac River and the Chesapeake Bay have constituencies pressing for improvements in those waters; but without a groundswell to revive the Anacostia, potential developers may hold their noses and turn away.

With a ballpark already blooming near the Frederick Douglass Memorial Bridge, city officials and the owners of the Washington Nationals have a large stake in the redevelopment of this area. So, too, will the new owners of D.C. United, who have started a public push for a $150 million soccer stadium in Southeast. If a partnership with the District government does materialize, Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and the D.C. Council should insist that the team's owners ante up for a serious Anacostia River cleanup. Similar commitments should be extracted from other developers. After all, it is in their interest.

One revolting source of pollution is the District's sewer system, designed more than 100 years ago to dump raw sewage into the river during rainstorms. The D.C. Water and Sewer Authority has a plan to dig huge tunnels under the city to store this flow and then treat it to remove the sewage. But the agency's chief of staff, Johnnie Hemphill, told The Post that the project could take close to 20 years and $2 billion. This month, the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court's ruling that set stricter caps on the amounts of pollutants dumped into the Anacostia. Jerry N. Johnson, the water and sewer authority's general manager, said the new rules may slow the project while officials figure out how to adapt. But the cleanup must go faster, not slower.

Maryland, home to more than 85 percent of the Anacostia's watershed, must help, too. Chesapeake Bay Foundation President William C. Baker says runoff from Montgomery and Prince George's counties is a significant river pollutant. The foundation is pressing for stricter requirements in federal Clean Water Act permits. No single pollution solution exists, but until federal, state and local officials develop a sense of emergency, the Anacostia River will continue to dampen the chances of economic vitality in the core of this region.

Judge Overseeing Arellano Felix Case Disagrees On Trial Timing (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 23, 2007

SAN DIEGO – The federal judge overseeing the possible death-penalty trial of accused drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Felix sharply disagreed with lawyers for both the defense and the prosecution over when a jury would hear the case.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers told U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns Monday that they could be ready to take the case to trial in June 2008.

Burns disagreed and refused to put the case off that far.

He has been pushing the lawyers to get the case before a jury quickly, at first saying that it should go this spring, but now insisting it can get started this year.

The lawyers say that's impossible, given the voluminous evidence gathered against Arellano and the fact that before the case can go forward, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty.

Arellano is accused of racketeering and conspiracy, and could face the death penalty if convicted of operating a continuing criminal conspiracy that has led to several murders.

Also accused in the case is Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who prosecutors say was a top Arellano Felix henchman who ordered the beheadings of Rosarito Beach police officers last year.

Burns said he had hoped to appoint a publicly paid lawyer for Villarreal by now, but has not yet found one willing and able to take the case.

Prosecutors said the cartel is responsible for moving tons of drugs north across the border, smuggling millions of dollars south and murders and kidnappings both in the United States and Mexico.

Mexican Drug Lords Appear In U.S. Court (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

HOUSTON (AP) -- With federal agents armed with automatic weapons standing guard on the courthouse roof, four drug lords who had been serving time in Mexican prisons were brought shackled into an American courtroom Monday to face drug and intimidation charges.

Among them was Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, believed to be one of the kingpins most responsible for violence along the Texas-Mexico border in recent years, said Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

"This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," Tandy told reporters by teleconference from Washington.

The Mexican government was willing to extradite Cardenas-Guillen and the other suspected drug lords because they had been able to continue their drug operations from within prison in Mexico, not because of U.S. pressure, officials said. They were flown into Houston late Friday and early Saturday.

They faced a federal magistrate under extraordinary security measures, including agents with automatic weapons perched on the roof and around the outside of the downtown federal building.

Besides Cardenas-Guillen, the group includes Hector Palma Salazar, the suspected former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana.

Cardenas-Guillen, a former federal police officer in Mexico, faces 17 counts of drug importing and distribution, as well as three charges of threatening a federal agent and one count of money laundering. He faces a maximum sentence of life in prison if convicted.

Prosecutors said that the charges against Cardenas-Guillen originate in South Texas, but that he will be held in Houston, 350 miles from the border, out of concern for witness safety and border protection.

Cardenas-Guillen's lawyer, Robert Yzaguirre, said he hadn't had any time yet with his client.

The Guerreros, who face drug and money laundering charges, and Palma, who faces a charge of conspiracy to distribute cocaine, did not have attorneys with them.

Along with the suspected drug kingpins, Mexico also extradited 11 people wanted in the United States on charges including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes. They also appeared in court Monday.

In all, 12 made their initial appearances in federal court, while three appeared in state district court in Houston. Most were set to have bond and arraignment hearings later this week. Cardenas-Guillen's was set for Feb. 1.

Once these hearings are done, the individuals are to be transferred to states where charges against them were originally filed, including California, New York and Colorado. Cardenas-Guillen is to remain in Texas, as will two other people. The Guerreros and Palma are to be transferred to California.

Mexico has recently shown more willingness to extradite drug lords, even those facing life in prison. A record 63 were sent to the U.S. in 2006 alone. However, it refuses to extradite anyone who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon pledged Monday to wage a permanent war on organized crime.

"This is a permanent fight in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," he said. "We are fighting without pause so that these sacrifices will not have been in vain."

Mexico's President Pledges War Against Organized Crime, Promises Better Police (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, January 23, 2007

MEXICO CITY -- President Felipe Calderon pledged Monday to wage a permanent war against organized crime by coordinating more closely with local police and giving all law enforcement better training, equipment and intelligence work.

Calderon has largely relied on federal police and soldiers for a series of massive anti-crime sweeps in several Mexican states, but he has said future efforts will need to rely more on local police.

"In order to win the war on crime, it is indispensable that we work in a united manner," Calderon told a national gathering of state governors and top public safety officials.

His comments came three days after his administration extradited four alleged drug lords and 11 other suspects to the United States. He said he wouldn't give up the battle.

"This is a permanent fight in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," said Calderon. "We are fighting without pause so that these sacrifices will not have been in vain."

Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, described the extraditions as "an enormous leap forward."

"Most were major drug traffickers. Many were long-term targets of the United States. All now face their worst fear: U.S. justice," Tandy said in a media conference call Monday. "On behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives."

Tough-to-control prisons, untrained or corrupt local police, and citizens' distrust of police are all major obstacles that Calderon faces in his crackdown on drug violence that includes executions, gunbattles and beheadings.

He said on Monday that he hopes to use the federal operations to strengthen local police, although in some cities, like Tijuana, one of federal agents' first jobs has been to investigate local forces for alleged corruption or violence.

"We will extend and fortify joint operations against organized crime, with the aim of having these operations result, in the end, in leaving behind strengthened local police forces," Calderon said.

He proposed better training, equipment, vetting and intelligence work, including a unified national criminal information data center.

"The idea is for all police forces in Mexico -- local, state and, of course, federal -- to comply with standards that will ensure that the public can trust our police," he said.

Four Extradited Mexicans To Appear In Texas Court On Drug Charges (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO

AP, January 22, 2007

HOUSTON

More than a dozen leaders and workers in Mexico's most brutal and powerful drug cartels were brought before a federal magistrate in Houston Monday before being shipped to several states to face charges.

They face various drug-related charges in different states, including New York, Colorado and California, officials said.

Among the 15 individuals extradited were four alleged senior cartel leaders, including Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, believed to be one of the kingpins most responsible for violence along the Texas-Mexico border in recent years, said Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Besides Cardenas-Guillen, allegedly the leader of the powerful Gulf cartel, the group includes Palmas Salazar, the alleged former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana, Mexico.

The Mexican government was willing to extradite the alleged drug cartel leaders because they had been able to continue their drug operations from within Mexican prisons.

They faced a federal magistrate under extraordinary security measures, including agents with automatic weapons perched on the roof and around the outside of the downtown federal building.

"This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," Tandy told reporters. "These people are drawn from the (Tijuana, Juarez, Gulf and Federation) cartels. The level of these leaders is extraordinary."

Cardenas-Guillen, who was shackled and wearing a blue prison jumpsuit, faces 17 counts of drug importing and distribution as well as three charges of threatening a federal agent and one count of money laundering. He faces a maximum sentence of up to life in prison. He answered the magistrate's questions through a translator.

Prosecutors said the charges against Cardenas-Guillen originate in South Texas, but he will be held in Houston, 350 miles north of the Mexican border.

Cardenas-Guillen's lawyer, Robert Yzaguirre, said he hadn't had any time yet with his client.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon pledged Monday to wage a permanent war on organized crime.

"This is a permanent fight in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," said Calderon. "We are fighting without pause so that these sacrifices will not have been in vain."

Eduardo Medina Mora, Mexico's attorney general, said Sunday the four defendants were extradited to stop them from communicating with their cartels from behind bars and to reduce the risk of violence and escape, not because of U.S. pressure.

"This decision was a unilateral and sovereign one by the Mexican government," Medina Mora said in Mexico City. The aim was to break any "physical and geographical" contact they might have had with their gangs while in Mexican prisons. He also said Mexico plans to extradite other criminals and suspects who have exhausted their legal appeals.

Mexico has recently shown more willingness to extradite drug lords, even those facing life in prison. A record 63 alleged criminals were sent to the U.S. in 2006 alone. However, it refuses to extradite anyone who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico

Alleged Cartel Members Extradited To Texas (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, January 23, 2007

A suspected Mexican drug lord whose cartel allegedly smuggled more than 4 tons of cocaine a month over the U.S. border will stand trial in Texas.

Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, the alleged kingpin of the Gulf Cartel, and three other alleged drug lords appeared in a Houston court Monday. Mexican authorities delivered Cardenas-Guillen and 14 other alleged Mexican drug dealers and criminals to Houston late Friday and early Saturday, the Drug Enforcement Administration said.

"These extraditions are unprecedented in the history of Mexico," DEA Administrator Karen Tandy said Monday. "Did we get all of Mexico's major drug dealers? Not yet. But this past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico took an enormous leap forward."

Cardenas-Guillen, whose trademark was a gold-plated .45-caliber pistol, was charged in Texas in December 2000 with drug trafficking and threatening to kill federal agents, Tandy said. Cardenas-Guillen and his cohorts allegedly attempted to kidnap and kill a DEA agent and an FBI agent during a confrontation in November 1999, the indictment said.

"He killed his way up the ladder to lead the Gulf Cartel," Tandy said.

The Mexican army captured Cardenas-Guillen in 2003. He continued to run his cartel from a Mexican maximum-security prison, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said.

McNulty said the largest-ever Mexican extradition of drug traffickers demonstrates newly elected Mexican President Felipe Calderón's commitment to confronting the country's drug gangs.

"We can't say enough about the overall effort going on with the Calderón administration," McNulty said. "They are demonstrating courage by taking on these organizations as they have."

Other defendants extradited this weekend included brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, alleged leaders of a cartel operating in Tijuana; and Gilberto Salinas Doria, who is charged with trafficking more than 200 tons of cocaine.

"Prosecutors have been working for years to make these cases," McNulty said.

Calderón Outlines Drug Fighting Plan (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, January 23, 2007

U.S. hails Mexican leader's extradition of accused cartel leaders

MEXICO CITY – President Felipe Calderón called on the political opposition Monday to share "co-responsibility" for fighting the drug war, and senior U.S. officials praised Mr. Calderón's "stunning" leadership in extraditing alleged Mexican drug lords to the U.S.

At a meeting of his security Cabinet, Mr. Calderón outlined an eight-point plan that calls for the creation of a national criminal database and higher standards for law enforcement officials. Mr. Calderón also called on leaders of the three major parties and Mexicans in general to leave aside their differences and focus on reinforcing their country's security.

"More than ever, Mexico demands co-responsibility," he said. "Mexicans expect much from us. We will not give up or give in ... because the progress of the nation is at stake."

On Friday Mexico extradited 15 criminal suspects, including four alleged drug kingpins from the nation's three top cartels, to the United States. In doing so, Mr. Calderón struck a blow against warring cartels, which killed about 2,500 people last year and turned large areas into lawless badlands.

The alleged drug traffickers were brought Monday before a federal magistrate in Houston before being shipped to several states to face charges, including New York, Colorado and California as well as Texas, officials said.

Since taking office in December, Mr. Calderón has sent troops and elite police units to tackle drug gangs and halt a surge in violence as rival cartels fight over smuggling routes and drug fields.

In Washington on Monday, senior U.S. officials praised Mr. Calderón. John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the Bush administration is prepared to "look at added resources" to help strengthen Mexican security.

Mr. Walters, speaking to reporters by telephone, was joined by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty of the Department of Justice and Karen P. Tandy, administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

"This past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico took an enormous leap forward, particularly with the extradition of Mexican drug kingpin Osiel Cárdenas-Guillén," Ms. Tandy said, adding that Mr. Cárdenas' organization, the Gulf cartel, and its arm enforcement, the Zetas, were responsible for much of the violence along parts of the Texas-Mexico border.

"For the past eight years, he commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world," Ms. Tandy said. "For the last four of those years, he did so from a Mexican prison. Today we put an end to his reign of terror."

Mexican Drug Lord Jailed In Houston (KHOU)

KHOU-TV, January 22, 2007

It is an unprecedented move Osiel Cardenas and 13 other drug suspects were extradited to the United States.

The alleged drug kingpin is accused of running one of the biggest drug cartels on the Texas/Mexico border.

The high profile extraditions included the alleged leader of the gulf cartel—which operates along the Texas-Mexico border and is blamed for escalating violence.

Federal agents in Mexico who transported reputed kingping Osiel Cardenas Guillen shot video that appeared on a website of the Mexican Newspaper el universal.

It shows Osiel Cardenas on a flight to Houston where he was handed over to DEA agents.

He faces charges in Texas including conspiracy to murder federal agents.

The U.S. Government praised the extraditions.

Mexico's attorney general says it is part of a crackdown on drug traffickers who continue to run their illegal business behind bars in Mexico.

Mexican President Sends Alleged Cartel King To Houston (KHOU)

KHOU-TV, January 23, 2007

It didn't look like downtown Houston, automatic weapons at the ready. It looked more like an image from a war zone, but unprecedented actions call for unprecedented measures.

Monday, Houston's federal courthouse was the epicenter of the war on drugs.

The head of the Gulf Cartel, Osiel Cardenas, said to be responsible for much of the violence along the Texas-Mexico border, was extradited to Houston from Mexico, along with 14 other major drug traffickers.

"They have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," said Karen Tandy, DEA Administrator.

"They" refers to the administration of Mexican President Felipe Calderon.

"The Calderon administration has taken a position in favor of law abiding citizens everywhere. By choosing to stand up to these organized criminals," said U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzalez.

"This is the first time that the Supreme Court of Mexico has extradited cartel leaders and leadership, " said Tandy.

Federal agents shot video footage of Cardenas being brought into Ellington Field. He is considered to be one of the most dangerous drug kingpins in recent history that, according to DEA agents, transported up to six tons of cocaine per month to the U.S.

Most recently, it was suspected that he continued running his drug empire from inside his prison cell in Mexico.

"He killed his way up the ladder to lead the cartel, but now the drug lord is facing 17 federal charges, including the transportation of drugs, money laundering, and threatening to kill U.S. FBI agents. Now he's looking forward to the first day of the rest of his life," said Tandy.

In addition to Cardenas-Guillen, the group includes Palmas Salazar, the alleged former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, chiefs in the cartel in Tijuana.

After the initial court hearings the accused will be sent to various U.S. jurisdictions to face charges, some more than 10 years old.

John Walters is the U.S. drug czar and he calls these extraditions the beginning of the end for the Mexican cartels.

“Taken an enormously powerful and unprecedented step to take these structures down,” he said.

Alleged Mexican Kingpins In Court (HC)

Houston Chronicle, January 23, 2007

Judge appoints lawyers for 12 of 15 defendants

He's known as the "Friend-Killer" and the "Crazy Man," testimony to his allegedly swift and ruthless rise to the pinnacle of Mexico's drug mafias.

Osiel Cardenas Guillen, the purported head of the powerful Gulf Cartel, is now facing trial in Houston on charges ranging from narcotics trafficking to threatening to kill U.S. federal agents.

U.S. officials say Cardenas is the biggest catch of the 15 Mexicans extradited to Texas on Friday and Saturday, in what they called unprecedented cooperation between the two countries. Other high-profile suspects include Hector "Blondy" Palma Salazar, an alleged former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, alleged lieutenants of the Tijuana cartel.

"Did we get all of Mexico's major drug traffickers?" Karen Tandy, head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said Monday. "No, not yet. But this weekend the U.S. and Mexico have taken a tremendous leap forward, and particularly with Osiel Cardenas Guillen."

In Houston, 12 of the accused made their first appearances before a federal judge — most after having their indictments translated to them in Spanish. The dozen suspects are wanted on federal charges in Texas, California, New York, Colorado and Washington. They are accused of affiliation with the Tijuana, Juarez, Gulf and Federation cartels. The three others are being held on state charges in New York, Washington and in Ector County, Texas, where a child kidnapping and sex assault case is pending.

Calderon's vowThe people who are accused of running financially influential organizations asked for court-appointed lawyers. They said they worked menial jobs or not at all.

Houston was chosen as the first U.S. destination because federal officials "had to pick a location that would be as central and conducive to security and the resources that we needed to have available," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said.

The extraditions came less than two months after Mexican President Felipe Calderon took office and vowed to clamp down on drug trafficking.

Top U.S. anti-drug officials on Monday praised Calderon and trumpeted the scope of the case.

"We cannot over-emphasize the significance of these actions," said McNulty.

"Mexico is extraditing to the U.S. for the first time defendants who have held serious high-level positions in the country's most significant drug cartels, and other serious violent criminals were included."

He added that none of the suspects will face the death penalty, a punishment that does not exist in Mexico.

"We have to make the assurances necessary for a successful extradition," McNulty said.

John Walters, director of the White House anti-drug office, agreed, calling it "a watershed event."

Tandy said Cardenas directed the trafficking of 4 to 6 tons of cocaine across the South Texas border each month — first from his base in the border city of Matamoros, and after his arrest in 2003 from a federal prison outside Mexico City.

Cardenas, 39, is also charged with leading an ambush of U.S. federal agents in Matamoros, across the border from Brownsville, in November 1999. Brandishing his trademark gold-plated .45-caliber pistol, Cardenas and a dozen of his henchmen surrounded a car carrying two agents from the DEA and the FBI and threatened to kill them if they didn't turn over an informant, Tandy said.

A former policeman, Cardenas in the early 1990s joined the Gulf Cartel under the leadership of Juan Garcia Abrego.

In 1992, Cardenas was arrested in South Texas and charged with smuggling 5 1/2 pounds of cocaine into the United States, according to U.S. federal court documents. The charges were later dropped and he was released a year later, according to news reports.

After Garcia Abrego was arrested and extradited to Houston in 1996, Cardenas quickly established control by killing off many of his rivals, officials from both countries say.

But his crowning move was luring dozens of members of an elite army squad to join his criminal ranks in 1998, they say. The Zetas, as the elite gang of hitmen is known, have been crucial to establishing the Gulf Cartel as one of the country's most powerful criminal organizations, officials say.

In March 2003, Mexican authorities triumphantly announced Cardenas' arrest in Matamoros. But rather than isolate him, they placed him in a cell alongside the accused Tijuana cartel boss, Benjamin Arellano Felix. The two joined forces, continuing to run their businesses by using banned cell phones, officials say.

Last year, as the Gulf Cartel waged a turf war against its main rival — an alliance of several cartels known as the Federation — more than 2,000 people were killed in Mexico.

Prison operationsOperating from inside Mexico's notoriously corrupt prison system helped Cardenas cement his reputation as a kind of Robin Hood of the border, despite being behind bars.

In April 2004, he reportedly bankrolled a Children's Day party for thousands of flood victims in the border city of Piedras Negras, across from Eagle Pass, Texas.

Collaborators with bullhorns drove through nearby towns announcing that the gifts — including Nintendo sets and bicycles — were thanks to "Osiel Cardenas, friend of the poor," according to local news reports.

A month later, Cardenas hosted a giant Mother's Day celebration for working-class women in two border towns, where prizes included refrigerators and dining-room sets, local media reported.

However, Tandy said, Cardenas' glory days are now over.

"He killed his way up the ladder to lead the Gulf Cartel," she said, "and now he's looking forward to the rest of his life" in a U.S. prison.

More Extraditions To Come, Mexico Says (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Carlos Martinez, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 22, 2007

Attorney general says transfer to U.S. of drug suspects severs criminal ties and restores the integrity of prisons.

MEXICO CITY — On the heels of the extradition of four top drug cartel leaders, Mexico's attorney general said Sunday he planned to send more suspects to face U.S. trials, tacitly acknowledging that corruption had allowed drug kingpins to direct operations even while in maximum-security Mexican prisons.

The latest round of extraditions Friday night — which also includes six other drug suspects of lesser rank — breaks ties between drug capos and "the structures of the criminal organizations in our country," Atty. Gen. Eduardo Medina Mora said. He added that the transfer of wealthy suspected traffickers to the United States would help return security and integrity to the prisons where they were held.

Aggressive extradition is emerging as the second prong of Mexican President Felipe Calderon's get-tough approach to the drug gang violence that killed more than 2,000 people nationwide last year. In January, 17 Mexican suspects have been handed over to U.S. authorities, a pace that would easily surpass last year's record 63 extraditions.

Calderon's first line of attack started shortly after he took office in December, when he began ordering the army, navy and federal police into several states, including his home state of Michoacan and the key smuggling cities of Tijuana and Acapulco.

Medina Mora said Sunday the army had also been working in Mexico's so-called Golden Triangle, where the states of Sinaloa, Chihuahua and Durango intersect in the western Sierra Madre. The mountainous region is a longtime center of marijuana and heroin production, and Sinaloa is home to Mexico's most notorious drug lords.

Federal forces in recent weeks have burned 2,500 acres of marijuana fields and nearly 2,000 acres of opium poppy fields, security officials said Sunday. They've confiscated 2.6 tons of cocaine and 20 tons of harvested marijuana.

Authorities say they have arrested 98 people, mostly low-level growers, workers and a few alleged assassins.

Disrupting business

Among those turned over to U.S. authorities late Friday was Osiel Cardenas, a former police officer and the reputed head of the so-called Gulf cartel. His group has been battling a Sinaloa-based Pacific Coast organization for control of lucrative smuggling routes along the U.S.-Mexico border. He has allegedly been running his operation from a maximum-security prison outside of Mexico City since his 2003 arrest.

Two of the other top drug leaders extradited were Cardenas allies from Tijuana, brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero; and one, Hector "Guero" Palma, a competitor from the Sinaloa group.

"There are dozens of extraditions pending, but there are ongoing legal procedures that federal courts haven't yet resolved," Medina Mora said. Cardenas and the other drug leaders had exhausted appeals in their legal fight against extradition, he said.

Calderon's short-term goal, officials say, is to warn competing leaders that he will disrupt business unless they end the daily kidnappings, beheadings and torture in the war between Mexico's east and west coast factions.

"Mexicans can be sure that we will continue working to reclaim public spaces and to close down territory on criminals," Mexican Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna said Sunday.

Nearly all the cocaine and marijuana consumed in the U.S., an annual market estimated at more than $50 billion, comes via Mexican smugglers, wholesalers and dealers. Based on 2005-06 border seizures, about 60% of the cocaine arrives in Texas, and California and Arizona each account for about 20%.

Although experts believe some of the profits are invested in Mexican real estate and business, the Calderon administration worries that the drug war will scare off legitimate investors and hobble his promise to create millions of new jobs.

UPDATE: Drug Ring Busted After Two-year Investigation (TUSN)

By Stephanie Taylor, Staff Writer

Tuscaloosa News (Alabama), January 23, 2007

More than 20 people have been accused of taking part in a sophisticated operation that brought illegal drugs from the West Coast to West Alabama.

A two-year investigation by dozens of federal agents and local law enforcement officers resulted in federal drug trafficking charges against 21 people from Tuscaloosa and Greene counties.

A 37-count indictment unsealed Monday charges them with distribution of powder and crack cocaine. Twelve of them were arrested over the weekend.

The men allegedly used several drivers who used 18-wheeler freight trucks to haul drugs from California to a location in Greene County where it was then distributed to lower-level dealers, said Jill Ellis, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Birmingham.

David Smith, 58, of Boligee was described as the organizer of the operation.

The first count of the indictment charges Smith with operating a continuing criminal enterprise. Other charges included using a telephone or computer to facilitate drug trafficking, conspiracy to posses with the intent to distribute and distribution of cocaine and crack.

"Smith's drug trafficking organization was a major distributor of powder and crack cocaine to high- and mid-level dealers throughout West Alabama," U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said in a written release.

The men arrested over the weekend were described as "lieutenants" within the organization, or distributors who use "runners" to get the drugs to street-level buyers.

"This weekend's arrests are the result of an outstanding DEA led counter-drug investigation which targeted the organizational structure and its leadership," Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0120274

The indictment filed seeks criminal forfeiture of at least $9.7 million in cash and seven parcels of property in Greene and Tuscaloosa counties. Also seized in the weekend arrests were 7.5 grams of cocaine, 32 firearms, $60,000 in cash, a Harley Davidson motorcycle, a Cadillac SUV, a Chevrolet SUV and a Mercedes G55 SUV.

Martin and Gregory Borland, Assistant Special Agent in Charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency's Alabama office, spoke about the indictments at a press conference in Birmingham Monday.

"This was a very complex and long-term investigation into the drug trafficking activities of an organization that has operated with impunity for many years," Borland said in a release. "The close-knit relationship of those involved in the conspiracy, as well as the rural area in which they operated, rendered the investigations security of paramount importance."

A task force was organized to gain access to the drug ring, which included special agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Internal Revenue Service; and the U.S. Marshals Service. Officers from the Alabama Bureau of Investigation, the Tuscaloosa and Jefferson County Sheriff's offices, the Calhoun County Drug Task Force, Birmingham, Alabaster, Fairfield and Montevallo Police departments assisted in the investigation.

"The ability of such a large number of officers from various agencies to work together without compromising the investigation speaks volumes about the professionalism of Alabama Law Enforcement," Martin said in the release.

The men alleged to have been involved in the drug ring have been arrested and were in the process Monday of making initial court appearances, including bond and detention hearings. The names of the remaining five people indicted were withheld pending the service of warrants. The U.S. Attorneys Office will prosecute the men.

The Birmingham News (AL), January 23, 2007

A federal indictment unsealed Monday charges 21 people with involvement with a major drug distribution ring operating out of west Alabama.

The charges result from a two-year undercover Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation to dismantle the drug ring, which is believed to have been supplied with powder cocaine and crack cocaine delivered by several drivers using tractor-trailer rigs running from California to a central location in Greene County for distribution.

Dozens of federal, state and local law enforcement officers on Saturday rounded up the first dozen of those indicted, including David Smith, 58, of Boligee, whom U.S. Attorney Alice Martin described as the organizer of the ring.

The defendants were taken before federal court magistrate judges on Monday for court appearances such as bond and detention hearings.

Nine people are still being sought on warrants.

Authorities so far have seized 7½ kilograms of cocaine, 32 guns, $60,000, a Harley Davidson motorcycle and three luxury vehicles, including a Mercedes SUV, Martin said.

The indictment, which had been under seal since December, also seeks criminal forfeiture of seven parcels of land in Greene and Tuscaloosa counties.

Smith is charged with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, using a telephone to facilitate a drug-trafficking crime; conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute, and distribution of cocaine and crack.

The government is seeking criminal forfeiture of at least $9.7 million by Smith.

The other defendants face charges of drug conspiracy and possession with the intent to distribute cocaine or crack, Martin said at a Monday news conference.

Separately, Freddie Hill, 64, of Livingston was charged by prosecutors in a criminal complaint Monday and arrested on drug conspiracy charges related to the drug ring, Martin said.

Gregory Borland, assistant special agent in charge of Alabama's Drug Enforcement Administration, called the investigation one of the most significant he has been involved in in Alabama.

"This was a very complex and long-term investigation into drug trafficking activities of an organization that has operated with impunity for many years," Borland said.

Tyson Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 23, 2007

PHOENIX (AP) -- Former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of drug possession and driving under the influence of drugs.

Tyson spoke only to give his name and his birth date during the brief hearing before Maricopa County Superior Court Commissioner Lisa Vandenberg, who entered the plea on Tyson's behalf. Tyson stood with his arms crossed while Vandenberg spoke to his attorneys. He didn't speak to reporters after the hearing.

One of Tyson's four lawyers, David Chesnoff, said Tyson is seeking professional help "for whatever problems he has" and would fight to stay out of prison.

"Drug addiction is a victimless crime," Chesnoff said. "We believe this is the kind of crime where you shouldn't go to prison."

Tyson was indicted earlier this month on felony drug possession and paraphernalia possession counts and two misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence of drugs. If convicted of all four charges, he could be sentenced to up to 7 1/2 years in prison.

Maricopa County Attorney Andrew Thomas has said he would pursue prison time for Tyson, who was convicted of rape in Indiana in 1992 and pleaded no contest to misdemeanor assault charges in Maryland in 1999.

The latest charges stem from Tyson's Dec. 29 arrest in Scottsdale. Tyson was pulled over after leaving a nightclub, and an officer found bags of cocaine in his back pocket and another in a package of cigarettes in his car, according to court records.

Tyson is due back in court Feb. 26.

Tyson, who recently got back in the ring for a series of four-round exhibitions, became the youngest heavyweight champion in history at 20 in 1986, when he knocked out Trevor Berbick. Four years later, he was knocked out by James "Buster" Douglas. By 1997, Tyson's career hit a low point when he bit Evander Holyfield's ear during a fight.

Chesnoff, who previously represented celebrity homemaker Martha Stewart on charges of lying about a stock sale, said Tyson's celebrity has brought unfair attention to his arrest by the public and prosecutors.

"Mike provided a lot of thrills and excitement," Chesnoff said. "He made a lot of people rich. He's concerned about this. He's a sensitive guy. This is not a game to him."

Consequences: Gun Ownership Linked To Higher Homicide Rates (NYT)

By Eric Nagourney

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

States with the greatest number of guns in the home also have the highest rates of homicide, a new study finds.

The study, in the February issue of Social Science and Medicine, looked at gun ownership in all 50 states and then compared the results with the number of people killed over a three-year period.

The research, the authors said, “suggests that household firearms are a direct and an indirect source of firearms used to kill Americans both in their homes and on the streets.”

The researchers, led by Matthew Miller of the Harvard School of Public Health, drew on data gathered by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. In 2001, the agency surveyed more than 200,000 people and asked them, among other questions, whether they had a gun in or near the home.

In states in the highest quarter of gun ownership, the study found, the overall homicide rate was 60 percent higher than in states in the lowest quarter. The rate of homicides involving guns was more than twice as high.

Among the possible explanations for the higher homicide rates, the study said, is that states with high gun ownership tend to make it easier to buy guns. There are also more guns that can be stolen. And the presence of a gun may allow arguments and fights to turn fatal.

The researchers said they could not prove that the guns caused the increase in homicides, only that there was a link. It may be, they said, that people are more likely to buy guns in states where violence is already high. But they said that explanation did not appear to be supported by their findings.

Report Details Problems With Gun Sellers (PHI)

By Robert Moran

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 23, 2007

Gun-control advocates joined Philadelphia Police Commissioner Sylvester M. Johnson yesterday in calling for more prosecutions of gun dealers who sell to the gun-traffickers and straw purchasers fueling the violence plaguing Philadelphia and other cities.

At City Hall, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a national report, "Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers," that highlights more than two dozen cases - including nine in Pennsylvania - of dealers who sold guns that wound up in the hands of criminals. The criminals were prosecuted but the dealers were not.

"The recent upsurge in criminal gun violence places renewed importance on the question: Where do criminals get their guns?" the report states.

The report identified, among others, Abington Gun Sports in Willow Grove, which allegedly sold to female straw buyers working for a man who authorities say then went on a rampage in Philadelphia in 2003, holding up fast-food restaurants, carjacking a Lexus, and robbing a bank of nearly $60,000.

The guns the women bought included an AK-47 SAR assault rifle, two 12-gauge shotguns, a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle, and a Marlon 30-30 rifle, according to the federal indictment of Andre Henry, three other men and three female straw purchasers. The case is pending.

"Is it any wonder that Philadelphia streets are overrun by illegal guns?" asked Brian J. Siebel, coauthor of the report.

Johnson said Philadelphia needed federal help because Pennsylvania gun laws are weak.

Frank D. Strange, owner of Abington Gun Sports, said in a phone interview that he was vigilant about straw buyers and anyone else who shouldn't be buying guns, but that he couldn't spot everybody trying to fool him.

He said that in an effort to thwart illegal purchases, he bans customers from using cell phones in his store to prevent possible straw buyers from getting advice about which guns to buy.

He also said that when he suspects people are acting as straw buyers, he lets them fill out all the paperwork first, then refuses to make the sale. He then provides the completed paperwork and ID evidence to the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, which investigates gun trafficking.

In addition to the regular reports he must make to the ATF, Strange said, he must submit a separate report every three months about his activity because his store has a higher-than-normal rating for "time to crime" - the time that passes before a gun he sold is used in a crime.

He attributed the rating to his proximity to Philadelphia, but he said he can't stop selling to people from Philadelphia if they appear to be legitimate buyers.

Strange, 63, a retired banker, called the Brady Center "a bunch of whackjobs" who want to "disarm everybody."

Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Center and former mayor of Fort Wayne, Ind., said the ATF had been greatly weakened by pro-dealer legislation Congress passed, including some laws dating to 1986.

For example, if ATF agents make a surprise visit to a gun shop suspected of breaking the law, they are not allowed to make another surprise visit for 12 months, Helmke said. During that period, the ATF must warn the dealer in advance that they are coming.

Strange, who has owned his shop for about eight years, said ATF agents had inspected it three or four times, most recently last week when they came in to retrieve all his sales documentation from last year. He said the visits were all unannounced.

With Democrats now in control of Congress, gun-control advocates and law enforcement leaders will press their case for new laws and tougher enforcement.

Today, Mayor Street is expected to join more than 50 other mayors, including Mayor Michael Bloomberg of New York, at a summit in Washington to address the proliferation of illegal guns.

Feds Unveil Plan To Stop Illegal Gun Sales (KTVT)

KTVT-TV, CBS 11, Dallas-Fort Worth, January 23, 2007

(CBS 11 News) DALLAS The U.S. Attorney's Office, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the firearms industry are joining forces to stop the illegal purchases of firearms.

Monday they unveiled a campaign called "Don't Lie for the Other Guy." The program hopes to raise public awareness and educate firearms dealers about "straw" purchases.

A straw purchase is when someone buys a firearm for someone who cannot legally buy one for themselves.

A spokesperson for the ATF said, "This program is an important tool for ATF as we pursue our mission of preventing terrorism, reducing violent crime and protecting the public."

It is a federal felony to purchase a gun for someone who can't, punishable up to 10 years in jail and up to a $250,000 fine.

In 2005, ATF arrests led to over 1440 individuals being convicted of illegal firearms trafficking. That's up 14 percent from the previous year.

The group will display flyers in all gun stores and distribute materials about illegal firearms transactions. Several public service announcements about the program are also planned to hit the airwaves.

Sheriff Traces Guns' Crooked Paths To Compton's Streets (LAT)

By Megan Garvey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

To crack down on gangs and stem soaring violence in Compton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca asked his deputies and detectives not just to investigate crime but to also probe where gang members were getting their guns.

So sheriff's officials embarked on an unprecedented census to track down the origins of nearly 900 weapons confiscated there last year.

The results, released Monday, offer a glimpse into the complex and unexpected ways guns get into the hands of gang members.

Sixteen guns recovered in or near Compton were traced to a single store in Sparks, Nev., through databases of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

That same location, officials said, accounted for more than 350 weapons recovered nationwide by law enforcement officials last year, including 65 in the Los Angeles area.

The bureau is investigating the store, and law enforcement officials declined to identify it, Baca said.

The bulk of the weapons confiscated in Compton were originally sold in California. But scores of others came from Arizona, Nevada and Colorado. Nine weapons were registered in Connecticut and a few others were registered in Ohio.

Several of the weapons were traced to killings. Five of the recovered weapons were among 37 taken in a burglary of a Westminster gun store in October.

In all, however, only a couple dozen of the guns had been reported stolen, even though almost none were found in the possession of the registered owner.

"It tells us that these people are selling them," said Cmdr. Ralph Martin, referring to a practice known as "straw buys" in which a person who is legally able to buy a weapon turns around and passes the gun to someone who cannot.

By the end of 2006, gang suppression deputies and detectives, along with street officers working out of the Compton station, seized 875 weapons, about 10% of the total recovered by law enforcement countywide last year.

"There's only one or two gun stores in Compton," Martin said. "We thought: Is there a gun store or two that is selling to cons? If so, we thought we should know that."

Sheriff's officials said clear patterns have already emerged showing a disproportionate number of confiscated weapons originating from a relatively small number of gun dealers or retailers.

"Certain gun stores led the pack," said Lt. Paul Pietrantoni, who headed a gang task force sent to Compton a year ago after the city experienced soaring homicides in 2005.

Those stores, he said, are the focus of an investigation that may be concluded in the coming weeks.

Now, sheriff's investigators hope to go further, connecting the dots between the legal purchases and the guns ending up in the possession of known gang members on the streets of Compton.

Local law enforcement officials said they were surprised by the connection between Compton crime and a store in Sparks, a suburb of 81,000 near Reno. There are at least half a dozen gun dealers and gunsmiths in the Sparks area, including a pawnshop, gun stores and a specialty precision weapons maker.

In 1999, one Sparks-based gun manufacturer was found negligent in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y., for marketing and distribution practices that a jury determined had contributed to illegal drug trafficking in New York state. Los Angeles law enforcement officials said Monday that they did not know if that maker had any connection to the current investigation.

The next step, they say, will be to knock on the doors of as many of the registered owners as possible.

"We need to ask: Do you know where your gun is? Where'd it go? Did you sell it? Why didn't you register the sale?" Pietrantoni said. "It shouldn't be easy to lose track of a gun."

Baca said the data collected so far suggest federal and local officials need to significantly improve the tracking of weapons that change hands.

He called the relationship between those who buy guns legally and those guns ending up being used illegally "the nexus between law-abiding and lawlessness."

"That gap has to be closed," said Baca, who added that he believed the survey of guns seized in Compton showed "the idea of checking people's background who are the purchasers is not enough. It's not only not doing enough, it's then not holding the original gun purchaser accountable for their guns."

He said he plans to pursue ways to go after gun owners who knowingly or willingly give or sell their weapons to people who cannot legally buy a gun.

"I think there is virtually no control," he said. "There should be a law against that. If you buy a gun, it is yours to care for and secure and you are prohibited from giving that gun to another person for any reason whatsoever."

Baca announced the overall results of the task force Monday at a news conference outside Compton City Hall. He said the goal had been to reduce homicides by 40%, a goal he said was exceeded.

In 2005, the station reported 72 gang-related homicides, compared with 36 last year. In addition, two suspected gang members were shot and killed by deputies in 2006.

The task force made 1,622 arrests, 959 of them on felony charges. It executed 301 search warrants and worked closely with probation and parole officers assigned to Compton.

The sheriff said Monday that he plans to keep the task force, which is paid for with county funds, in place for "a long time."

"When you have a crisis in any part of Los Angeles," Baca said, "it's absolutely irresponsible not to respond."

His goal: "There is no longer a significant gang problem in Compton."

Baca had moved several dozen gang suppression deputies and detectives as well as a narcotics team and homicide detectives to Compton a year ago, even though the city had no additional funds to increase services.

Since 2000, Compton has contracted with the sheriff for law enforcement, a move made by then-Mayor Omar Bradley, who said the police force was too costly to maintain.

When task force personnel were shifted back to other areas at midyear without the sheriff's knowledge, the city and nearby unincorporated areas experienced seven homicides in eight days.

In 2006, Compton had only 13 homicides through early July and had been on a pace to set the lowest number of killings in a generation.

"It was a mistake," Baca said of the task force's temporary removal. "It showed how quickly the guns and the gangs and the drugs and the racial hatred will return if you leave. We learned the hard way."

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Immigrant Charged With Sex Assault Asks To Be Deported To Avoid Punishment (FOX)

Fox News, January 23, 2007

WOODSTOCK, Ill. — Not many illegal immigrants ask to be deported. But Jose Vallejo of Mexico did, rather than face a potential prison term of 30 years for sex assault here in the United States. And he nearly got his wish.

Prosecutors in Illinois say Vallejo, who is now a 17-year-old Mexican national, pinned a 4-year-old girl down on a bed, then molested her on April 12, 2006. Even though Vallejo was only 16 at the time of the alleged crime, he is being charged as an adult because of the age of the victim. He faces three counts, including aggravated criminal sexual assault, one count of unlawful restraint.

Originally, bond was set by a state judge at $150,000 but Vallejo's family posted the cash. So, Vallejo was released by the state, but soon after, was taken into custody by federal agents for illegally entering the country three years ago.

While in federal custody, Vallejo asked a federal immigration judge to deport him. The request was granted during a Jan. 4 deportation hearing in Chicago.

But before Vallejo was sent back over the border, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials alerted prosecutors in McHenry County, Ill., and that agency took custody of him.

"It's kind of terrifying to know that someone who has violated a four-year-old, sexually violated, would be washed from the system all of the sudden, he would escape from our country here and it'd be over," said state attorney Lou Bianchi.

Bianchi said a number of things could be added to courtrooms to give immigration judges tools to determine if someone before them has criminal charges pending, which could decide whether or not they stay in the United States to face charges.

"If they have a monitor, at least someone in the courtroom is watching the monitor and all of the sudden it would flash up on the screen that this man is wanted or he's got at least outstanding charges so that the appropriate authority like in this case," Bianchi said. "Our office could be notified so that we could take the proper precautions to make sure that these type of illegal aliens who commit crimes are not deported immediately so that we can prosecute them."

But Vallejo's attorney, Perry Grimaldi, argued in state court that the deportation order should stand, saying, "their law is supreme over the state laws. They are the ones that have taken him into custody. They are the ones that will conduct any further actions."

But a county judge on Jan. 16 ruled against Vallejo, upping his bond from $150,000 to $750,000 to prevent his deportation.

ICE characterizes this case as textbook, stressing that red flags were raised after the immigration judge's deportation order.

But immigration watchdogs say laws must be changed to ensure immigration judges are informed of pending criminal charges. Currently, these federal judges don't take criminal charges into account, unless that's the reason for the illegal immigrant's deportation hearing.

"The system should work in a way that the only people who go before an immigration judge who have committed some sort of crime has already served their time for that crime," said Jack Martin, special projects director for the Federation for American Immigration Reform. "In other words, they should not heave people coming before them that are involved in another judicial proceeding until that proceedings is completed."

Martin said the number of cases of this type is increasing with the illegal immigrant population in the United States; case loads of this type are growing by about 500,000 a year, and there are currently between 11 and 13 million — with some estimates saying as many as 20 million — people in the United States illegally.

Susan Eastwood, spokeswoman for the Justice Department's executive office for immigration review, told FOX News that immigration courts will not consider any crimes allegedly committed by an illegal immigrant, unless they are related to the immigration case at hand.

"Our judges do not take into account pending criminal charged against a defendant," Eastwood said. "The judges must stay fair and balanced on a case. A criminal case and a deportation hearing are separate trials. Immigration judges do not do criminal trials."

Now that he'll be in the United States for awhile, Vallejo has requested a jury trial. His next court date is scheduled for March 2.

FOX News' Jeff Goldblatt and Abby Silverman contributed to this report.

Senators Meet On Recent Immigration Raid (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm

AP, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON Jan 22, 2007 (AP)— The Bush administration is taking heat from lawmakers for the harm done to a company during last month's largest-ever immigration raid.

Immigration officials on Dec. 12 arrested 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in Texas, Colorado, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska and Utah.

After a closed-door meeting Monday with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, senators from the affected states said the raid exposed flaws in the federal government and in a program designed to help employers screen for illegal immigrants.

Among the concerns, senators reported, were that agencies can't share information about stolen identities and that programs designed to catch illegal immigrants allow many lawbreakers to slip through the cracks.

"I can't think of a system that would be better designed to fail," Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said.

Chertoff acknowledged some of the problems, and said his department's programs are not "the perfect cure." Senators said they wanted Chertoff to enforce the laws, but they needed to assure companies that working with the government would not ultimately hurt them.

Swift participated in a program called Basic Pilot, which screens employees for illegal Social Security numbers. The system doesn't snag stolen Social Security numbers or numbers that are being used in multiple locations.

Although the government took no action against Swift in the Dec. 12 raids, the Greeley, Colo., meat processor was forced to temporarily halt operations. The raids could cost the company an estimated $30 million.

"We want employers to use Basic Pilot," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "But we need to have a clear understanding with the business community. I think it's very unclear now."

The senators said they planned to introduce legislation to fix some of the problems.

For example, they hope to change the law to allow the Social Security Administration to tell the Homeland Security Department when a Social Security number is being used more than once.

Since the arrests, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has announced the indictments of 148 illegal immigrants, who used other peoples' Social Security numbers and other personal information to get jobs at Swift. Local prosecutors are bringing state charges against the immigrants, including 80 in Cache County, Utah, and 18 in Weld County, Colo.

Judge Closes Lawsuit After US Federal Officials Account For Detainees In Immigration Raid (FINDLAW/AP)

By Judith Kohler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

(AP) - DENVER-A judge closed a lawsuit against the federal government Monday after federal officials disclosed the whereabouts and status of 262 workers arrested during last month's largest-ever immigration raid at Swift & Co. meatpacking plant in Greeley, Colorado.

Attorneys for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, which filed the suit, said it should not have taken a lawsuit to get the information. The lawsuit alleged the U.S. government had violated the Greeley workers' constitutional right to due process.

The people arrested in Greeley were among 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in six U.S. states who were taken into custody on Dec. 12, most on illegal immigration charges. The union lawsuit did not cover workers in the other states.

U.S. District Judge John Kane terminated the lawsuit after union and federal lawyers agreed that all the arrested workers had been accounted for and given a chance to seek bond.

The government released the information to the union last week under orders from Kane.

A total of 74 of the Greeley workers remained in federal custody in Denver and El Paso, Texas, and 75 voluntarily returned to Mexico, according to federal officials. Another 18 face state identity-theft charges in Weld County, Colorado, where the Greeley Swift plant is located.

Kane said his jurisdiction was limited to whether workers' basic legal rights were protected and did not extend to the propriety of the raid itself. He said he saw no evidence that the detainees' rights were violated.

John Bowen, attorney for the union group, said the bond hearings should have been held within 48 hours of the raid, but the last one for the Swift employees did not take place until Friday.

"It should not have taken more than a month, by any stretch of the imagination," he added.

Immigration officials did not immediately answer a request for comment to The Associated Press

Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents raided Swift plants in Greeley; Grand Island, Nebraska; Cactus, Texas; Hyrum, Utah; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Worthington, Minnesota.

ICE officials said they were cracking down on an indentity-theft scheme, but union spokesman Dave Minshall called the arrests "a brutal immigration raid, pure and simple."

TAX:

Former Shelby Tax Preparer Pleads Guilty In State Court (SHELSTAR)

By Pete DeLea

Shelby (NC) Star, January 23, 2007

RALEIGH — Former Shelby tax preparer Jerry O. Adams III, who still faces federal charges on defrauding the U.S. Department of Treasury of more than $3.8 million, pleaded guilty to failing to file and pay the state individual income tax last week in state court.

Judge K. Dean Black issued Adams a 45-day suspended sentence and placed him on supervised probation for two years. The sentence will be reduced to unsupervised probation after he pays $3,675 in court costs and restitution to the state.

“It’s the department’s responsibility to make sure everyone pays their fair share of taxes,” said Kim Brooks, director of public affairs for the Department of Revenue. “That’s what we did here.”

Adams said he’s innocent but wanted a quick resolution. He said he’s working on a settlement on the federal charges.

“I didn’t owe it. I settled this because I want this to be done with,” said Adams. “I’m glad to get this over with and I want to move on with my life.”

He said the state case started when the U.S. Internal Revenue Service audited him. He said the audit showed he owed more money than he originally stated. He said they then passed the information on to the N.C. Department of Revenue.

“They audited my paperwork and they said, ‘If you owe them more money, you owe us more money,’” Adams said. “They didn’t give me an opportunity to present my receipts.”

In the federal case, the U.S. Department of Justice claims that Adams, along with Demetria S. Adams, prepared tax returns that understated wages and overstated credits, which resulted in excessive refunds.

The suit against the couple states they defrauded the government of $3.8 million in more than 1,600 tax returns filed between 2004 and 2005 through businesses called First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby.

A July 2 trial date has been scheduled in U.S. District Court in front of Judge Dennis Howell, said Andrew Ames, a Justice Department spokesman.

As part of an agreement with the federal government, Adams said he’s no longer allowed to prepare tax returns and has been doing paralegal work since the federal case was filed in May.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Speech To Showcase Domestic Agenda (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 23, 2007

President Bush will tell Americans Tuesday night he has important plans for health care, education and other kitchen table topics that have little to do with Iraq. Yet if the state of the union is strong, so is the nation's skepticism that he can deliver.

For the first time, Bush will give his State of the Union address with Democrats in power and looking over his shoulder — literally, with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi seated right behind him. Most people have no confidence that Bush and a Democratic Congress can solve problems together, a troubling sentiment that has only deepened since the November election, an Associated Press-AOL News poll finds.

The 9 p.m. EST speech is a chance for Bush to pull his domestic agenda out from the shadow of the Iraq war, if only briefly. So Bush will focus on issues he hopes will appeal to mainstream America — and to Democrats on Capitol Hill, shifting pressure onto them to govern.

"He's got to be convincing, so that the American people believe that he's serious about working in a bipartisan way," said Charlie Black, a longtime Republican strategist and informal White House adviser. "If there's one headline they'd like to have out of this, that would be it."

The president is expected to address:

• Health care: Bush will propose a tax deduction of $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families regardless of whether they buy their own health insurance or receive medical coverage at work. Health care insurance would be considered taxable income, and people with more generous policies could face tax increases unless they change plans. The administration says its plan will help people who buy insurance individually rather than through their employers. The administration says the tax deductions will allow more Americans to buy insurance.

• Energy: Bush is expected to call for a sharp escalation of corn-based ethanol as a gasoline blend. He also may seek the power to raise fuel economy standards for passenger cars, probably as part of a plan to offer financial incentives for increasing alternative fuels. The auto industry has resisted upgraded mileage requirements and stressed a need for vehicles fueled by alternatives such as ethanol, diesel and eventually hydrogen. Bush asked for the same authority last year. Some Democrats worry the plan would give transportation officials overly broad authority to change the system and note the measure would not have any impact on current gas prices.

• Education: Bush will push for Congress to renew his education law, No Child Left Behind, which expires this year. Democrats have already signaled their intention to work with him but will expect him to go along with increases in spending. The law pushes schools that receive federal poverty aid to show yearly progress or face sanctions, including allowing students to transfer or demand extra tutoring.

Bush will also push for an immigration strategy that includes more than tougher border security.

Meanwhile, bitter feelings over the war stand in the way of the principal goal of the speech — a bipartisan agenda.

Just about everything Bush wants to do is dependent on a Congress in which even some Republicans are resisting his ideas. Within a day of his speech, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is likely to vote on a resolution condemning his move to send more troops to Iraq.

No matter the emphasis on domestic issues, Bush cannot skirt the war, and he has no intention of trying.

Without rehashing the Iraq speech he gave two weeks ago, Bush will defend his stand that Iraq is part of a war on terror that will make Americans safer. That contention will come during a foreign policy passage in which Bush will also tout U.S. humanitarian efforts abroad.

Since Bush announced his latest Iraq plan, the White House has pointed to signs of progress by the Iraqi government on both political and security fronts. Yet U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians have also endured some of the heaviest, bloodiest attacks of the war.

Coming after his Iraq speech, which had an enormous buildup, Bush's sixth State of the Union approaches with an anticlimactic feel. The Democrats and Republicans who want his job are already making headlines even though the 2008 election is still 22 months away.

With that in mind, Bush's aides took steps to keep the speech concise and relevant. Topics that might have made the cut in other years — such as recent advancements in cancer research and a drop in cancer-related deaths — have been set aside, often for separate events.

Bush Speech To Go Beyond War Policy (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Planning a State of the Union address Tuesday night heavy on health care, energy and education, President Bush will attempt to get beyond a raging debate over the war in Iraq as he faces a new Democratic-controlled Congress for the first time.

Yet, with mounting U.S. casualties in Iraq and a majority of Americans voicing disapproval with the nation's direction, criticism is likely to remain fixed on the president's war policy while congressional leaders attempt to swiftly discredit some of his new domestic initiatives, such as a tax deduction for health insurance to offer more people coverage.

The president, who plans to confront war critics in a speech starting at 8 p.m. CST and running longer than 40 minutes, also plans to spell out what the White House calls "bold proposals" on health care, energy independence, global warming and immigration.

This includes a proposal for a new standard tax deduction for people with health insurance. It is likely to attract ready controversy as it offers health coverage for perhaps just 3 million of the 47 million Americans now uninsured, while asking an estimated 30 million taxpayers now insured through their workplace to pay higher taxes as employer-paid health benefits become taxable.

As Bush presses an ambitious domestic agenda for the remaining two years of his presidency, he will find himself facing a hostile new audience with a Democratic-controlled Congress unwilling to accept his stance on the war and ready to relegate him to lame-duck status as 2008 presidential campaigns get underway.

"It's a tough order," said John Mueller, professor of political science at Ohio State University, who doubts the president can get beyond the war with this address because the war is the No 1 concern on Americans' minds heading into the speech.

"This has become so dominant," he said. "What's frustrating, from the president's standpoint, is there is nothing even close."

With 63 percent of Americans surveyed in the latest Gallup Poll voicing disapproval with the nation's direction, and only 35 percent satisfied, Gallup also has found a correlation with the war. The vast majority of those who oppose the war are dissatisfied with the way things are going in the U.S.—82 percent—while those who support the war are largely satisfied with the nation's direction—67 percent.

The president, who devoted a nationally televised speech to his war policy two weeks ago, will once again stress the urgency of the challenge that the U.S. faces in Iraq and his formula for success. But he also will attempt to focus the public and a Democratic Congress on a domestic agenda that the parties can pursue together.

"The president is going to offer some bold proposals that Congress could, in fact, enact, and in the process make itself look good and, more importantly, do the people's business," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday.

"When you have these big issues—health care is a big issue, energy is a big issue, education is a big issue, immigration is a big issue… it's worth spending a little more time to walk through how the president analyzes the problem," Snow said, "and how he proposes to try to address them, and to reach out to members of Congress and say, 'We can do this. We can work together on these things.'"

Foremost among the president's proposals is a plan to promote health care—a plan Democratic leaders already have started attacking as "a tax on working families" before Bush details it.

Bush will propose:

DOJ_NMG_0120284

A new standard tax deduction for anyone with health insurance, exempting the first $7,500 of an individual's income and the first $15,000 of a family's income from income or payroll tax.

A new tax on the health benefits that workers receive from employers and also on the share of premiums that employees now pay before taxes—subjecting to taxation the money that companies and employees contribute to employees' insurance plans.

With the average cost of a family health care plan at work expected to be $13,600 in 2009, when this proposal could start, 80 percent of all workers now insured through work stand to benefit from the proposed new standard tax deduction, while 20 percent of those insured at work stand to face higher taxes.

A tax shift promising lower taxes for about 120 million taxpayers now insured through work and higher taxes for about 30 million people who have more "generous," costly policies at work.

Offering a new tax break for people who purchase insurance on their own, and enabling many who lack insurance now to afford it. A "conservative" estimate by the White House suggests that "upwards of 3 million" of the 47 million now uninsured might gain coverage under this plan.

There are "winners and losers" in the plan, said Jason Furman, an expert on tax policy at the Brookings Institution.

"It is great that the president has come along and identified that our existing health care system is inadequate. And he is giving more of an incentive for people who lack insurance to get insurance," Furman said. "But then, unfortunately, when you get to the details, some of these things have to be improved."

From the government's standpoint, in terms of the money collected from taxpayers, the plan is "revenue-neutral" over a 10-year period, according to Katherine Baicker of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers. But it's a "revenue-loser" in the first few years, and a money-maker in the later years of the cycle.

The plan "levels the playing field" for people now purchasing insurance on their own, Baicker said, offering the same standard tax deduction for insurance that people covered at work stand to get.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid already has pounced on the plan as "a tax hike on working families." The health care premiums that employees pay at work have risen dramatically, his office noted, while wages have not.

Yet the president's plan offers coverage for more Americans without increasing the government's long-range costs, said Mark McClellan, who served as director of Medicare and Medicaid services in the Bush administration and is a visiting senior fellow at Brookings and the American Enterprise Institute.

"This is overall budget-neutral, from the standpoint of the federal government," said McClellan, acknowledging that higher taxes for some people pose "the challenging part of the proposal." But, while averting higher costs for the government, he said, "I think this is a serious contribution to getting more people insured."

For State Of The Union 2007, A Leaner Agenda (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

When President Bush takes to the airwaves Tuesday night to deliver his sixth State of the Union address, the metamessage of the evening will be: "I am still relevant."

Of course, as commander in chief during wartime, Mr. Bush is central. But as he seeks to show that he is not consumed by the Iraq war and its high-profile retooling, this year's annual message to Congress takes on added significance. In an effort to grab public attention, he is promising a different type of State of the Union – not the usual laundry list of items from the forthcoming budget, but a more focused look at a few key initiatives, most of them domestic.

The irony is that, for the first time, Bush will be speaking to a Congress in which both chambers are controlled by the opposition. For him to implement any proposals, he must find the common ground with Democrats that has been so talked about since November. Even when Republicans controlled Congress, there were no guarantees; Bush's 2005 plan to partially privatize Social Security failed to get off the ground.

This year, the most extensively previewed plan centers on a tax reform aimed at making health insurance more affordable to low-income people. The proposal would also reduce the tax break for more expensive health plans. In addition, Bush's speech will focus on energy, education, immigration, and the war on terror.

But will anyone be listening?

Just two weeks ago, Bush delivered a major address announcing the "new way forward" in Iraq, including a plan to add more than 20,000 US troops to try to bring some stability to Baghdad and areas where insurgents are believed to be operating. The speech did little to move polling numbers on Iraq and the Bush presidency, both stuck below 50 percent. In recent days Bush has said he will address the criticism of his plan – including from fellow Republicans – in the State of the Union speech.

A dissatisfied public

The president's job approval ratings have been mired mostly in the 30s for the past year, putting him in a league with some of the least popular US presidents of the 20th century, including Richard Nixon, Jimmy Carter, and Harry Truman.

Public satisfaction with the direction of the country has fared even worse. In the latest Gallup poll, released Monday, 35 percent reported they are satisfied "with the way things are going in the United States at this time" versus 63 percent dissatisfied. That number is better it was last month (30 percent) but about where it was one year ago.

Some presidential scholars are skeptical that Bush will really limit his penultimate State of the Union to just a few well-chosen ideas.

"I can't think of a point since his first run for governor in Texas where he didn't have a shopping list, where he wasn't thinking or acting on the notion that, unlike his dad [the first President Bush], he had the vision thing," says Fred Greenstein, a professor emeritus at Princeton University in New Jersey.

After all, a president who sets his sights modestly risks the dreaded label "lame duck." But after six years in office, most two-term presidents have already rolled out their biggest initiatives. The second half of second terms are more about completing unfinished business rather than starting something new. And it is debatable whether the bully pulpit is all it's cracked up to be, especially for an unpopular president.

"You've got a president who people know after six years, [and] you've got a dominant issue [Iraq] that people think they know after four years. So it's not like there's a lot of malleability there," says George Edwards, a political scientist at Texas A&M University and author of the book "On Deaf Ears: The Limits of the Bully Pulpit."

Bush now must also compete for attention with the rapidly expanding field of politicians who want to replace him in two years – including Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who announced her candidacy right before this year's State of the Union on purpose, her campaign says.

And in another moment of irony, one of Bush's central themes Tuesday night will be the rising cost of healthcare – the policy issue that Senator Clinton became infamous for as first lady when she headed up her husband's ill-fated healthcare reform effort.

Bush's health insurance plan

Tuesday night, Bush will propose that low-income people be given a tax break to help them afford health insurance. On the higher end of the scale, workers enrolled in more expensive plans would be taxed on coverage that exceeds a set limit. Some Democrats have already rejected the plan, calling it a tax increase on the middle class.

In his Saturday radio address, Bush focused on the relief his plan would provide to lower-income people:

"The current tax code encourages home ownership by allowing you to deduct the interest on your mortgage from your taxes. We can reform the tax code so that it provides a similar incentive for you to buy health insurance. So in my State of the Union Address next Tuesday, I will propose a tax reform designed to help make basic private health insurance more affordable – whether you get it through your job or on your own."

Leaner State Of The Union Aims For Common Ground (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120286

President Bush will reach out to Democrats in tonight's State of the Union address, pursuing common ground with his political adversaries on issues such as immigration, education and energy policy.

But viewers tuning in at 9 p.m. will see a different picture: Just over his shoulder on the television screen will be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, leader of the Democrats, who likely won't applaud the president's initiatives.

And some Republicans in the chamber may also sit on their hands to show displeasure as Mr. Bush seeks to draw support from a Democratic-led Congress for the first time in his presidency.

Mr. Bush plans a broad and thematic speech that will placate Republicans while seeking a central ground with Democrats, who along with a majority of Americans oppose Mr. Bush's strategy to deploy another 21,000 U.S. troops to Iraq.

"The president will need to focus on domestic policy issues that are widely recognized to be important and on which he can see some possibility of working with the new Democratic majority," said Cal Jillson, professor of political science at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

The White House has made clear the speech will focus on five issues -- the global war on terrorism, health care, education, immigration and energy -- instead of a laundry list of policy initiatives used in previous addresses.

Mr. Bush, as he did nearly two weeks ago in a prime-time address to the nation, will lay out his case for his new Iraq strategy, but he'll move quickly to topics that polls show Americans care most about, especially health care and education.

"Americans want a [health care] system that's going to be more patient-friendly and that's going to meet their needs," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday. "The president will talk about that. Education, always important ... Immigration has been an issue of considerable concern within this country."

"In other words, the president is going to address the areas that are foremost concern for Americans," Mr. Snow said. "When you have a Democratic Congress that came in two weeks ago saying, we want to get things done, we've got some offers that they're going to be pretty good for them."

Democrats, though, appear ready to oppose Mr. Bush at every turn. On Saturday, shortly after Mr. Bush proposed expanding health care coverage by putting incentives into the tax code for individuals to buy their own, Democratic leaders immediately opposed the plan.

Republican strategist Charlie Black, who works closely with the president, said Mr. Bush will not bend over backwards to win Democratic support. While he will seek to lay out an achievable bipartisan plan, "he will demonstrate that he is not a lame duck, that he is willing to tackle big issues."

Still, compounding the president's problems is the 2008 campaign for his job has already begun, and Democrats could well spend the next two years opposing Mr. Bush's plans.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, said over the weekend as she announced her presidential candidacy that she "will spend [the next] two years doing everything in my power to limit the damage George W. Bush can do."

In his speech tonight, Mr. Bush will give Democrats that opportunity with immigration, which many Americans see as the nation's No. 1 issue. He will repeat his call from last year for comprehensive immigration reform. While the Republican-controlled Congress would not approve the president's proposal to create a guest-worker program and put more than 10 million illegal aliens on a path to citizenship, Democrats just might.

Mr. Bush also will seek to renew his bipartisan friendship with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, who he teamed with to win overwhelming approval in Congress for the No Child Left Behind Act.

The act comes up for renewal this year, and some Republicans fear the president may cut a deal with majority Democrats, offering more money if Democrats agree to include more requirements for the high school level.

Mr. Kennedy, chairman of the Senate education panel, has said the White House failed to fight to adequately fund the massive federal program.

Bush, At Low Point In Polls, Will Push Domestic Agenda (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120287

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Carrying some of the worst public approval ratings of any president in a generation, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday night seeking to revitalize his domestic agenda but facing stiff resistance over the initiatives the White House has previewed so far.

Administration officials said Monday that among Mr. Bush's proposals would be a plan to help states provide health care coverage to people who lack insurance by diverting federal aid from hospitals, especially public institutions. The provision is likely to draw loud criticism from municipalities across the nation and will significantly affect the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, the nation's largest municipal health care system.

Officials said Mr. Bush's speech would include proposals to address the nation's energy needs and global warming, partly by promoting the use and development of alternative fuels. He is also expected to renew his call for an overhaul of immigration law and to propose altering tax policies to help the uninsured.

The president's advisers said they hoped Mr. Bush's address would re-energize his domestic agenda by striking a bipartisan and ambitious tone as he faces further isolation on his Iraq policy.

"The power of the ideas requires people to take notice and take seriously important domestic initiatives," said Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor. "There will be key signals to the American people that despite disagreements over the war, other work can be done."

Mr. Bartlett said a major theme of the address would be that "divided government does not mean we cannot govern."

But the initial response to Mr. Bush's health care plans has not been positive, on Capitol Hill or among constituencies including employers and labor unions. And with the president's political authority diminished and the new Democratic majority in Congress emboldened, the fate of his domestic agenda, and his ability to forge compromises on his terms, is in question.

Behind the president on the podium will be not Representative J. Dennis Hastert, the former speaker and Mr. Bush's stalwart Republican ally, but Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, with whom Mr. Bush traded insults throughout the 2006 campaign.

Giving the Democratic rebuttal will be Senator Jim Webb, Democrat of Virginia, whose son is serving in Iraq and who reported having a tense exchange with Mr. Bush at the Congressional Christmas party. The audience in the House chamber is expected to include the actor Michael J. Fox, who has become the face of the movement to overcome Mr. Bush's objections and increase federal financing for stem cell research.

The chamber will include an increasing number of Republicans who are questioning or breaking ranks with Mr. Bush on the war and other issues, as Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, did Monday in criticizing the president's decision to send more troops to Iraq.

Mr. Bush also faces an increasingly skeptical public, one that has given him some of his lowest marks in several recent polls.

According to a CBS News poll conducted Thursday through Sunday, 28 percent of Americans approve of the way the president is handling his job, and more than twice as many, 64 percent, disapprove. It is the lowest approval rating the president has received in a CBS News poll, though it is statistically little different from the rating of 30 percent he received earlier this month.

Only Jimmy Carter has received a lower approval rating, 26 percent, in 1979, in surveys conducted by CBS News or its polling partner, The New York Times. In a Gallup poll conducted in August 1974, just before his resignation, Richard M. Nixon had a 24 percent approval rating.

In a new ABC News/Washington Post poll made public on Monday, only 33 percent approved of Mr. Bush's job performance, and 65 disapproved, tying the record for his worst marks in that poll.

Asked about the new batch of low ratings, Mr. Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow, attributed them to discouragement over Iraq that could be overcome at home.

"George W. Bush as a president," Mr. Snow said, "is not somebody who is going to cease to be bold because there has been — because right now people are concerned about the progress of the war. Instead he understands his obligation as commander in chief is to go ahead and address forthrightly big problems and come up with solutions that not only are going to have political appeal, but they're also going to be effective in making life better for Americans."

DOJ_NMG_0120288

On health care, Mr. Bush is trying to drive the debate through plans that would not cost the federal government additional money at a time when the White House is committed to showing a plan to balance the budget. This weekend, the administration sketched out a proposal under which people whose health care programs exceed a certain value would face a higher tax bill, with the revenue going to tax incentives to encourage the purchase of health coverage by lower-income people.

Two leaders of fiscally conservative advocacy groups, Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform and Pat Toomey of the Club for Growth, endorsed Mr. Bush's plans. But in separate interviews, each expressed concern that Congressional Democrats would approve a plan that put greater emphasis on tax increases.

Labor leaders were outspoken in opposing the plan. "This is a wrongheaded, crazy proposal," said Gerald M. Shea, assistant to the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "It would throw into turmoil the employment-based system of health insurance, and it would impose a new tax on the middle class."

Several public health officials reacted with alarm to Mr. Bush's plan to encourage states to take Medicaid money now earmarked for public hospitals and use it for state programs to cover the uninsured. The Bush administration proposes cutting Medicaid payments to public hospitals and other "safety net" providers by $3.9 billion over the next five years. Preliminary estimates suggest that 40 percent of the savings would come at the expense of the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, which operates 11 hospitals, 4 nursing homes and more than 80 community clinics.

Kenneth E. Raske, president of the Greater New York Hospital Association, called the proposal "an absolute disaster for New York."

Deborah Bachrach, a deputy commissioner in the New York State Health Department, said it would affect hospitals "that serve some of the lowest-income, most vulnerable patients."

Defending the proposal, Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said: "We want to be able to redirect federal payments away from institutions and to needy individuals. Rather than perpetually paying bills for the uninsured, it's better to help them buy health insurance."

White House officials outlined the health care proposals ahead of the address to make way on Tuesday for a new emphasis on energy policy initiatives.

White House aides met Monday with two lawmakers who have pressed for the promotion and development of alternative fuels, Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa, and Senator Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana.

A Senate aide briefed on the meeting said the senators were told that the plan would be "very ambitious" in terms of increasing the development and use of alternative energy sources. They were also told that the plan would address "the use side," which could indicate a move to improve fuel standards, the aide said.

The new initiatives will require a political push by Mr. Bush, who will begin touring the nation to promote his policies on Wednesday.

Bush To Face Skeptical Congress (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

President Bush plans to reach out to the opposition in his State of the Union address tonight with new and recycled proposals on health care, energy, immigration and education, but the uproar over his decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq has eclipsed potential consensus on domestic policy.

As he addresses a Congress controlled entirely by Democrats for the first time since he took office, Bush faces deep skepticism inside the chamber, even within the House Republican leadership, which yesterday made proposals intended "to hold the Bush administration . . . accountable" for the progress of his latest Iraq plan.

The doubt on Capitol Hill reflects the continuing erosion of Bush's public support across the country. His approval rating is at the lowest level of his presidency, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll, and only twice in the past six decades has a president delivered his annual speech to the nation in a weaker condition in the polls -- Harry S. Truman in the midst of the Korean War in 1952 and Richard M. Nixon in the throes of Watergate in 1974.

For the first time, majorities of Americans say Bush cannot be trusted in a crisis, has not made the country safer and should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq to avoid further casualties rather than leave them until civil order is restored. And, in a sign of intensifying opposition, a majority -- 51 percent -- for the first time expressed strong disapproval of Bush's performance, compared with 17 percent who strongly approved.

"The world changed significantly on Election Day, and the only people who were surprised were them," GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio said of Bush and his aides. Now, he added, "they've backed themselves into a tough corner, and the problem is his continued insistence for the troop increase, which flies in the face of what 70 percent of Americans want, makes him look . . . like [he's saying], 'I'll listen to you, but I'll do what I want anyway.' "

The poll indicates that Bush has made no headway in selling his decision to bolster troop levels in Iraq by 21,500, with 65 percent now opposing it, compared with 61 percent the night of his Jan. 10 nationally televised address. Three in five Americans trust congressional Democrats more than Bush to deal with Iraq, and the same proportion want Congress to try to block his troop-increase plan.

Bush's overall approval rating of 33 percent matches the lowest it has been in Post-ABC polls since he became president, and 71 percent say the country is seriously off track, the highest such expression of national pessimism in more than a decade. By contrast, newly installed House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is enjoying a honeymoon, with 54 percent approving her handling of the job.

While Bush will devote about half of tonight's 40-minute-plus speech to Iraq, the broader battle with Islamic radicals and other foreign policy matters, advisers said they understand that only sustained and visible progress on the ground in Iraq might change American minds about the war. The best Bush can hope for tonight, they said, is to prevent a wholesale defection by Republicans and buy enough time for his plan to work.

"He knows there's great skepticism," said a senior White House official who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss the speech before its delivery. "But in spite of that, he believes there's much to be done if we can work together."

Aides said Bush will not directly engage in a debate over congressional efforts to block the troop increase. But in private briefings for administration allies yesterday, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove said Bush will challenge Congress to put up its own plan if it does not like his "new way forward," according to people who were briefed.

Past presidents who found themselves facing an opposition Congress tried to tack to the middle after suffering midterm retreats. "This president, based on his speech last week, is taking the opposite approach," said Michael Waldman, a speechwriter for President Bill Clinton who heads New York University's Brennan Center for Justice. "The 2006 election was as close to a referendum on a president and issue as you get in our constitutional system. So for the president to move to escalate, it's very dramatic."

While recognizing differences over Iraq, Bush does aim to make progress with Democrats on domestic policy. The four main issues he will emphasize -- health care, immigration, energy and education -- are closer to Democratic priorities than issues in some past State of the Union addresses. And Bush tried to send a signal on the eve of the speech by accepting an invitation to address the House Democratic retreat in Williamsburg on Feb. 3.

"They're going to focus on issues and themes where they think they can get bipartisan cooperation," said Cesar Conda, former domestic policy adviser to Vice President Cheney. "It's a big difference from before, when he had a Republican Congress and the big issues would have been making the tax cuts permanent and reforming the tax code. It's a change in tone and focus. He's got to deal with the reality of a Democratic Congress."

Some of Bush's domestic discussion will sound familiar. He plans to repeat his call to overhaul immigration laws and allow illegal immigrants to become guest workers, an idea that may find more favor among Democrats than it did with Republicans last year. He plans to call for the extension of his No Child Left Behind education program, with modifications to make it more flexible, but will not ask Congress to expand it to high school as he did in the past.

The White House has previewed two new health-care proposals that will be in the speech. The first would make employer-provided health-care benefits taxable income after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for singles. Officials said the plan would increase taxes for 30 million families whose benefits are worth more than the deduction but would provide a tax break to the vast majority of families with employer coverage as well as to 17 million people who purchase insurance on their own. The program would begin in 2009 and cost the government during its first years of operation but pay for itself by 2018, they said.

Bush also wants to redirect spending from Medicare, Medicaid and other federal programs toward new grants to help states ensure that everyone has access to affordable basic health insurance, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said yesterday. Leavitt did not specify a cost but said the new program would spur efforts already underway in states such as Massachusetts and California to provide coverage to people without health insurance.

The main uncertainty is what Bush will say about energy and the environment. Amid much talk about climate change and energy security, the president and his aides have promised unspecified "bold" ideas. Officials have ruled out binding caps on emissions of greenhouse gases, despite support among Democrats and some corporate executives who came to Washington yesterday. But they told allies that Bush will advance ideas for greatly expanding ethanol as an alternative to oil, and some insiders expect changes in fuel efficiency standards for vehicles.

President Faces Skeptical Public (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush tonight gets another shot at persuading Americans to support his Iraq war strategy and domestic agenda. His problem: Much of the public has stopped listening to him.

IN THE POLLS

• Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls1

• See poll results2 (Adobe Acrobat required)

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll on the eve of Mr. Bush's State of the Union address underscores the extent to which he has lost the nation's ear. Just 22% of Americans say they want the president to set policy for the country, 27% express confidence in his goals, and 28% approve his handling of the Iraq war.

Only one third of Americans rate Mr. Bush highly for being "honest and straightforward." That is down from half at the start of his second term two years ago. Two-thirds say his performance in office is unlikely to get better in his last two years as president.

"What he faces is an extremely skeptical audience," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who helps conduct the Journal/NBC poll. The findings, adds his Republican counterpart Bill McInturff, suggest "little capacity for movement on his major policy initiatives, especially Iraq."

Mr. Bush hopes to overcome that skepticism with a series of eye-catching ideas on domestic policy, particularly on health care and energy. His health-care plan -- outlined over the weekend -- focuses on overhauling the tax code to make health insurance more accessible to people not covered through employers. His energy plan likely will feature a big proposed increase in the use of alternative fuels like ethanol and a revamping of fuel-efficiency standards for passenger cars, as well as greater acknowledgment of the problem of global warming.

Still, the president has had a tough time breaking through. This month Mr. Bush spoke to the nation outlining plans to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq, and the poll shows he failed to shift public opinion in his direction. Just one in four Americans calls it "an acceptable outcome" to increase U.S. troops now and keep them in Iraq until that nation becomes a stable democracy.

One reason: Majorities of men and women, of whites and nonwhites, of all ages, income groups and regions of the country, say the president's new Iraq strategy will make "very little difference" or none at all in securing Iraq. Though Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted any timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, a 65% majority wants U.S. troops to leave within the next year.

"America has come to a public judgment on Iraq: Wrap it up," Mr. Hart says. The telephone survey of 1,007 adults was conducted Jan. 17-20 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

The president -- despite an overall approval rating standing at just 35%, while 60% disapprove -- has offered no indication of bending to that judgment. Instead, he has reiterated his intention to proceed in the face of opposition not only from Democrats, now the majority in Congress, but from an increasing number of his fellow Republicans. The survey shows Mr. Bush and his

Republican allies on solid ground with rank-and-file Americans on at least one point: opposition to any legislative blocking of funds for U.S. troops in Iraq.

So while a 65% majority of Americans say the president should abandon his planned troop increase if Congress passes a nonbinding resolution against it, Americans oppose by 52%-41% congressional attempts to stop Mr. Bush by cutting off funds. Democratic lawmakers have been juggling that issue: Leaders insist they won't stop funding troops in the field, but some senators and House members seek restrictions such as caps on the number of troops in Iraq.

Both Journal/NBC pollsters say Mr. Bush may be able to improve his standing by accommodating his reduced stature and the loss of his Republican congressional majorities with a revamped policy agenda. To some degree, the White House has signaled plans to attempt just that.

Tonight, the president will tout a health-care initiative designed to expand coverage with new deductions for Americans seeking insurance on their own, financed by taxes on some generous employer provided health plans. That emphasis tracks the findings in the Journal/NBC poll showing health costs as Americans' foremost economic concern, and the number of Americans without health insurance as atop respondents' list of disturbing conditions in the country -- ahead of declining morals, illegal immigration, sub-par schools or outsize CEO compensation.

Mr. Bush's higher target for renewable fuels jibes with Democrats' stated aims. A U.S. diplomat held out hope that the higher renewable fuels standard also would create a steady demand for agricultural products that will keep prices high and hold down U.S. subsidies, thereby helping satisfy international demands in the Doha round of trade talks.

Many of the new White House domestic initiatives have features that appeal to Democrats, yet the Journal/NBC poll makes clear that Americans have little expectation that Mr. Bush will work effectively with his political adversaries on Capitol Hill. Just 37% expect the president to "strike the right balance" in dealing with the Democratic Congress, while 50% predict he will be "too inflexible."

The survey underscored the message of last November's midterm elections: that Americans are increasingly open to Democratic leadership. A 57% majority wants Congress rather than the White House setting policy for the country; by 42% to 15%, Americans say Democrats could bring "the right kind of change" to the country rather than the wrong kind, though 39% don't expect much change either way.

In the broadest gauge of the two parties' images, Americans rate Democrats favorably, 42%-30%, while Republicans are rated negatively, 44%-33%. On specific issues, Americans say they prefer the Democratic approach by a double-digit margin on issues such as Social Security, energy, and the federal deficit.

Florida Legislators Split On Bush's Effectiveness (FLTODAY)

By Larry Wheeler

Florida Today, January 23, 2007

Florida lawmakers differ on whether President Bush heads into his sixth State of the Union address in a position to dictate the terms of his final two years in office or so weakened by events that it doesn't much matter what he says.

"This is the president of the United States, the most powerful man in the world," said Rep. Allen Boyd, Jr., a Tallahassee Democrat. "But his political capital is certainly not what it was two years ago. That creates some different dynamics for him."

The once-swaggering Bush has admitted he made mistakes in Iraq.

His policies and low approval ratings contributed to the Republicans' loss of Congress in last year's elections.

Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq was met with broad public skepticism and outright opposition from some in his own party.

A lot has not gone right for Bush, which puts him on the defensive as he delivers his annual address Tuesday night to a joint session of Congress.

"It's going to be a challenge," said Rep. Tom Feeney, a conservative Republican whose district includes part of Florida's Space Coast. "A new, freshly elected president can establish an agenda. But in the last quarter of an eight-year term with the country in a war that has not gone according to plan and your poll numbers in tough shape . . . you are basically responding, as opposed to creating an agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0120292

Feeney made it clear he supports Bush and his troop increase if the troops sent to fight insurgents disrupt the lines of support coming over the border from Iran and Syria.

Despite the prevailing political winds, some rank-and-file Florida conservatives remain supportive of the president.

Rep. Jeff Miller, a Republican who represents the Pensacola Bay Area, home to many active duty and retired military, praised Bush's troop "surge"strategy and anticipated hearing more about it from Bush during the State of the Union address.

"I imagine the last thing the insurgents expected to hear from President Bush after the November elections was an increase or a troop surge," said Miller, who has not wavered in his support for the president. "It shows a clear resolve that the United States is serious."

Sen. Mel Martinez, an Orlando Republican, believes Bush's troop surge strategy has put the president on the offensive.

"This is the best way for him to continue to be relevant over the next two years," Martinez said.

Last week, Martinez was elected general chairman of the Republican Party by the Republican National Committee. Bush handpicked Martinez for the post, which will make the Cuban-American senator the voice of the GOP.

Florida's senior senator, Orlando Democrat Bill Nelson, declined to speculate on whether Bush will speak to the nation Tuesday from a weakened position or one of renewed vigor.

"I don't know the answer to that right now," Nelson said after emerging from a White House briefing with National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley. "The war has not been going successfully. It is my hope that it will, but in order for that to occur, the (Iraqi) government has got to start reaching out and brining Sunni and Shiite together."

State Of The Union From Rostrum To Reality: How Past Pledges Played Out (WSJ)

By Megan Ballinger

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The Constitution requires presidents to deliver their appraisal of the nation's health and well-being to Congress once a year, and President Bush will give the third address of his second term Tuesday night, touting accomplishments thus far in his presidency and laying out his agenda to the American people.

The Wall Street Journal Online took a look back at some of the vows -- both memorable and now-obscure -- that President Bush has made in his State of the Union addresses, to see whether they made it from the rostrum to reality.

2006: Iraq, energy, health care

On Iraq: "Fellow citizens, we are in this fight to win, and we are winning. The road of victory is the road that will take our troops home. As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels."

After perhaps the bloodiest year for both American troops and Iraqis since the 2003 invasion, the strategy in Iraq has shifted dramatically -- as has the language used to discuss the conflict. "Stay the course" is out, while "the way forward" is in.

Support among Americans and their representatives in Congress hit lows as the country spiraled toward a sectarian civil war and kidnappings and killings made daily headlines. Just after the midterm elections, in which voter anger about the war helped Democrats retake control of the House and Senate, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was pushed out. The Iraq Study Group report, released in December, provided both a searing critique of the administration's policies and a bleak picture of how bad the situation really is. Conceding in an address earlier this month1,"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," Mr. Bush acknowledged a litany of American failures and announced plans to send at least 20,000 more troops to Iraq.

On energy: "America is addicted to oil, which is often imported from unstable parts of the world. The best way to break this addiction is through technology. To change how we power our homes and offices, we will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants; revolutionary solar and wind technologies; and clean, safe nuclear energy. We will increase our research in better batteries for hybrid and electric cars, and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen."

While Mr. Bush has talked a great deal in recent months about cleaner energies and finding alternatives to oil, he continues to be widely criticized by environmentalists for failing to back his rhetoric with enough government action -- either increasing spending or instituting tougher regulations to cut pollution. His resistance in particular to federal limits on greenhouse gases has left him at odds with some business leaders who have come to endorse stronger federal action. The CEOs of General Motors, Ford Motor and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group pledged after an autumn meeting with Mr. Bush to make 50% of their new vehicles capable of running on alternative fuel by 2012. With Democrats in control of Congress, energy and environmental initiatives are gaining speed. The administration also is pursuing a strategy of encouraging technological innovation -- instead of regulation and mandated caps -- to reduce overall carbon-dioxide emissions. In December, officials announced the awarding of $1 billion in tax credits to nine companies to develop cleaner coal-burning power plants around the U.S.

On health care: "For all Americans, we must confront the rising cost of care… and help people afford the insurance coverage they need. We will strengthen health savings accounts -- by making sure individuals and small business employees can buy insurance with the same advantages that people working for big businesses now get."

Early in 2006, health care was at the top of the president's domestic agenda, as evidenced by a spate of speeches. His health-care proposals included providing bigger tax breaks for health-savings accounts, or HSAs, and making hospitals' and doctors' prices available to consumers. The president has followed through on both. In August, Mr. Bush issued an executive order requiring federal agencies to disclose the quality and cost of care provided to Medicare beneficiaries, federal employees, the military and veterans -- a group that includes one-fourth of all Americans. And in December, he signed a bill that increased the tax-free contributions many people are allowed to make each year to their HSAs. Still, with these changes attracting little attention, the president is expected to propose further and more dramatic changes in his last two years in office, such as a tax code change making it easier for consumers to buy health care on the open market, instead of relying on employers for coverage. * * *

2005: Social Security, peace in the Middle East, and immigration

On Social Security: "We must make Social Security permanently sound, not leave that task for another day. We must not jeopardize our economic strength by increasing payroll taxes."

In his first news conference after his re-election, President Bush declared: "We'll start on Social Security now." And the program was a centerpiece of his first post-reelection State of the Union address. But after a year of hard campaigning, the president acknowledged that reform plans had died. Mr. Bush's vision was that American workers would divert some Social Security payroll taxes to personal retirement accounts, assuming more of the responsibility and risk themselves. Democrats vehemently opposed any privatization, while Mr. Bush's party faced deep divisions of its own. A series of stump speeches across the country in 2005 did little to rally the public, as other crises, both at home and abroad, helped lessen any sense of urgency. When asked in October 2005 how the president could get his plan back on track, one senator responded: "Get the Gulf Coast rebuilt and get the troops out of Iraq." Mr. Bush has said he plans to revive his efforts at a later point in his presidency. With Democrats now in control of Congress, there's speculation that he may have to meet their price for coming to the bargaining table: dropping his goal of letting workers create private retirement accounts. If he doesn't, it is virtually certain that nothing will happen on the issue he has called the top domestic priority of his second term.

On peace in the Middle East: "To promote peace in the broader Middle East, we must confront regimes that continue to harbor terrorists and pursue weapons of mass murder. Syria still allows its territory, and parts of Lebanon, to be used by terrorists who seek to destroy every chance of peace in the region…. Iran remains the world's primary state sponsor of terror, pursuing nuclear weapons..."

In the Middle East, the Bush administration made strides in 2005, though some hot zones remained to be defused and have since become even more volatile. Elections in Egypt, Iraq and Gaza in the year after Mr. Bush's speech were among high points in the process toward democracy in the region, though none was without controversy or smatterings of violence. Pakistan has recently strengthened ties with the U.S., working with American soldiers to hunt al Qaeda fugitives, but a January 2006 deadly airstrike in that nation drew criticism.

Syria and Iran still are trouble spots. The Bush administration has taken a sharp tone with Syria, threatening to bring Damascus before the U.N. Security Council for international censure if the government refuses to cooperate with a probe into the assassination of Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. But now, in exchange for cooperation on Iraq, Syria may ask the international community to drop the inquiry. Meanwhile, the U.S. is encouraging the other members of the Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran for its refusal to suspend its nuclear programs.

On immigration: "We should not be content with laws that punish hardworking people who want only to provide for their families, and deny businesses willing workers, and invite chaos at our border. It is time for an immigration policy that perm its temporary guest workers to fill jobs Americans will not take, that rejects amnesty, that tells us who is entering and leaving our country, and that closes the border to drug dealers and terrorists."

Legislation on immigration has been slow-moving, despite Republicans' hopes that it would give them a boost in the 2006 congressional elections. Throughout 2005 and 2006, Mr. Bush rolled out specifics of his ideas, which include both an expansion of the guest worker program and a renewed emphasis on border security. The administration hoped to get big business in its corner, pushing Congress to pass measures that give more foreign-born workers legal status. On the national security front, the president laid out a series of steps aimed at closing gaps in enforcement, including expansion of a program where Mexicans caught illegally crossing the border are returned to their hometowns instead of just to the other side of the line. Since December 2005, the House and Senate have passed starkly different immigration bills. The Republican-proposed House bill calls for a fence along the border and makes illegal immigration a felony; it currently is a misdemeanor. The Senate bill, which attracted more support from Democrats than Republicans, would let most illegal immigrants stay in the U.S. after paying fines and back taxes. Congressional negotiators never met to iron out their differences, and the issue remains at a stalemate. * * *

2004: Patriot Act and gay marriage

On the Patriot Act: "Key provisions of the Patriot Act are set to expire next year. The terrorist threat will not expire on that schedule. Our law enforcement needs this vital legislation to protect our citizens. You need to renew the Patriot Act."

The Patriot Act was a big issue in the 2004 election season -- and as such, little legislative headway was made in renewing it that year. In late December 2005, facing a Dec. 31 deadline, lawmakers agreed to extend the antiterrorism law for five weeks, setting the new expiration date for 16 provisions of the law for Feb. 3, 2006. Democrats pushed for changes to better protect civil liberties and privacy of average Americans, and furor over White House wiretapping of some U.S. citizens made it seem as if major changes would have to be affected, but in March, 2006, the full Senate voted to renew the Patriot Act, by an 89-10 roll call, with only cosmetic amendments.

On gay marriage: "Activist judges … have begun redefining marriage by court order, without regard for the will of the people and their elected representatives. On an issue of such great consequence, the people's voice must be heard. If judges insist on forcing their arbitrary will upon the people, the only alternative left to the people would be the constitutional process. Ou r nation must defend the sanctity of marriage."

Gay marriage was a cultural flashpoint of the 2004 election, and these lines were manna for Mr. Bush's socially conservative base. But the issue has received scant attention since then, aside from mentions amid the vetting of Chief Justi ce John Roberts and fellow justice Samuel Alito. Both men were reluctant to discuss specifics of their stances during Senate hearings, though neither is expected to be supportive of gay marriage. Push for a constitutional amendment, though, seems to have died down: Some prominent Republicans have made it known that they don't support an amendment, and many states have already passed ballot measures limiting the definition of marriage, making the need for a federal amendment less urgent in th e eyes of many conservatives. In the 2006 elections, gay-marriage bans passed in seven states, but Arizonans defeated such a ban. * * *

2003: Health care and the environment

On health care: "Health-care reform must begin with Medicare; Medicare is the binding commitment of a caring society. We must renew that commitment by giving seniors access to preventive medicine and new drugs that are transforming health care in America. My budget will commit an additional $400 billion over the next decade to reform and strengthen Medicare."

Congress passed the huge Medicare prescription-drug benefit in 2003 but the legislation represented the biggest expansion of a federal entitlement program in a generation and will be considerably more expensive than originally estimated. The voluntary benefit went into effect on Jan. 1, 2006, covering the prescription-drug expenses of some 11 million low-income elderly and disabled Americans. Although the program's launch was marred by bureaucratic glitches, befuddled senior citizens, frustrated pharmacists and physicians, and experts asserting it should have been set up differently, critics' worst fears haven't materialized. More than 90% of Medicare beneficiaries have drug coverage, and costs are below initial estimates.

On the environment: "I have sent you Clear Skies legislation that mandates a 70% cut in air pollution from power plants over the next 15 years. I have sent you a Healthy Forests Initiative, to help prevent the catastrophic fires that devastate communities, kill wildlife, and burn away millions of acres of treasured forest."

In March 2005, the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee deadlocked in a 9-9 vote and failed to pass Mr. Bush's "Clear Skies" on to the full Senate. Since then, the president has called a few times for its renewal, but action has been slow. Some Republicans in the business community have tried to distance themselves from efforts to roll back clean-air rules and the Endangered Species Act. Meanwhile, liberal critics have mocked the Clear Skies plan, calling it patronage for Bush campaign fundraisers in the energy business and a loosening of pollution regulations. The Healthy Forests Act passed in 2003. * * *

2002: Defense and trade

On defense: "We will work closely with our coalition to deny terrorists and their state sponsors the materials, technology, and expertise to make and deliver weapons of mass destruction. We will develop and deploy effective missile defenses to protect America and our allies from sudden attack."

The Bush administration decided to invade Iraq in the spring of 2003 because of perceived threat represented by Saddam Hussein's stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction. But those weapons never materialized, and U.S. troops remain in Iraq despite three successful elections there in 2005. Libya voluntarily disarmed and a black-market ring for nuclear materials headed up by a former top Pakistani scientist was broken up, but other successes have proved harder to come by. As Iran refuses to abandon its nuclear program, the U.S. is pushing to isolate Iran's economy, but Tehran shows no signs of backing down. The U.S. also remains wary of North Korea's nuclear intentions. Missile defense is still a touchy subject. Many critics don't see the need for it, calling the program a vestige of the Cold War that should be mothballed to beef up spending on other more pressing defense and homeland-security needs.

On trade: "Good jobs depend on expanded trade. Selling into new markets creates new jobs, so I ask Congress to finally approve trade-promotion authority."

Though Mr. Bush won back trade-promotion authority, which gives the president greater power in negotiating agreements, his record on trade has been mixed. A package of steel tariffs designed to protect U.S. producers from foreign competitors drew criticism both inside and outside the administration and was eventually rolled back. The generous subsidies the U.S. gives its farmers have proved to be a big sticking point in international trade talks. Meanwhile, the president has sent mixed signals on the question of offshoring. During the presidential campaign, he proclaimed his eagerness to protect American jobs and muzzled a top economic adviser who suggested that the outsourcing of jobs overseas was a long-term net positive for the U.S. But he also has repeatedly called for open markets. * * *

2001: Education, taxes and faith

On education: "Children should be tested on basic reading and math skills every year between grades three and eight. Measuring is the only way to know whether all our children are learning. And I want to know, because I refuse to leave any child behind in America."

The president's No Child Left Behind plan, which relies heavily on standardized testing to measure the performance of both students and schools, became law in 2002. The legislation mandated that annual report cards be issued for schools, and that those that don't measure up provide supplemental services like tutoring programs. Parents of children at underperforming schools also have the right to transfer their children to a better school in their district. States and school districts have greater flexibility in how they spend education funds. In 2005, Mr. Bush announced a $1.5 billion "intervention fund" to improve high-school learning and graduation rates, and to extend No Child Left Behind standardized testing to high-school students.

On estate taxes: "It's not fair to tax the same earnings twice -- once when you earn them, and again when you die -- so we must repeal the death tax."

The "death tax" -- or federal estate tax -- has been a perennial target of Republican ire. The president has been successful in reducing the estate tax, but total repeal is unlikely, especially with Democrats now controlling Congress. The White House can't count on lobbying muscle from the super-rich: Many of the very wealthiest Americans whose families would benefit greatly from the vanquishing of the estate tax don't support repeal, including investment guru Warren Buffett, who says untaxed inheritances would create an "aristocracy of wealth." In 2006, a bill that paired raising the minimum wage with a cut in the estate tax passed the House, but stalled in the Senate.

On faith-based initiatives: "My budget adopts a hopeful new approach to help the poor and the disadvantaged. We must encourage and support the work of charities and faith-based and community groups that offer help and love one person at a time."

Mr. Bush's emphasis on "faith-based initiatives" was one of the major flashpoints of his first 100 days in office. Many civil libertarians and even some religious leaders called his plans a breach of the church-state divide, while conservatives embraced the idea of farming out expensive social programs to churches. John Dilulio Jr., an early leader of the president's faith program, argued in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal that failure to support faith-based initiatives in the war on poverty was tantamount to ignoring the 14th Amendment's equal-protection clause. Congress scuttled Mr. Bush's most ambitious faith-based plans, but the president did open a "compassion capital fund" to bankroll some initiatives.

Fenty Won't Sit With Laura Bush At Speech (WP)

By Elissa Silverman

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty has declined a White House invitation to sit with first lady Laura Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, deciding to attend the event as a guest of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Fenty spokeswoman Carrie Brooks confirmed yesterday that the city's new mayor will sit in the gallery along with others invited by Pelosi (D-Calif.), who recently became speaker after Democrats took control of the House of Representatives.

" 'Pelosi asked us first,' " Fenty said, according to Brooks.

Although former mayor Anthony A. Williams, like Fenty, is a Democrat, Williams sat with the wife of Republican President Bush. Presidents often acknowledge guests in the VIP box during the address, and Williams was often captured on television as the cameras panned to the seats around the first lady.

During his campaign for mayor, however, Fenty pledged that he would not sit as a guest of the White House because the president had not supported the city's quest for voting representation in Congress. "He committed during the campaign not to sit in the first lady's box," Brooks said.

Fenty has the made voting rights a top priority of his administration, beginning with a call for D.C. statehood in his inaugural address.

He has lobbied Pelosi to support a bill co-sponsored by Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) that would give the District a voting representative in the House.

Fenty will be joined by Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) and his wife, Judge Katie Curran O'Malley, also invited by Pelosi, a Baltimore native. Fenty and the O'Malleys will also attend a reception in Pelosi's office suite before the address.

Fenty To Attend Speech As Pelosi's Guest (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty will attend tonight's State of the Union presidential address as a guest of new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a departure from his predecessor's tradition of attending as the guest of first lady Laura Bush.

Mr. Fenty, a Democrat, had promised to watch the address from outside the first lady's viewing box at the U.S. Capitol to protest a lack of congressional voting rights for the District.

During his two terms as mayor, Anthony A. Williams, a Democrat, attended the address nearly every year as a guest of Mrs. Bush or of Hillary Rodham Clinton when she was first lady.

"I view it as an invitation to the mayor in his capacity as mayor of the District, as opposed to a personal invitation," Mr. Williams said. "The District should be represented in the halls of Congress for the State of the Union. That's how I always saw it."

It was not clear yesterday whether Mrs. Bush had extended an invitation to Mr. Fenty.

Officials in Mrs. Bush's White House press office said the list of those invited to attend the speech with the first lady would not be released until today, and Fenty officials could not confirm whether Mrs. Bush had invited the new mayor.

DOJ_NMG_0120297

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said Mr. Fenty would attend as a guest of the House's new speaker, a California Democrat.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Fenty have met to discuss voting rights and other D.C. issues that will come before Congress.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Fenty "met shortly after her election as speaker to discuss a number of issues with respect to the District," Mr. Hammill said. "They came out of that meeting agreeing to work closely together on the District's priorities."

An invitation to watch the address with the first lady is part recent tradition, part honor for the District's chief executive.

Nelson F. Rimensnyder, a historian and former research director for the House Committee on the District of Columbia, said the practice of inviting guests to the address took on a grander meaning during the administration of President Reagan, who often singled out his invitees for honor during the speech.

"My recollection is it's a more recent thing, the mayors' being regularly invited to sit in on the State of the Union," Mr. Rimensnyder said. "Particularly of course, Tony Williams was invited all the time."

D.C. Council member Marion Barry could not recall yesterday whether he was invited or had attended the annual address while he was mayor, his spokesman said.

Mr. Fenty's attendance as Mrs. Pelosi's guest does represent a contrast between himself and Mr. Williams.

The former mayor has been criticized for not being more aggressive in advancing D.C. voting rights and not mobilizing more energetic efforts for the cause, although he did advocate for the issue during speeches both home and abroad.

Mr. Fenty said in his Jan. 3 inaugural address that "our goal is to become the 51st state." He has met with members of Congress about D.C. voting rights and is spearheading several initiatives, such as a lobbying day in February and a march in April, to further highlight the cause.

Mr. Fenty also has pledged to aggressively push for passage of the D.C. Voting Rights Act, a measure introduced by Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat who serves as the District's nonvoting representative in Congress, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, that would give the District a House vote and also add a seat in the House for Utah.

Pelosi Lures Cameras to the Speaker's Box

The party's not over! Newly minted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will not only sit behind President Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, but she's filling the normally staid speaker's box with a cluster of political stars.

Many of Pelosi's guests, who will sit in 21 balcony seats, will be past and present celebs of the Democratic Party: former speakers Jim Wright and Tom Foley, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Washington's Adrian Fenty. Pelosi also invited two of the more influential 9/11 widows, Carrie Lemack and Mary Fetchet, and the wives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman and vice chairman, Lynne Pace and Cindy Giambastiani.

Ronald Reagan began the tradition of inviting special guests, who sat with the first lady and were introduced at key moments in the address. Last year, an injured Iraq war veteran, Air Force Sgt. Jamie Dana (with her dog and former military partner, Rex), sat with Laura Bush. The speaker's box, by contrast, hardly merited a glance -- except in 1997, when conservatives blasted Newt Gingrich for inviting Jesse Jackson to sit in his box.

This is the second time this month Pelosi made the seats a camera magnet: Richard Gere and Tony Bennett sat there for her Jan. 4 swearing-in ceremony. No word who else might pop up, but Lynne Cheney-- who sat in the speaker's box in the past few years -- will move on over to the first lady's this year.The Million-Dollar Set, With Reason to Celebrate

Sen. Jim Webb To Rebut State Of The Union (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

When President Bush gave his 2006 State of the Union speech, Jim Webb hadn't yet decided to run for the US Senate. But he had no doubts about the war in Iraq, which he called "the greatest strategic blunder in modern times."

Tuesday night, Senator Webb is giving the Democratic response to this year's State of the Union – an unusually high profile for a freshman. But no Democrat in the Congress is more primed to talk on the No. 1 issue in congressional politics: the endgame in Iraq.

"We have never clearly defined what a win is – never, not since 2002," says Webb, on a brisk walk through the Capitol basement after President Bush announced an increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq. One of them will be Webb's son, Jimmy, whose Marine unit has just been extended for an additional 60 days in Iraq.

A decorated combat marine, Webb knows – and can articulate – the human face of war with an authority that is rare on Capitol Hill. As a company commander in the An Hoa Basin during the Vietnam War – the setting of his first of six bestselling novels, "Fields of Fire" – he was awarded the Navy Cross for exceptional heroism, three medals and two purple hearts. He dedicated that 1978 book to "the 100,000 Marines who became casualties in Vietnam. And for the others who became casualties upon their return."

As a law student at Georgetown University Law Center, Webb represented and later cleared the name of a marine convicted of war crimes in Vietnam, three years after his suicide. With the House Committee on Veterans Affairs from 1977 to 1981, he became the first Vietnam veteran to serve as a committee counsel on Capitol Hill. In 1987, President Reagan appointed Webb to be secretary of the Navy, but he resigned in 1988 over deep budget cuts that the Congress mandated for the Navy.

"The fact that he's a longtime Republican, until his recent conversion, plus his war-hero status, plus a strong association with Ronald Reagan, plus the fact that he delivered the Senate to the Democrats on the issue of Iraq – it makes him the logical choice for the Democrats," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia.

Democratic leaders who tapped Webb for his prime-time assignment describe him as "a new voice in a new Congress." "He's also a combat veteran who understands personally how important it is to find a new direction in Iraq and begin to bring the war to a close," said Senate majority leader Harry Reid.

Once a reluctant campaigner

A reluctant campaigner, Webb was once the first person out the door at a campaign event in Arlington, Va., that he was headlining. But he is settling into his role in the Senate, where he often sits through oversight hearings on the war from start to finish – a practice typically rare for anyone but the committee chairman.

"I'm impressed. He was the only one who stayed the whole time... Senator Webb and [Chairman Joseph] Biden," says Marjorie Lasky, a war protester from Berkeley, Calif., who sat near the front row of recent Senate hearings. "I hope he stays right on top of this war."

For Webb, the key to getting out of Iraq is for the Bush administration to "aggressively deal with the situation in a regional context," he says. "If we do that, we get our combat troops out, and we can still address the war against international terrorism. We can help increase the stability of the region, and we can deal with our strategic interests elsewhere. That's how you define a win."

Webb's tough questions

His committee assignments on the Senate Armed Services Committee and Foreign Relations Committee give him a platform to raise these issues, even though his position at the bottom of the seniority rankings usually leaves him the last to speak.

At a Jan. 11 hearing of the Foreign Relations Committee, he challenged Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to "more actively engage" in diplomatic efforts in the Middle East. "There are many, including myself, who warned that invading and occupying Iraq would in fact empower Iran, and that has become a reality," he said. Then, he asked: "Is it the position of this administration that it possesses the authority to take unilateral action against Iran in the absence of a direct threat without congressional approval?" Ms. Rice said that she would answer in writing.

Aides say he does much of his own research to prepare for hearings and develops his own questions. He generally reads at least four hours a day, aides say. "That's what he hated the most about campaigning – losing time to read," says Webb spokeswoman Jessica Smith.

Aides say he is drafting his own response to the State of the Union, working mainly in the evenings, although Democratic leaders will have a say in the final language.

While he's not one of those senators who seeks television lights – or print journalists, for that matter – like a heat seeking missile, he is clearly warming to the job. "It's a great time to be in the Senate," he says.

Ramrod straight and typically no- nonsense, Webb had a brief, much-reported skirmish with President Bush at a White House reception last year. When Mr. Bush asked after his son, Webb replied: "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President." Pressed again, "How's your boy?", Webb said: "That's between me and my boy, Mr. President."

Bush's Speech To Push Health Insurance Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And David Jackson

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush will use Tuesday night's State of the Union address to begin a new effort to reduce the number of Americans without health insurance and try to capitalize on state innovations.

Bush's plan would financially reward states that make basic private policies more widely available. Already, more than a dozen states from Massachusetts to California have proposed expanding private health insurance, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said Monday.

The president's plan would not involve any new federal money. It would redirect some of the $30 billion the government spends annually to care for people without health insurance who show up at hospitals and emergency rooms.

The administration expects opposition from Democrats, particularly those who favor a system of government-subsidized health insurance. "I have not seen anything in health care to which there was not objection," Leavitt said.

There are 47 million Americans without health insurance. Groups representing business and consumers last week endorsed a renewed effort to get them covered. "There is real, tangible movement toward that objective right now, for the first time," Leavitt said.

A number of states have taken steps recently to cover more uninsured residents, particularly children. They include Massachusetts, California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, Arkansas, Indiana, Michigan, Texas, New Jersey, Missouri, Washington, Oregon, Louisiana, Tennessee, Connecticut and Vermont.

Democrats such as Rep. Pete Stark of California have questioned another Bush plan to offer standard deductions for health insurance — $7,500 for individuals, $15,000 for families — while subjecting employer-paid health insurance to income taxes. Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, top Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, has fielded complaints from some Republicans who call the plan a tax increase.

White House officials said the proposed changes to the tax code represent "reform," not tax hikes. "We think about it as tax reform that levels the playing field and provides a basic, standard benefit to all Americans," White House spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Of all taxpayers who get health insurance from their employers, about 20% face the prospect of paying higher taxes. They can adjust their health coverage.

"This is revenue-neutral tax reform," said Katherine Baicker of the Council of Economic Advisers. "There are always going to be some winners and losers, but the people who might initially be losers have options."

Bush's Health Plan: Tax Breaks To Uninsured (MH)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Miami Herald, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush will propose deep tax breaks for Americans who purchase their own medical insurance and would finance the plan with an unprecedented tax on a portion of high-priced healthcare plans that workers receive from their employers, according to the White House.

The initiative, which the president briefly previewed in his radio address Saturday, has a dual purpose: It would create a financial incentive for the estimated 46 million to 48 million Americans who lack health insurance to buy it. And it would rein in the soaring cost of health insurance by encouraging workers in high-priced plans to seek more modest coverage.

"Today, the tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," Bush said. ``It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

The proposal, which Bush plans to fully unveil in Tuesday's State of the Union address, marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans.

Administration officials familiar with the plan say it reflects the new political order in Washington, where Democrats now control both chambers of Congress.

They refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government.

Instead, it would add a new tax on employer-provided healthcare plans worth more than $15,000 to subsidize those who buy modestly priced plans out of their pockets.

In addition, they say, the plan is consistent with Bush's idea of increasing access to health insurance through the private market while encouraging people to be more cost conscious as they purchase medical-care coverage.

In his speech Tuesday night, the president will also propose increasing the federal assistance to states that make private healthcare plans available to low-income or chronically unhealthy people who are uninsured.

The administration hopes to provide waivers under Medicaid -- the government health insurance program for the poor that is jointly funded by the federal government and the states -- to allow states to redirect money from hospitals and nursing homes to individuals to help them buy health insurance.

Some states already are moving to offer healthcare coverage to the uninsured. In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger recently announced a plan to provide coverage to about 6.5 million people, including many recent immigrants, who are uninsured. If the plan is approved by the state legislature, California would become the fourth state -- along with Massachusetts, Vermont and Maine -- to offer near universal health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0120301

Taken together, Bush's proposals are his most ambitious attempt to address the healthcare crisis. In the past, Bush had pushed for limited tax breaks to help people buy health insurance, but those initiatives never gained traction. He has also advocated health savings accounts, consumer-driven plans with higher deductibles and lower premiums than those in traditional insurance.

The new tax measure would attempt to roughly equalize the benefits of people who have health insurance, regardless of whether they buy it or receive it from employers.

NEW TAX RULES

Currently, the 17 million Americans covered by health plans that they purchased out of pocket receive no federal tax break for the expenditure.

Meanwhile, the estimated 150 million people covered by employer-provided health insurance are not taxed on the value of their health insurance, regardless of how much it is worth. The average employer-provided family health insurance plan costs $11,500 a year, administration officials said -- three times what it cost 19 years ago.

Under Bush's proposal, workers who receive employer-provided health insurance would have to pay a tax on the cost of their benefit above $15,000, the threshold he proposes for the tax break.

For instance, if a person's health insurance costs $16,000, he would pay a tax on the $1,000 difference. People with families who buy low-cost policies, meanwhile, would have their taxable income reduced by $15,000, regardless of the cost of the plans and whether they itemize deductions on their tax returns. The deduction would be $7,500 for single individuals. The deduction, to be indexed to account for inflation, would also be extended to those with employer-provided plans, to be offset by the cost of their coverage.

"This is a huge incentive for the uninsured to get coverage, but, also, the vast majority of people with employer-provided coverage will benefit as well," a senior administration official said. The Bush administration estimates that 80 percent of people with employer-provided plans would see their tax liability fall because the deduction would be larger than the value of their insurance plans.

The idea of ending the taxpayer subsidy for what some in the health industry call "Cadillac health insurance" policies and using the savings to subsidize insurance for those who do not have it has been around for at least two decades, experts said.

Underlying the idea is the belief that the current tax structure essentially adds to the inflationary pressure on healthcare by subsidizing expensive healthcare plans, making coverage even more unaffordable for those who do not have it.

BIPARTISAN APPEAL

But now may be an interesting moment to resurrect the idea because the new Democratic Congress has vowed not to initiate any new programs that cannot pay for themselves.

Moreover, the idea of imposing a tax on those with generous coverage to help those without it has a progressive cast that could appeal to Democrats.

"It is being proposed by a Republican, but it's kind of a Democrat idea," said Robert Laszewski, a health policy consultant. ``It should be something that will interest a lot of Democrats."

Still, some leading Democrats are skeptical of the plan. "It is good that the president is finally talking about health care," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate committee that oversees healthcare matters. ``I question, however, why the president thinks the way to solve this problem is through the tax code."

Bush Insurance Plan Gets Cold Reception (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, January 23, 2007

President Bush's proposed tax deduction for health insurance appears to be shaping up as a tough sell in the Democratic Congress.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., said Monday that the tax changes, which Bush is expected to promote in Tuesday night's State of the Union address, would encourage employers to stop providing health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0120302

"Under the guise of tax breaks, the president is pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based health care system through which 160 million people receive coverage," the lawmaker said.

Stark, who oversees a key House Ways and Means subcommittee, said he would not consider holding hearings on the proposal, which includes a trade-off. Contributions from employers toward health insurance would begin to be treated as taxable income. At the same time, a standard deduction for taxpayers with health insurance would be set at $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals.

The White House says that 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. But about 20 percent would see a tax increase — those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

The change in tax policy is one of two major health proposals announced by Bush last weekend. The other would take some federal money now going to hospitals and other facilities and give it to states for programs to reduce the number of uninsured.

Insurers said the tax proposal would mostly help the nearly 17 million people who buy coverage through the individual or small group market. Their ranks include real estate agents, consultants and employees of small businesses that don't offer health coverage. Also benefiting would be those in newer industries where the workers tend to be younger and the health coverage is more basic, such as technology.

Meanwhile, many state employees, teachers, and older workers in such established industries as automobile and steel manufacturing could see their expenses go up, said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, the insurers' trade group.

The trade group has not yet taken a position on the president's proposal. However, the insurers like the president's focus on health care going into the year.

"With the president coming forward and making health care such a major issue on his priority list, I think progress is definitely possible," Ignagni said. "We're going to see views and positions from all sides. We see that as a very promising thing. More and more people will come to the view that we've reached a tipping point."

President's Speech Will Stay Close To Home (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — As President Bush prepares to deliver his first State of the Union address to a Democratic-controlled Congress tonight, he may be at the lowest point in his six-year presidency.

Yet on domestic policy, at least, the president may have an opportunity to revive his fortunes on several fronts, including healthcare, immigration and energy policy.

What that would take is a willingness by the president to work for compromises on Capitol Hill, even at the risk of displeasing the GOP's conservative base. And it would take a Democratic leadership willing to do the same with its base.

In past years, Bush has devoted roughly half his speech to national security and the "war on terror." But with his approval ratings well below 40% — largely a result of Americans' dissatisfaction over the Iraq war — this year he is expected to give greater emphasis to domestic policy, where he has the most opportunity to find common ground with Democrats.

In 2001, Bush did reach out to opposition lawmakers in the months immediately after his election, securing passage of the No Child Left Behind education law that remains a hallmark of his domestic record. White House officials are suggesting that, despite increasing partisanship since then, Bush is once again open to compromise.

"He understands his obligation ... is to go ahead forthrightly [on] big problems and come up with solutions that not only are going to have political appeal, but they're also going to be effective in making life better for Americans," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday.

"When you have a Democratic Congress that came in two weeks ago saying, 'We want to get things done' — we've got some offers that [are] going to be pretty good for them."

Both sides are expected to use the speech to send signals to the other — the president with his words, and the Democrats with their applause, or lack thereof.

Forging compromises and persuading Democrats to join him in the effort will not be easy. Some analysts think it's too late for Bush to regain the confidence of Democrats — or of much of the nation.

"People don't have confidence in him or his trustworthiness, and both of those undermine his ability to bounce back," said George C. Edwards III, a presidential scholar at Texas A&M University. "This is the lowest point in his presidency, absolutely. It's almost the time of desperation."

Bush's approval rating averaged 37% over the last year, according to the Gallup Poll — one of the lowest yearly approval ratings of any president since the organization started collecting such data during the Truman administration. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll released Monday put Bush's approval rating at 35%.

Those low ratings, combined with the "thumping" that Republicans took at the polls in November, mean that the president has much less political capital this year, said Thomas E. Mann, who studies White House-congressional relations at the Brookings Institution, a centrist think tank.

"The president is in an exceedingly weak position," Mann said. "He is not in a position to advance his agenda if it is any way controversial in the country or conflicts with the views of Democrats."

Bush is scheduled to deliver his speech before a joint session of Congress at 6 p.m.

A narrower focus

Some lawmakers are concerned that the shift in political fortunes — and years of pent-up Democratic frustration with GOP hardball tactics — could lead to a less-than-decorous atmosphere in the House chamber during the speech.

"I hope we won't act like children," said Senate Assistant Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.). "The Democrats in the House, if they're not appropriately considerate of the president of the United States, then that will agitate those of us on our side, and then we'll respond in kind, and then the American people will turn us off."

Democrats, however strongly they are feeling their oats at the moment, say they do not intend to be disruptive.

"We've always been respectful of the president, and I would assume that would continue," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). "This is really his night to give us his view, and I think people generally make their views known through applause and non-applause."

White House aides said that instead of the traditional laundry list of subjects — in which the president gives at least a brief plug for the favored programs of every Cabinet department — Bush plans to focus on a few key issues.

"I just think some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course," Snow said.

This year, the speech comes just 10 days after the president delivered a prime-time address to the nation on the subject of national security, and aides say he does not intend to repeat himself. For instance, at a time of increasing tension between the Bush administration and Iran, foreign governments are likely to listen carefully to what the president says about that country and about Syria, another neighbor of Iraq.

Aside from foreign policy, aides say, Bush will concentrate his remarks on four domestic policy areas: energy, healthcare, immigration and education.

On healthcare, Bush is expected to talk in more depth about an idea he floated over the weekend: that the tax code should put a limit on how much of workers' health insurance premiums are tax deductible. The deduction cap would affect more generous healthcare plans, particularly those provided to highly paid employees and some union members.

The administration argues that while some Americans would have to pay taxes on some of their employer-provided insurance, that would make it easier for uninsured workers and the self-employed to buy coverage on the open market. The idea is opposed by the administration's major business allies, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Bush is also expected to promote health savings accounts — as he has for years — which let workers avoid taxes on dollars they set aside to pay medical expenses.

Democrats have complained that health savings accounts primarily benefit upper-income workers, but they might be open to an expansion of the existing program if it were combined with other steps they favor.

DOJ_NMG_0120304

On energy, Bush will mention global warming along with the country's "addiction" to foreign oil — a major theme of last year's address — and propose developing new technologies as the way to combat them.

"Energy and environmental policy are linked up," Snow said. "The way you do it is you encourage innovation.... Carrots work better than sticks."

In particular, Bush is expected to renew his support for a $2-billion program to spur development of alternative fuels and other technologies designed to reduce pollution from fossil fuels.

Many Democrats support development of new, environmentally friendly energy technology, though they differ with Bush on specifics. Environmental groups are demanding stronger action on global warming.

"Small steps at this point will not address the problem very significantly and we cannot accept them," said Frances Beinecke, president of the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Immigration divides GOP

On immigration, aides say Bush will reiterate his support for "comprehensive" immigration overhaul, but it remains to be seen whether he will specify what that means.

In the last two years, Bush has used his annual address to Congress to sketch out core elements — better border security, improved enforcement at workplaces and a guest-worker program for temporary workers. But so far he has not taken a firm position on the problem at the heart of the immigration debate: the fate of the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

That issue has divided the GOP, with House Republicans adopting a hard-line stance that may have contributed to GOP losses in November.

That's why immigration legislation has a better chance of passing with Congress in Democratic hands, and lawmakers are preparing to broach the issue again.

On education, aides say the president intends to press for the reauthorization of his signature No Child Left Behind Act, which faces expiration if not renewed this year.

Congressional sources say that the bill will probably undergo some revision but that the Democrats and Republicans who signed on to it five years ago remain committed to its core principles: more testing of students and accountability standards for schools in an effort to improve achievement levels of disadvantaged students.

Beyond that, there is little consensus on where Bush could take his education agenda. Last year he expressed support for extending No Child Left Behind to secondary schools, but Democrats and Republicans say they want to work out the kinks at the elementary-school level before applying the idea to high schools.

In the end, it may not be proposals that determine the success or failure of the showcase address. Instead, it may simply be whether Bush avoids losing additional ground with the public and Congress.

"At six years, people think they know him," presidential historian Edwards said. "The idea that there is some magic phrasing or some magic policy that will give him a big boost and people will regain confidence in him — it's not going to happen."

Bush Wants States To Plan Coverage Of Uninsured (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's top healthcare official on Monday proposed a strategy for covering the uninsured that would offer incentives to each state to develop its own plan for expanding access, but stopped short of guaranteeing universal protection.

With Bush expected to address concern about rising premiums and shrinking coverage tonight in his State of the Union speech, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt offered governors greater leeway in how they use federal healthcare money for the poor if they would take the lead on offering help to the estimated 47 million now uninsured.

"The president will make clear he believes the federal government should not run healthcare," Leavitt told reporters. "He wants to partner with states." Leavitt said he expected a dozen or more states to pursue health reform efforts this year.

The Bush approach adds to a growing list of proposals for expanding medical insurance coverage and dealing with other aspects of healthcare. Like the others, it is likely to fuel the coming debate on the issue in Congress and on the campaign trail.

Hospital groups warned that the administration's proposal could undermine existing programs by redirecting federal funds. And on Capitol Hill, some leading Democrats grew more outspoken in their criticism of Bush's emerging healthcare strategy — a sign it may not get very far in Congress.

Leavitt, in a session with reporters, outlined what he called an "affordable choices initiative," which he said was the second major piece of the administration's plan, along with a proposal to tax high-value medical insurance provided by employers to some workers.

Under the initiative, the federal government could reallocate as much as $40 billion a year that now goes to hospitals and other providers that treat large numbers of uninsured and low-income patients, he said.

Funds would instead be used to provide basic health insurance coverage for low-income people, who could then see their own doctors and perhaps avoid costly hospitalizations. "Rather than perpetually paying the bills of uninsured people, it would be better to use part of the money to help them get an insurance policy," Leavitt said.

Over the weekend, the president unveiled the first part of his plan — a tax deduction that would make insurance more affordable for people who don't have employer-sponsored coverage. The proposal would be financed by taxing people with the richest health plans, those with premiums of more than $15,000 a year for family coverage, or $7,500 for individuals. Revenue from the tax would be used to cover deductions given to middle-class workers, many of them self-employed, to buy coverage.

Monday, the office of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) issued a press release saying that part of Bush's plan "amounts to a tax increase for the middle class."

And the chairman of the House Ways and Means health subcommittee, Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), accused Bush of "pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based healthcare system through which 160 million people receive coverage."

Some middle-of-the-road Democrats also questioned Bush's plan.

"I am concerned about how the administration's proposal will affect a middle-class person who's lucky enough to have a good healthcare package," said Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.). "The proposal involves a lot of pieces, and its hard to calculate how they all fit together." Wyden has a health reform plan of his own.

White House officials said the Democrats were overreacting. About 80% of employer-provided polices have annual premiums under the $15,000 and $7,500 taxable thresholds, according to administration figures.

The tax changes, designed to take effect in 2009, would result in an estimated 5 million people gaining coverage, White House officials said. No estimate of gains in coverage could be made for the other part of the administration's package, because it would depend on the states.

States would set up insurance-purchasing pools, decide who is eligible for subsidized coverage, and determine a basic benefits package, Leavitt said. They may well have to invest additional state funds, he noted.

In exchange, Washington would provide the states with greater flexibility over how to spend federal dollars now allocated to provide healthcare for the poor and uninsured. Leavitt did not promise additional federal money, and some congressional aides predicted cuts in healthcare spending as part of the budget Bush will send to Congress next month.

But hospital groups said the idea comes with a catch. Many states don't pay enough to cover care for poor people who have Medicaid coverage, so hospitals depend on the federal payments to make ends meet.

"This is literally taking money away from the poor," said Peters Willson, vice president for public policy with the National Assn. of Children's Hospitals. "You are taking money

Bush Wants States To Plan Coverage Of Uninsured (LAT)

A Healthy Initiative (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

THIS TIME last year, President Bush's main health policy proposal was to expand tax-sheltered health savings accounts. In the days leading up to tonight's State of the Union address, he has signaled a welcome shift in policy. Expanded tax shelters for health savings accounts would have drained billions of dollars from the budget, and the shelters would have mainly benefited the affluent. Their legitimate goals -- to correct the tax bias against people who don't work for big companies and to discipline health costs -- would be far better advanced by Mr. Bush's new initiative, which is budget-neutral and progressive.

At present, people who get health insurance from employers pay no tax on the value of the benefit. Someone with a marginal tax rate of 35 percent and a generous insurance policy worth $20,000 a year gets a $7,000 tax break. But people who buy insurance on the individual market must usually do so with post-tax dollars, so their tax break is normally zero. The administration proposes to eliminate that unfairness by giving salaried workers and freelancers the same tax deduction.

The reform would also remove the tax incentive to buy excessive insurance. Currently, the more generous your health plan, the more tax subsidies you capture; the person in the example above would get a tax break worth only $3,500 if he chose a more restricted insurance plan worth $10,000 annually. Generous insurance plans, which impose few restrictions on visits to specialists or on possibly redundant tests, inflate demand for medical services and push up prices for everyone; they help explain why the United States spends almost twice as large a share of its economy on health care as do most rich economies. By giving all insurance buyers a standard deduction, irrespective of the type of health coverage they choose, Mr. Bush would restrain medical costs and promote fairness. Because richer people tend to have more expensive insurance, the reform would slightly increase tax rates for people in the top fifth of the income distribution while slightly reducing tax rates for others, according to the White House.

There are weaknesses in the president's proposal. Rather than embracing tax deductions, which are most valuable to people in high tax brackets, Mr. Bush could have made his proposal even more progressive by recommending a refundable tax credit that would be worth the same to everyone. Moreover, there's a danger that ending the tax privilege for employer-provided insurance will cause companies to discontinue coverage, driving more buyers into the individual market, where it's hard to buy insurance at a reasonable price, especially if you already have a medical problem. The administration promises to support state efforts to redeploy federal Medicaid dollars in ways that would make the individual insurance market work better. But success here will depend on the states, and the details are sketchy.

Despite these caveats, the president is right to go after the existing system of tax subsidies for health care. Like the deductions for mortgage interest, these subsidies are regressive and have perverse consequences. Mr. Bush has kicked off a needed discussion.

Bush's Health Plan Unaffordable, Says Advocacy Group (NHR)

By Mary E. O'Leary

New Haven Register, January 23, 2007

President Bush's plan to make health insurance affordable for more people is getting a thumbs down from one advocacy group, which has more faith in the efforts of individual states to tackle the problem.

Bush, in his radio address this weekend, talked of his plan to tax employee health benefits that exceed a certain value, while extending a tax credit across the board to those with and without insurance. He will elaborate further tonight in his State of the Union address.

Janet Davenport, spokeswoman for the Universal Health Care Foundation, said the fact that the president is addressing the issue recognizes there is a problem.

"We need health care reform on the national agenda, but we need the right plan," she said, and based on reports to date, Bush's proposal does not appear to be "in the best interest of middle-class and low-income families, in fact ... it could actually be harmful."

There are 47 million Americans without health insurance, 407,000 of whom reside in Connecticut.

DOJ_NMG_0120308

The Bush plan would allow a $15,000 tax deduction for a family with employer-based health insurance and the same deduction for those who lack coverage. If health insurance costs more than that, the individual would pay taxes on the difference.

One analysis said this would mean a tax increase for about 20 percent of workers.

Americans covered by employee plans, estimated by the U.S. Census Bureau at 175 million, don't pay taxes on health insurance benefits, estimated to cost an average of $11,500.

Davenport, however, said most of the uninsured in the state are low-wage workers, whose employers don't offer health insurance, or they can't afford the premium.

"Either way, it is just plain unaffordable," she said.

Davenport said individuals and families who can't afford insurance are in low-tax brackets and making premiums tax-deductible "would be virtually meaningless." She said while it is hopeful the issue is again on the national agenda, Connecticut has an opportunity to move forward before the federal government.

The foundation hired an outside consultant this year to do an extensive economic analysis of alternative universal plans for Connecticut as to cost containment and the effect on economic growth.

The best plan was a single-payer model run by the state, but a second one, with a state pool that used competing private insurance firms, also saved money and boosted the gross domestic product.

Davenport said she wants to see such an analysis of Bush's plan. She said a viable plan that is not only global, but sustainable is needed.

A coalition of business and union groups last week demanded government action because rising health costs put American businesses at a disadvantage globally.

Andrew Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, Monday said he was happy Bush had joined the discussion.

"But, I am concerned that the president's tax proposal is more about shifting responsibility, rather than sharing the responsibility of our health care system. We should be making sure that everyone has good coverage, not punishing those who already do," he said.

A spokeswoman for the Connecticut Business and Industry Association said its analysts wanted to wait for further details before commenting on Bush's proposal.

Interest Lacking In Health Accounts (AR)

By Jodie Snyder

Arizona Republic, January 23, 2007

In his State of the Union address last January, President Bush spotlighted health savings accounts, saying that patients paying $1,000 deductibles rather than $20 co-pays would help control runaway health care costs.

Since then, Congress has tweaked health savings accounts, but enrollment in them hasn't really budged and few people know the facts about them.

In comparing 2005 enrollment numbers with 2006 figures, Kaiser Family Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based health care policy group, found no statistical difference between the two.

Health savings accounts are pools of tax-free money that employers or employees can contribute to. The accounts can be used to help with out-of-pocket medical expenses, and unlike flexible spending accounts, they can be rolled over to the next year. They are usually paired with high-deductible insurance policies to create consumer-driven health plans.

Bush and other advocates said that health savings accounts can make people think twice about going to the doctor and getting prescriptions, and that turning patients into better consumers could slow rising health care costs.

Employers also may like them because they generally have lower premiums than typical managed-care contracts, they argued.

"It (the acceptance) certainly hasn't been a tidal wave," said Gary Claxton, Kaiser vice president. "When you look at the total costs, the savings from these plans may not be enough to overcome consumer concerns about higher cost sharing."

Bush is not expected to talk about the accounts in tonight's address. Instead, his focus is expected to be on offering tax deductions to people who buy their own health insurance and possibly levying a tax on people who get hefty health benefits from their employer.

It took almost a year after Bush's last State of the Union address to get Congress to pass changes to make the health savings accounts more attractive.

One significant change was to allow employers to make a one-time transfer from the employee's flexible spending accounts to health savings accounts. Another important change was to allow employees to roll over their money into retirement accounts after they take a penalty for withdrawing the money, said Patricia Larsen, principal of the Phoenix office of Mercer Health and Benefits.

Other highlights include raising limits to $2,850 for an individual and $5,650 for a family. Previous limits on contributions had been tied to the size of the deductible.

Larsen said she believes the changes will help create more interest in the accounts as time passes.

Kaiser estimates that about 4 percent of employees are covered by high-deductible plans with a savings option, such as health savings accounts. Only 4 percent of companies that offer other types of health insurance say that they are "very likely" to adopt high-deductible plans/health savings accounts plans.

A recent survey by the Employee Benefits Research Institute, a Washington, D.C., public policy group, indicated that people enrolled in high-deductible plans continue to be less satisfied with their health plan than people in more comprehensive health plans. They are also less likely to recommend the plan.

Employees need to hear more about the plans and understand how they work, said Mike Cody, vice president of Lovitt and Touche, a Phoenix insurance brokerage.

"When people see that $2,000 deductible, they freak out. They don't understand it," Cody said.

One of the most frequent criticisms is that people don't know how to find out what a medical procedure is going to cost. It's hard to do comparison shopping when a doctor tells you have a suspicious mole that should be checked out, Cody said.

"You just want it to get taken care of."

Sandy Abalos, who owns Abalos and Associates, a Phoenix accounting firm, said she believes it's worth educating people about the accounts.

Abalos started using health savings accounts a couple of years ago. She said her employees have been happy with them.

Abalos took the money she saved on premiums and used it to fund up to 75 percent of her employees' deductibles.

She also works with a preferred provider organization network so that people can get reduced rates from network physicians.

The plan came in handy when Abalos had to pay for her daughter's braces.

The company has no dental plan but Abalos was able to dip into her account to pay for them.

"I think these are great. I just wish more people knew about them," she said.

Bush Hails Abortion Foes At Annual Rally (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

President Bush marked the 34th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision Monday, telling thousands of abortion foes he shares their goal of seeing "the day when every child is welcomed in life and protected into law."

Bush also signaled his unchanged opposition to a key goal of the Democrats who now control Congress: broadening embryonic stem-cell research.

"Our challenge is to make sure that science serves the cause of humanity instead of the other way around," the president said in a telephone call piped over loudspeakers to a Washington rally of opponents of abortion rights. "I have made clear to the Congress, we must pursue medical advances in the name of life, not at the expense of it."

Bush calls the rally each year, usually from distant locations. This year, he extended his weekend stay at the Camp David presidential retreat in the Maryland mountains to phone the participants from there.

DOJ_NMG_0120310

Bush last year vetoed a bill bolstering embryonic stem cell research that advocates say shows promise for numerous medical cures. Earlier this month, the House passed such a bill again, though by a margin short of what would be required to overturn another veto from the president.

With abortion foes in a more defensive posture now that Democrats gained control of Capitol Hill, Bush urged them to do more than look toward legislative victories.

"We've all got to remember that a true culture of life cannot be built by changing laws alone. We've all got to work hard to change hearts," he said. "The sanctity of life is written in the life of all men and women. And so I think, go forth with confidence that a cause rooted in human dignity and appealing to the best instincts of our citizens cannot fail."

Thousands of abortion foes from around the country gathered on the National Mall at midday for speeches. Several thousand later made their way to the Supreme Court, where they waved signs and chanted.

Police said there were no arrests during either protest.

The court is considering an abortion case now, dealing with the first nationwide restrictions on an abortion procedure since the landmark 1973 case.

The Bush administration is asking the court to uphold a law he signed in 2003 banning a procedure opponents call partial-birth abortion. It takes place most often in the middle-third of pregnancy.

The law calls it gruesome, inhumane and never medically necessary. Abortion-rights advocates argue that such abortions sometimes are the safest for women.

Thousands Of Abortion Opponents Rally On Mall (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — They marched down Seventh Street on Monday chanting, singing and eventually flooding onto the Mall to show disapproval on the 34th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

In his annual call to the thousands of abortion opponents at the March for Life, President Bush, who delivered a telephone message from Camp David, said, “We believe every human life has value, and we pray for the day when every child is welcome in life and protected into law.”

The president told the group, “We’re making progress,” citing legislation that allows a person charged with killing a pregnant woman to be also charged with harming or killing a fetus.

Mr. Bush mentioned his signing the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which is before the Supreme Court in a case to be decided this term.

Senator Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican who announced his presidential bid over the weekend, had supporters fan out over the Mall to pass out pamphlets proclaiming him as “proudly pro-life” and “a champion of our values.”

After the Mall rally, the demonstrators marched up Constitution Avenue to the Supreme Court.

This is the first anti-abortion march here since the Democrats took control of Congress. The change is “challenging us to fight harder,” said Natalie Campbell, 18, who was at the rally with her father and their church group from Kokomo, Ind.

Joe Konopa, 19, who traveled here with more than 60 people from three churches in the Kokomo area, said, “They are picking up on the fact that more and more Americans, especially the young, are against abortion.”

Gail Babalonis of Hooversville, Pa., said which party was in control did not matter.

“The last eight years have been pro-life, and the only thing they got accomplished is the ban on partial birth abortions,” Ms. Babalonis said.

Abortion Foes To Renew Efforts (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler And Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Tens of thousands of abortion opponents marched through melting snow on the Mall yesterday and vowed to work harder -- since Democrats have taken control of the Capitol -- to overturn the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion in 1973.

DOJ_NMG_0120311

Demonstrators' hopes were buoyed a year ago at the annual March for Life by two new appointments to the Supreme Court. Now, with Democrats in power in both houses of Congress, abortion foes find themselves without allies in some key positions for the first time in more than a decade.

"Pro-lifers aren't going to pack up and go home because of the 2006 elections," said Karen Cross, political director of the National Right to Life Committee, at a news conference before the march. "Indeed, we will redouble our efforts and continue working until every unborn child is protected."

Democratic leaders have said they prefer what they consider a less combative approach in preparing legislation on the abortion issue. Several bills are circulating that would change the focus of the abortion debate to pregnancy prevention, through such measures as improved access to contraception.

Democrats say their goal is to find a political compromise, an approach echoed yesterday by some abortion rights advocates.

"We wish those people who are coming in town for a great adventure one day a year would join with us to put forth a prevention-first agenda that would significantly reduce the need for abortion," said Jatrice Martel Gaiter, president and chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Metropolitan Washington.

Some abortion opponents said a compromise might not be realistic.

"The pro-abortionists say you legally can kill an unborn child for any reason. We say the child should live. Where is the middle ground?" said Wanda Franz, president of the National Right to Life Committee.

Teenagers made up the majority of demonstrators yesterday who poured out of buses from across the country, wearing matching colored scarves or carrying posters with statements such as "Face It Abortion Kills."

"It's amazing!" said Annie Forsthoefel, 17, after an overnight trip with a church youth group from Cincinnati. She and her friends wore matching fleece headbands that said "PRO-LIFE." She said she had wanted to come to the march for the last three years. "How can you not love a baby? It seems unnatural," she said.

The young people joined older abortion opponents, some holding rosaries or draped in blankets depicting the Virgin Mary. Some said they make the pilgrimage every year. Organizers could not be reached for a crowd estimate, and police said they no longer provide such numbers.

About 100 abortion opponents had demonstrated Sunday morning in front of the Planned Parenthood abortion clinic on 16th Street NW, and dozens more gathered there yesterday.

The crowd on the Mall cheered when President Bush spoke to the protesters through a loudspeaker from Camp David, thanking those gathered for their help "to build a culture of life." Bush reminded demonstrators about progress his administration has made in the antiabortion movement, including supporting parental notification laws, funding crisis pregnancy centers and signing into law a ban on partial-birth abortions that the Supreme Court is expected to rule on this year.

The rally mirrored similar demonstrations in state capitals and was the culmination of a weekend of events in Washington, including a series of workshops and seminars, a youth rally and Mass that filled Verizon Center and a conference at which antiabortion bloggers discussed potential 2008 presidential candidates.

As the sun set in front of the Supreme Court at the end of the march, a group of women took to the microphone, one after another, holding black signs that said: "I regret my abortion."

Cindy Rose, 49, of Saginaw, Mich., told the lingering demonstrators about abortions she had in 1979 and 1981.

Rose said the guilt over her abortions killed her relationships and pushed her to alcohol and drugs. "One night I asked God to please forgive me," she said. "Abortion is a lie and not a solution."

As the women spoke, some in English and some in Spanish, their words were interrupted by about 100 abortion rights advocates linking arms and holding signs saying: "Trust women."

"Tonight I'm going to speak for my generation," said Susan Scanlan, chairwoman of the National Council of Women's Organizations. "Younger women do not share our memories of women going to grimy apartments. I took such a trip with a college roommate in 1968."

As Scanlon spoke, a chorus of abortion opponents rose in volume chanting Hail Marys.

Pro-lifers March By The Thousands (WT)

By Tarron Lively And Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

Tens of thousands of people converged on the District yesterday to participate in the March for Life and to attend Masses in recognition of the 34th anniversary of the landmark Supreme Court decision in the Roe v. Wade case.

The march began at about 2 p.m. on the Mall and moved east past the U.S. Capitol and Supreme Court building in Northeast.

President Bush sent a message of support. In a telephone call broadcast over loudspeakers, he told the marchers that he shares their goal of seeing "the day when every child is welcomed in life and protected into law."

The court's decision overturned state laws barring abortion.

Mr. Bush calls the rally each year, usually from distant locations. This year, he extended his weekend stay at Camp David in Maryland to make the call. He phoned last year from Manhattan, Kan.

Students, members of religious groups, families and children slogged through mud and toted signs with messages such as "Abortion kills" and "Justice for all, born and preborn."

The Rev. Luke J. Robinson, pastor of Quinn Chapel A.M.E. Church in Frederick, Md., asked what would have happened had Martin Luther King been aborted, then described the process in detail.

"I know it sounds horrible, but abortion is horrible," he said, his voice thundering across the Mall. "It is a murderous and bloody business."

Before the march, a sea of teens, parents and clergy filled the Verizon Center downtown for a Mass and rally organized by the Archdiocese of Washington.

Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl, who was joined by cardinals, bishops and priests from across the United States, said the Mass was to celebrate "the value and dignity of human life."

"The church is very much alive and pro-life," he said to cheers and applause.

The Rev. William D. Byrne, the chaplain at the University of Maryland Catholic Student Center and the archdiocese's director of campus ministry, delivered the homily and urged participants to "get on board with God's plan."

"Abortions happen not because of choice, but because people feel they have no choice," he said. "A plan will save a life -- not just the baby's."

Kevin O'Neill, 53, and Bill Stumf, 57, both of Titusville, Pa., came with a large group from the congregation of the Diocese of Erie.

Their group was made up largely of teens, including Mr. O'Neill's 16-year-old daughter, Erin. The message was not lost on the youths, Mr. O'Neill said.

Father Byrne delivered "a very good homily," he said. "He got the point across."

The archdiocese conducted its first rally marking the anniversary in 1995. As participation grew, the rallies were held in several places throughout the region until 2004, when they moved to the Verizon Center.

Simultaneous rallies were held yesterday at DAR (Daughters of the American Revolution) Constitution Hall and the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle to handle the overflow at the Verizon Center.

Terry Fortier, 57, of Gaithersburg, joined the march with three of her four adopted children, leading them in chanting, "I was adopted, not aborted."

Attending her 20th march, Mrs. Fortier marveled at the turnout.

"There is a bigger number of people then there has ever been," she said as the march snaked toward Capitol Hill.

"It's nice to see people who care," said her son Eric, 17.

The Metropolitan Police Department closed several streets and activated the Joint Operations Command Center and its network of downtown surveillance cameras to monitor the activities. Officer Kenny Bryson, an agency spokesman, said late yesterday afternoon that no arrests or incidents had been reported.

Cheryl Rash and Debbie Siegel, both 17, came with a group from the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. They shared the president's view of protecting unborn children.

DOJ_NMG_0120313

"I decided since babies can't speak for themselves, I'd be here to speak for them," Cheryl said.

Debbie said she has been against abortion all her life.

"I've looked at it outside of religion," she said. "Just because you can't see doesn't mean you have to kill it."

Brownback, Hunter Vow To Overturn Roe (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, January 23, 2007

Two of the Republicans' most conservative presidential hopefuls promised anti-abortion activists on Monday that if elected, they would work to overturn the Supreme Court decision legalizing the procedure.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and California Rep. Duncan Hunter addressed the annual March for Life marking the anniversary of the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

"We recognize a tragedy of life in Roe v. Wade, but that tragedy will not always stand," Brownback told thousands of cheering abortion foes at an afternoon rally.

Brownback, who formally launched his presidential bid on Saturday, spoke about adopting his daughter, Jenna, from a Chinese orphanage.

"I mention her because some woman in China, who I probably will never meet, fought for her life," Brownback said. "Somebody fought for her life. You are fighting for somebody's life.

Hunter, who has established a presidential exploratory committee, told the crowd he and his wife would begin to campaign in earnest this Thursday in South Carolina, one of the earliest primary states.

"If we have a judicial applicant, a judicial nominee who can look at a sonogram of an unborn child and not see the value of human life ... if I should become president of the United States, he will not receive a judicial appointment," Hunter said.

Both lawmakers are viewed as long shots to win the nomination over better-known candidates like Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. But each is aiming to corner the party's social conservative base, which considers abortion a key issue.

Brownback later hosted a reception on Capitol Hill for about 200 of the activists.

Brownback Finds Plenty Of Supporters At March Against Abortion (BRAH/MCT)

By Matt Stearns

The Bradenton Herald, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - Thousands of people marched against abortion here Monday. More than a few of them also marched for Sam Brownback.

Brownback, the conservative Kansas Republican senator, announced his bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination Saturday in his home state. Monday's march was his first major public appearance since.

He was feeling the love.

Dozens of blue "Brownback for President" posters dotted the National Mall, where marchers gathered before proceeding to the Supreme Court. Well-wishers approached to urge him on. A gaggle of photographers recorded virtually his entire participation. (He was one of the few politicians to march the entire way; most others gave speeches beforehand and then split on this toe-numbingly cold, damp day.)

"God bless you, Sam! You are the next president, in the name of Jesus!" shouted a voice near the onstage microphone after Brownback's speech.

A surprising response for an underfunded politician mired at 1 or 2 percent in national polls? Not in this crowd. To many marchers, Brownback isn't an asterisk, he's a hero. And that's what gives Brownback hope that his grassroots-oriented campaign could take the establishment by surprise.

Brownback so far is the only Republican presidential hopeful who appeals strongly to the party's social conservative wing, and his candidacy is a test of how influential that wing of the party remains.

DOJ_NMG_0120314

Speaking to reporters at a Capitol Hill reception his campaign hosted (it had to rent an overflow room to handle the crowd), Brownback unleashed a volley of facts and figures: In Iowa, 70 percent of Republican caucus-goers describe themselves as "pro-life," and 40 percent of them wouldn't support a candidate who wasn't opposed to abortion, Brownback said.

"This is where the heart of my base, and where the heart of the base of the Republican Party, lies," Brownback said. "When a proper voter contact is made, I think we'll be in great shape in this campaign."

And what of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, two Republican front-runners? Neither was at the march. (The only other possible Republican presidential candidate who appeared was California Rep. Duncan Hunter, who's an even longer shot than Brownback. Hunter vowed to make all potential judicial appointees watch a sonogram.)

McCain opposes abortion except in some circumstances, but he's had difficulty persuading religious conservatives to support him. That remained true Monday. Some dismissed him as "not pro-life" or "unimpressive." Whitty Whitesell of Plymouth, Mich., allowed that McCain was "a war hero and wonderful example" but said Brownback "stands for life."

Romney took a beating from a flier that featured pictures of him and Democratic Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. The brochure was titled "Pro-Life Students Against Flip-Floppers from Massachusetts" and highlighted Romney's past support for Roe v. Wade. (Romney says he opposes abortion.) Cheryl Sinclair of Smithtown, N.Y., who said abortion was her No. 1 issue, called Romney "back and forth" before she even saw the flier.

Brownback wouldn't trash McCain or Romney, but he did say, "I don't think so, no," when he was asked whether any other Republican candidate could match his record on fighting abortion.

Still, even some in the crowd holding Brownback signs didn't know much about the man from Kansas.

"All I know is he's pro-life and they were passing out signs," said 17-year-old Laura Marshall of Livonia, Mich.

Some knew less.

"Who's Brownback?" a young man asked his mother. "I think he's from Nebraska," she responded.

But at this point, Brownback and his supporters are running more on faith than anything else.

"Pray for the campaign and we'll get it done in 2008," Brownback told the crowd at his reception.

Patricia Pitkus Bainbridge of Rockford, Ill., was among those listening. She'd never given a penny to a politician until Brownback came along. She has talked up Brownback to friends and is unperturbed by those who say he can't win.

"I believe God can raise people up who He wants to raise up," Bainbridge said. "I believe God is raising him up."

Deficit Halved 2 Years Early (USAT)

By Rob Portman

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Three years ago, President Bush established the goal of cutting the federal budget deficit by half in five years, without raising taxes. At the time, many — including USA TODAY— expressed skepticism. But it was achieved last year, three years ahead of schedule. Now is the time to build on that success and work with Congress to balance the budget in the next five years.

On Feb. 5, the president will propose the customary five-year budget, showing declining deficits every year and a surplus in 2012.

Getting to balance requires both keeping the economy strong and keeping federal spending under control.

Key to the first is continuing pro-growth policies — including tax relief — that have helped fuel our robust economy. Since the president's tax relief became fully effective in 2003, we've seen a dramatic increase in business investment, more than seven million new jobs created and higher wages for American workers. This stronger economy has also generated record revenues over the past two years, cutting our deficit by more than $150 billion. This is why it is so important to balance the budget without raising taxes and not put our economy at risk.

Key to the second condition is setting budget priorities and stopping unnecessary or wasteful spending. Fiscal restraint while investing in our national security is equally important to a balanced budget.

The president's budget will demonstrate how balance can be achieved by using cautious economic and revenue projections in line with forecasts by outside experts. On spending, the president will propose realistic restraint, while increasing funding for the global war on terror, including all costs of Iraq and Afghanistan over the next two years.

In demonstrating how we can balance the budget in the next five years, the president will continue to call for bipartisan solutions to the longer term challenges posed by unsustainable growth in important entitlement programs. In fact, a key reason to pursue a balanced budget now is to position us better for that future challenge.

A balanced budget is good for the American taxpayer and for our economy. There's plenty of work to be done, but I am optimistic we can do it — across party lines — as the American people expect and deserve.

Bush Seeks Balanced Budget, 6 Years And $3 Trillion Late (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

In his State of the Union address tonight, President Bush is expected to call for a balanced budget by 2012. In other words, after turning the Clinton-era surpluses into six straight years of deficits and putting the nation almost $3 trillion deeper into debt, he now wants to see the budget balanced after he leaves office, just as the demographic tidal wave of baby boomer retirements begins to inundate the federal ledgers in red ink. Call us party poopers, but that hardly seems reason to break out the champagne.

At least the president is posturing on fiscal issues. With Democrats doing the same, it seems the deficit is heating up as a political issue, which is a good thing.

Mustering the political will to fix the problem is another matter, as Bush's plan attests. The president is not calling for a major new look at health spending. He is not scaling back his tax cuts. He is not prepping the nation for the tough choices that lie ahead or making any himself. In fact he is not expected to offer any specifics tonight.

In reality, his call is little more than an observation. If the economy continues to grow, if spending in Iraq begins to wind down, if the nation averts another Katrina or 9/11, then, presto! The budget will drift toward the break-even point with only modest fiscal restraint — most of which would fall to the next president and future Congresses.

But this surplus-as-destiny approach has a big problem. Bush's break-even point comes about the time baby boomers start to retire in droves. Their retirement, combined with surging health care costs and increased life expectancies will push spending on Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security off the charts. Already those programs account for 40% of all government spending.

In 2012, for instance, the Social Security surplus — the amount by which Social Security tax receipts exceed Social Security spending, masking the true size of the federal defict — will be about $64 billion. Just three years later, it will have plummeted to just $12 billion on its way to a deficit in 2017.At the same time, Medicare spending will increase by $158 billion, to $817 billion.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke summed up the situation last Thursday when he told a Senate committee that any short-term improvement in the fiscal outlook should be seen as "the calm before the storm." That storm will strike nearly everyone in the form of reduced benefits, rising taxes or both.

Now is not the time to ballyhoo the potential for a balanced budget in 2012. It is time to address health care costs, which rise by 10% to 15% in most years. It is also the time to fix Social Security and enact polices that encourage people to work longer.

The speech we'd like to hear would have a more urgent tone. The president would acknowledge that his tax cuts, the war in Iraq and the new Medicare drug plan have worsened the deficit in the short run, while reminding people that core problems would have existed anyway. He would agree to revisit his tax cuts in return for progress in controlling spending. And he would not shirk from the duty of laying out the challenges that lieahead. His speech might begin:

"Distinguished members of Congress, we face critical choices. If we do not act, our nation will face a financial crisis and a diminished quality of life for generations. …"

If there is good news, it is that Bush still wants to tackle Social Security. All in all, however, we hear too much bravado and too little concern; too much about the short term and too little about the long.

When Washington truly addresses the looming fiscal crisis, we'll uncork the bubbly.

U. Of Dallas Drops Bush Library Bid (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0120316

By Angela K. Brown

AP, January 23, 2007

The University of Dallas withdrew its bid for George W. Bush's presidential library Monday, citing the library site selection committee's exclusive talks with nearby Southern Methodist University.

Last month SMU emerged as the apparent winner for the library with the announcement of the negotiations, putting it ahead of the other two finalists, the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco.

University of Dallas officials said Monday that the school wanted to release some of the partners that had committed to the project, including the city of Irving's promise of $50 million in hotel tax revenues. The 3,000-student Catholic university also wanted to be free to develop the site it had set aside for the library, a sprawling 300 wooded acres with the Trinity River running through it.

"Our decision to withdraw from the selection process is not a loss for our university; this is not a failure. Instead, we think this is a tremendous success story for us," President Frank Lazarus said. "This process has propelled us into the national stage and our university is now characterized by a new vision for a very bright future."

President Bush said on Thursday that he was "leaning heavily toward SMU" and was close to a decision. First lady Laura Bush attended the 11,000-student, private university. The Bushes are Methodists.

A final decision is expected within months.

Bush Officials Meet New Democrats (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 23, 2007

The White House reached out to Democrats last week in advance of President Bush's planned attendance at a party retreat later this month.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman met members of the New Democrat Coalition (NDC) on Capitol Hill.

NDC chairwoman Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.) said the meeting grew out of a phone conversation Paulson initiated with her over the holiday break.

She described the exchange on the Hill as a "meet-and-greet" event that lasted an hour. The two administration officials talked about trade and budget issues without getting into specifics, she said.

"We talked about how we are moderate Democrats, interested in progressive public policies and committed to … widening the winner's circle," Tauscher said.

Tauscher said she welcomed the outreach but remained skeptical as to whether Bush "understood the message of the election," which was the public's desire for a new direction in the war in Iraq.

The meeting was not the first between the White House and the NDC, whose ranks grew after the election. Bush invited seven members of the NDC and a group of fiscal conservatives, the Blue Dogs, to the White House after midterms.

Surprises From Gates's 1996 Memoir (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Of all the presidents he worked for, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is particularly supportive of one -- but it isn't, as might be expected, Ronald Reagan, the first President Bush or even Gerald R. Ford.

Rather, in his memoirs, the new Pentagon chief leaps repeatedly to the defense of Jimmy Carter, the sole Democrat for whom he worked, who was often seen as weak on the Soviet Union and taken by surprise when it invaded Afghanistan in December 1979.

Gates's 1996 book, "From the Shadows," is now being combed for insights into the new defense secretary's thinking, how he might run the Pentagon and what he's had to say about his past bosses.

When it comes to Carter, it isn't that Gates, a career Sovietologist who rose to become CIA director, is a closet dove. Rather, he thinks Carter was far tougher on Moscow than is generally recognized.

DOJ_NMG_0120317

"I believe the Soviets saw a very different Jimmy Carter than did most Americans by 1980, different and more hostile and threatening," Gates writes. In both conventional weaponry and in the nuclear arena, he argues, Carter would "provide a strong foundation for Ronald Reagan to build upon." By contrast, Gates describes the first president for whom he worked, Richard Nixon, as "by far the most liberal" of the group. (Gates also shows a bit of dovish ankle, revealing that before leaving the CIA to work in the Nixon White House, he marched in a May 1970 antiwar demonstration.)

Most of all, writes Gates, who was the national intelligence officer for the Soviet Union at the time, Carter's emphasis on human rights cast a spotlight on the Soviets' greatest vulnerability. The rights theme, Gates says, made Carter "the first president during the Cold War to challenge publicly and consistently the legitimacy of Soviet rule at home." In his view, these were "the first steps" toward the beginning of the end of the Soviet Union.

Gates even defends Carter's handling of Afghanistan, reporting that the president and his advisers reacted far earlier than is generally understood, most notably by authorizing covert aid to Afghan insurgents.

The 604-page book contains a few other hints at how Gates might operate at the Pentagon during the last two years of the Bush administration.

Â· He might seek to borrow from the proposals and tactics of the administration's opponents. Some of the most effective U.S. officials he has seen, he says, were Henry A. Kissinger, Zbigniew Brzezinski and George P. Shultz, whom he describes as "basically hawks who drew extensively on the ideas and initiatives of the doves."

Â· He appears more inclined than his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, to try to enlist the support of the Pentagon bureaucracy for his policies. Reviewing the record of one CIA director, Adm. Stansfield Turner, he concludes that, "in nearly every case, his failure to build a substantial internal constituency for his changes led to the reversal of his initiatives very quickly after his departure."

Â· He doesn't make policy disagreements personal. He writes warmly about his former boss Brent Scowcroft, who was national security adviser under George H.W. Bush (and also under Ford) but has been considered something of a turncoat by the current president for opposing the invasion of Iraq. "I never argued as much with any person," he recalls. "I never got more frustrated at times with any person. But when I became DCI [director of central intelligence] and left the White House, I considered Brent Scowcroft my closest friend in the world."

Analysis: Dems Oppose Modest Veto Plan (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 23, 2007

The Senate is moving toward its first vote in more than a decade on the line-item veto, and it's remarkable how much has changed — particularly the positions of many of the major players.

At issue is a watered-down GOP measure that would allow a president to scrutinize spending bills he signs into law for questionable items and then submit cuts, or rescissions, to Congress for a vote. Unlike the current system, Congress couldn't simply ignore the cuts — if both Houses voted to approve them, they'd go into effect.

Put forward by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., it's far weaker than the line-item veto power a GOP-dominated Congress gave President Clinton in 1996. Under that bill, before it was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, Clinton's line-item vetoes automatically went into effect unless overturned by a two-thirds vote of both House and Senate.

Still, debate on Gregg's plan already has whipped up passions. Most adamant in opposition is Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., who assaulted the idea last week and again Monday as an attack on Congress' control over the federal purse strings.

"Make no mistake, this line-item veto authority would grant tremendous — and dangerous — new power to the president," Byrd said. "He would have unchecked authority to imperil congressional power over the purse, a power that the constitutional framers felt was absolutely vital to reining in an overzealous president."

But in seeking to derail Gregg's bill, Byrd is effectively filibustering a version of the line-item veto that is similar to one he backed 12 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0120318

That measure, written by then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., was offered as an alternative to a GOP version requiring a two-thirds vote to override presidential line-item vetoes. Thirty-seven Senate Democrats voted for the proposition, including 20 Democrats still serving. Among them: Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad of North Dakota.

Nineteen Democrats, including liberal stalwarts like Edward Kennedy and John Kerry of Massachusetts, voted for the stronger GOP version; 11 are still in the Senate.

Daschle's plan, Byrd said at the time, "does not result in any shift of power from the legislative branch to the executive. It is clear cut. It gives the president the opportunity to get a vote."

Gregg mirrored those arguments Monday and said Democrats should join him if they want to be consistent with their previous votes.

"This basically gives no power to the Executive Branch other than to ask the Congress to take another look ... and vote again," Gregg said. "So one would presume that folks who voted for the line-item veto back in 1995, unless they've changed their view, would be supportive."

You might imagine Gregg's a big fan of the watered-down line-item veto. He's not. He told reporters last summer that it would have "very little impact" on the budget deficit.

And as chairman of the Budget Committee last year, Gregg rebuffed pleas from GOP leaders and the Bush White House to move a comparable plan through his committee as a stand-alone bill. He instead embedded his line-item plan in a much more controversial bill to overhaul the budget process — which died without reaching the floor.

Among Democrats, Kerry still backs the idea. So do Sens. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., Evan Bayh, D-Ind., Tom Carper, D-Del., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., among others. But since Gregg's "Second Look at Wasteful Spending" plan is being offered as an amendment to a bill to increase the minimum wage, some of those Democrats are likely to oppose it. A vote is expected Wednesday.

Old-school Republicans such as Ted Stevens of Alaska and Pete Domenici of New Mexico have also changed their minds on the line-item veto after Clinton used it to kill military construction projects.

The idea behind the line-item veto is that wasteful "pork barrel" spending would be vulnerable since Congress might vote to reject such items once they were no longer protected by their inclusion in bigger bills that the president had little choice but to sign.

Senate's Wage Bill Still Exempts Samoa (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

The Democrat-controlled Senate took up a bill yesterday that would raise the minimum wage across the United States and its territories but exempt American Samoa, where tuna canneries pay workers $3.26 an hour.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi told reporters less than two weeks ago that she would close the loophole after coming under criticism from Republicans for what they termed a "fishy favor" to StarKist Tuna. StarKist has lobbied for years against raising the minimum wage in American Samoa, and its parent, Del Monte Corp., is based in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district.

"I have asked the education and labor committee as they go forward with the legislation to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," Mrs. Pelosi said earlier this month.

The House, however, passed the minimum-wage bill with the American Samoa exemption. And yesterday, Senate Democrats were moving ahead with the original legislation, which for the first time would enforce the minimum wage on the Northern Mariana Islands, another territory in the Pacific with a similarly low minimum wage.

That bill is co-sponsored by several dozen Democrats, including Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer of California.

In addition to San Francisco-based StarKist, San Diego-based Chicken of the Sea also has a cannery in American Samoa. Together, the California companies employ about 75 percent of the Samoan work force.

Democrats said they are imposing the wage increase on the Northern Marianas -- a proposal long blocked by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican -- because of the harsh labor conditions there.

DOJ_NMG_0120319

Delegate Eni F.H. Faleomavaega, a nonvoting Democrat representing American Samoa, opposes extending the minimum wage to that territory.

A "decrease in production or departure of one or both of the two canneries in American Samoa could devastate the local economy, resulting in massive layoffs and insurmountable financial difficulties," he said, echoing the arguments of conservatives against applying the wage to poorer regions of the U.S.

"The truth is the global tuna industry is so competitive that it is no longer possible for the federal government to demand mainland minimum-wage rates for American Samoa without causing the collapse of our economy and making us welfare wards of the federal government," Mr. Faleomavaega said.

Emanuel Makes Nice With GOP Foes (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a private, upstairs room at the Monocle, a storied meeting place for lawmakers, lobbyists and the like, a dinner of unlikely companions took place Monday night.

A high-ranking member of the House Democratic leadership broke bread with nine Republican congressmen, hoping to heal the rifts of the last election and possibly find common ground for future legislative endeavors.

The impresario was as improbable as the guest list—Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus and the architect of the Democratic effort to throw Republicans out of the majority last year. The renowned political street-fighter shelved the shiv for a salad fork, putting on his best manners for an evening of crab cakes, steak and red wine.

After mercilessly attacking the GOP for close to two years for what he called incompetence and blind allegiance to the failed policies of a failed president, Emanuel acknowledged that he has some work to do in re-establishing a sense of trust on the other side of the aisle.

"None of the people on the [dinner] list I ever went after, but it's a chilling thing," said Emanuel. "Their colleagues like their jobs, and my job was to take their jobs."

Those in attendance included several notable moderates, such as Reps. Mike Castle of Delaware, Jo Ann Emerson of Missouri and Fred Upton of Michigan, along with a couple of conservatives—all chosen by Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), co-host of the get-together.

It's far too soon to know if the make-nice dinner will have any long-term yield, but Washington is so riven that even a shared meal could be seen as modest progress.

"The perceptions are that the polarizations and the divisions in this country are beyond repair," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.), a Southern conservative who attended. "I know in my heart that's not true."

LaHood organized the dinner with the understanding that Republicans could ask Emanuel anything they want.

"I don't know that this has ever been done before," said LaHood, a past sponsor of four bipartisan retreats that fell by the wayside several years ago as the atmosphere in Washington became increasingly poisonous, with an ever-widening rift between the parties.

After 12 years of Republican rule, Democrats say they want to reach across the aisle, treat the minority fairly and work together for the common good. Of course, that's what Newt Gingrich said, too, when he became House Speaker in 1995.

Instead, Republicans pursued a policy of only bringing bills to the floor that could win "a majority of the majority," a strategy that effectively shut out Democrats from participating in the business of writing laws.

Now Democrats say they want to do things differently.

But many Republicans have already pointed out that the Democratic majority shut them out as Democrats fast-tracked six major pieces of legislation through the House floor in the first two weeks of the new session of Congress.

"We're short-circuiting democracy here," complained Republican Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio). "We're being silenced in this process."

Not all Republicans feel quite the same sense of outrage as their leader, noting that the Democrats were simply doing what Republicans had done for years.

DOJ_NMG_0120320

"I have a hard time waxing too indignant given the way we handled matters here," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). He and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) are organizing a group of fiscal conservatives to have dinner with Emanuel, too. "We look a little whiny," said Flake.

Emanuel, however, inspires a special brand of suspicion given his aggressive effort to attack Republicans and take their jobs away.

"I think there are some members of Congress who probably would never trust Congressman Emanuel," said Rep. Thomas Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who played defense to Emanuel's offense last year as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"There might be better members on the Democratic side to achieve that bipartisanship," he said. "We'll have to see."

Even so, Emanuel has a record of working with Republicans to further the issues he cares about, from the Great Lakes Restoration Act with Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) to the re-importation of prescription drugs with Emerson and Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.).

When moderate Republicans needed a regular meeting space, Emanuel provided it for them after their own leaders declined. And he spearheaded an invitation to President Bush to address Democrats at their upcoming retreat in Williamsburg, Va., which the president accepted.

"I really don't think of him as a partisan, but as a colleague," said Emerson, who has worked with Emanuel on prescription drug and health care issues over the years.

Her constituents, she said, want to see Republicans and Democrats working together for the common good. And in the final years of the Republican majority, she said, little was accomplished as Republicans insisted on going it alone.

"I'm embarrassed to walk into a Rotary Club meeting to give the luncheon speech and say we haven't done anything," Emerson said. "We can always meet in the middle as long as nobody is trying to zap the other in the next election."

It is a sentiment echoed by Wamp, who voted for four of the Democrats' first pieces of legislation this year and hopes Emanuel will help resurrect the bipartisan retreats of old.

He doesn't hold Emanuel responsible, either, for Republicans losing the majority.

"The majority party grew arrogant," Wamp said. "I don't blame them for us losing. I blame us for us losing."

Lawmakers from Illinois have a long tradition of working together in a bipartisan manner, dating back to former Democratic Sen. Alan Dixon and former House Republican Leader Bob Michel. The entire delegation regularly lunches together to talk about issues of local concern.

Both Emanuel and LaHood said the dinner grew out of their own close friendship that evolved from an easy working relationship. Following the meal, the pair planned to split the tab between them.

"Here Rahm is of the Jewish faith and I am an Arab-American," LaHood noted. "Maybe between the two of us, if they put us in charge of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, perhaps he and I could get it settled."

New Coalition Aims To Keep Dems In Check (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 23, 2007

Democratic lawmakers who stray too far from the party line could find themselves facing primary opponents financed by unions, trial lawyers and political activists eager to put the new congressional majority to the test.

After two weeks of near perfect unity, congressional Democrats now move into more divisive territory that will test party discipline on such issues as the war in Iraq, worker rights and health care.

Anti-war activists led by groups such as MoveOn.org and Win Without War have already mobilized, pressuring Democrats and Republicans to denounce President Bush's troop boosting plan for Iraq. But they also want tougher action, arguing that the elections that put Democrats in power were a referendum on the war.

This week, an influential group of organizers from labor and the liberal movement are banding together to hold Democrats in line on populist issues such as expanded health care, trade restrictions and worker protections.

DOJ_NMG_0120321

"The idea is that this election was a watershed," said Steve Rosenthal, one of the main organizers of the new labor coalition. "There is a great opportunity to begin moving America in a new direction of economic populism and fairness."

The coalition has organized two entities — a lobbying wing called They Work For Us and a campaign arm called Working for Us PAC — that will target lawmakers who don't support their agenda of raising wages, increasing jobs, providing more affordable health care and preventing job losses to foreign countries.

"Our PAC will encourage Democrats to act like Democrats — and if they don't — they better get out of the way," Rosenthal wrote in a memorandum describing the organization.

Outside pressure on Democrats is a sensitive issue within the party caucus. Democrats acknowledge the need for party discipline, but also recognize the different blocs that make up the party. Voters last November elected new Democrats from liberal, moderate and conservative districts. These Democrats won in a variety of regions and often defy tidy ideological descriptions.

"Instilling party discipline in our party is simply harder than in the Republican Party," said Simon Rosenberg, head of the New Democrat Network. "We are a more diverse party than they are."

Rosenthal said his coalition won't target Democrats with moderate or conservative constituencies. As an example, he cited Heath Shuler, a former NFL quarterback who won a previously Republican seat in North Carolina. He ran as an opponent of abortion and gun control. But he voiced opposition to the North American Free Trade Agreement, a Clinton presidency deal long decried by organized labor.

"We're not trying to force people to the left of their districts," Rosenthal said. "We want to make sure that Democrats primarily represent their districts."

But They Work for Us is also naming lawmakers who coalition members say have defied their agenda and are out of step with their districts. Among them are Democratic Reps. Ellen Tauscher of California, Henry Cuellar of Texas and Al Wynn of Maryland.

Tauscher spokesman Kevin Lawlor said such attention is undeserved.

"Rep. Tauscher and her 63 New Dem colleagues were in lockstep with Speaker Pelosi and the Democratic Leadership throughout the first 100 hours" of the new congressional session, Lawlor said. "Rep. Tauscher was elected with 67 percent of the total vote last November, a number that far exceeds top-of-the ticket Democrats in her district."

In the first two weeks of this congressional session, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California pushed through a new package of ethics rules and popular legislation raising the minimum wage, expanding embryonic stem cell research, lowering student loan rates, requiring the government to negotiate Medicare drug prices and ending oil company subsidies. They all passed with unanimous or near unanimous support from Democrats and from Republicans as well.

"We're going to look for those issues that have a consensus within the caucus," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the political arm of the House Democrats.

But Democrats also have vowed to go beyond those votes. And it is the details of further legislation that could put the party divisions on display.

"There will be good days and there will be bad days," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who is credited for writing the script for the House Democratic victories last year. "You have the energy of the new members and the experience of the more senior members and you have to combine the two."

The war is likely to be the first test.

In the Senate, Democrats are trying to rally Republicans to their side on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq. The House would likely follow. Anti-war groups, however, see this is as a beginning, not an end.

"What the leadership is saying is, 'Look, we're going to take this in steps,'" said former Rep. Tom Andrews, D-Maine, head of the anti-war groups Win Without War. "The first step is going to be a nonbinding resolution. That leaves people wondering, 'OK, what is the next step?

A coalition of anti-war groups is primarily pressuring Republicans to oppose the president's new plan in Iraq. But it is also mobilizing voters to contact lawmakers from both parties to emphasize opposition to the war as well.

"If Democrats fail on that core issue," Andrews said, "all other issues are going to be much more difficult."

GOP Pushes For Stricter Ethics Reform (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

The debates on a House bill that would nix federal pensions for convicted lawmakers and a Senate measure to cut pork spending underscored how scandal-scarred Republicans are backing broader ethics reforms than the new Democratic majority is.

"We did have colleagues who violated the trust of the Congress and the public. We have to fix it," said Rep. Lee Terry, a Nebraska Republican whose pension-reform bill was sidelined by Democratic leaders in favor of a weaker bill. "When one of our own breaks the rules, we don't rally around them."

The House yesterday started considering a bill by Rep. Nancy Boyda, Kansas Democrat, that denies federal pensions to members of Congress convicted of bribery, perjury and conspiracy offenses related to the lawmaker's office. A vote could come as soon as today.

Separate bills by Mr. Terry and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, would have withheld the pension from lawmakers convicted of a longer list of felonies, including some unrelated to abuse of office -- ranging from white-collar embezzlement crimes to political crimes such as securing campaign contributions by intimidation.

The Democratic bill had a shorter list of pension-losing crimes because the leadership promised "this bill can be passed and enacted into law as soon as possible," said Shanan Guinn, spokeswoman for Mrs. Boyda.

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats fought to defeat a Republican measure that would authorize the president to remove earmarks -- and send them back to Congress for a second look and another vote. Earmarks, or pork, are provisions in a bill to fund specific projects, often used by members of Congress to pay for pet projects in their home districts or states.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said through a spokesman that earmark reform was just a ruse to pass a "line-item veto."

"It would be used to attack Social Security, Medicare and other items for those with the greatest need," spokesman Jim Manley said.

Under the proposal, the power to revise spending bills differs from a line-item veto in that either the House or Senate can reject it with a simple majority vote. Congress passed a true line-item veto in 1996, which would have required a two-thirds majority in both chambers to override. The Supreme Court declared the veto unconstitutional two years later.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, called it a common-sense approach to fiscal responsibility.

"Americans are watching, and we are committed to ensuring that this common-sense reform gets the vote it deserves," he said. "Fiscal responsibility is not just an Election Day issue. If we are serious about reform, we must take the steps necessary to connect fiscal rhetoric with fiscal reality."

A vote on the amendment could come as soon as tomorrow.

Mr. McConnell co-sponsored the amendment with Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican.

The amendment was originally attached to an ethics reform bill and nearly doomed that legislation when Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, single-handedly blocked a deal to give Republicans the vote they demanded. The ethics bill passed 96-2 Thursday after both sides agreed to debate the earmark provision with the minimum-wage bill.

On the Senate floor yesterday, Mr. Byrd said revision authority was "a piece of garbage" and argued that Congress should not abdicate the "power of the purse" to the executive branch.

Other Republican-proposed ethics reforms have met resistance.

Last week, Senate Democrats initially balked at a Republican-backed measure to disclose all earmarks as opposed to just a sliver of the earmarks, as the majority proposed. In the face of criticism, Mr. Reid changed course and embraced the bill after delaying a final vote when the proposal unexpectedly survived a procedural vote to kill it.

The Senate voted 98-0 to adopt the measure as an amendment to ethics legislation, with 38 Democrats and seven Republicans switching their votes to support the measure they had opposed.

DOJ_NMG_0120323

Similarly, pension reform was not originally part of the agenda for House Democrats. They adopted the cause after the Senate passed it and Mr. Terry and Mr. Kirk introduced their bills.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer then assigned the bill to Mrs. Boyda, a freshman from a vulnerable district who made a strong issue of campaigning against Washington corruption.

Mr. Hoyer was restrained in his praise for Mrs. Boyda's bill, saying that it "could be better, but it is timely" and that Congress needs "to do the right thing" on ethics.

Neither the Boyda bill nor the Republican proposals would be retroactive. Pensions will still go to convicted felons such as former Republican congressman Bob Ney, who was sentenced Friday to 30 months in prison for bribery involving disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. When Ney turns 62 in 2016, he will be eligible for an estimated $29,000 annual pension.

Senate Jet Rule Would Cost Others, Too (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Senate's plan to require members traveling aboard plush private jets to pay full charter fares also would force changes in travel by all presidential candidates.

Under the Senate-passed ethics bill, senators extended their new rules for reimbursement of such travel to any candidate seeking federal office. That means anyone running for Congress or president would have to pay jet owners the charter cost of travel on the planes.

Currently, lawmakers flying aboard such jets — often owned or leased by businesses and labor unions — pay the equivalent of a first-class ticket using campaign funds or their office accounts if the trip is for official business.

For example, a lawmaker would pay about $800, equivalent to a first-class ticket, for a corporate jet trip between Washington and Los Angeles. The cost of a 12-seat Gulfstream: $31,450. Under the new rules, a senator or candidate would pay either all or part of that charter cost, depending on the number of lawmakers and aides on the jet.

"The companies don't just fly us around out of the goodness of their hearts," said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a likely 2008 presidential candidate. Obama stopped using private jets at the lower rate last year.

House ethics rules, approved earlier this month, ban all corporate jet travel. The Senate measure exempts senators who have their own planes or whose spouses own them. The two measures must be reconciled by Congress.

Travel aboard private planes has long been a favored perk for members of Congress and presidential candidates. The practice came under scrutiny during the investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who paid for trips by members on private jets.

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, a likely GOP presidential candidate, said he would pay the higher charter rate if the Senate rule becomes law. Romney "travels commercial unless there are the time constraints of a loaded schedule," aide Kevin Madden said. As governor, Romney faced criticism for a 2005 California trip on a Pfizer jet.

As a senator, Democrat John Edwards spent more than $325,000 in campaign money on private planes, mostly while he ran for the White House in 2004, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which analyzes campaign data. That was the most of any senator in 2001-05. Edwards spokeswoman Andrea Purse declined to comment.

The six senators who have taken steps to formally run for president supported the travel rule.

Revealing The Bundlers (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

REP. CHRIS Van Hollen (D-Md.) has a new job, but he's sticking with an old idea that could make it more complicated. Mr. Van Hollen's new job is to lead the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, meaning that he's responsible for helping House Democrats retain their majority and for coming up with the campaign cash to make that happen. That's where his old idea -- and the potential complication -- come in.

Last year, as the House Judiciary Committee was debating lobbying reform, Mr. Van Hollen offered an amendment that would have required lobbyists to report not just the campaign contributions they give directly to lawmakers but also the campaign checks they "bundle," or solicit for or deliver to lawmakers. Astonishingly, this proposal passed the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 28 to 4. Less astonishingly, the provision had disappeared from the final version of the bill when it was brought up for debate on the House floor.

Now, with Democrats in charge of the House and Mr. Van Hollen ensconced at the campaign committee, the obvious temptation would be to let the matter drop. After all, good relations with lobbyists -- and a steady stream of cash from K Street -- are essential to the fundraising of both parties. Shining a light on the role of these lobbyists might not be particularly comfortable for those on either side of the transaction. To his credit, Mr. Van Hollen, along with Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), plans to introduce a measure today that would require such disclosure. It mirrors the language of a bundling provision included in the ethics and lobbying legislation the Senate passed last week.

Mr. Van Hollen discounts the notion that his proposal could make his campaign committee job harder. "The rule will apply to everybody equally. The politics of it is probably a wash," he told us. "In terms of the public good, it's the right thing to do. The entire purpose of this is to begin to break that nexus between lawmaking, on the one hand, and the practice of bundling that lobbyists use to enhance their influence in that process."

For the first time, lobbyists would be required to list the fundraisers that they or their clients hosted and the amounts that were raised. They would have to provide a good-faith estimate of the total contributions they "collected or arranged" for individual candidates or political committees. In other words, they would have to provide the kind of information that is well known to those on the inside of the process but is obscured from outsiders. Mr. Van Hollen is right to insist that the bundlers be brought to light.

FEDERAL DIARY: Many Managers Resist The Call For More Telecommuting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Concerns over employee productivity and a lack of control over employee activities make it difficult for federal managers to support telecommuting, according to a survey released yesterday.

But federal managers also think telecommuting improves "work-life balance" for employees, and makes their agencies more competitive in hiring and keeping employees, the survey found.

The survey was sponsored by the Telework Exchange, which brings federal officials and technology professionals together to promote telecommuting, and the Federal Managers Association, which represents the interests of nearly 200,000 supervisors and managers across government. The survey was underwritten by Tandberg, a company that makes software for video, voice and other data.

Darryl Perkinson, president of the managers association, called the survey "pretty accurate and reflective" of opinions held by federal managers, even though a relatively small number, 214, responded.

Perkinson acknowledged that allowing federal employees to work from home raises difficult questions and is not appropriate for some occupations. He added, "I don't think we need to give up on telework," especially if it could be a job perk that helps the government attract top-notch job applicants or lure back retirees interested in working part time or on projects.

Bush administration officials and some members of Congress, such as Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), have urged federal agencies to allow employees to work from home at least one day a week or at the 14 telework centers in this region sponsored by the General Services Administration. They think telecommuting can ease traffic congestion and pollution in the region and also help agencies get their work done in the event of a natural disaster or a crisis that forces office shutdowns.

The most recent data show that only 19 percent of eligible federal workers can be considered telecommuters, and managerial resistance is seen as the reason for what some officials consider to be a relatively low participation rate, given the size of the government.

Federal managers were asked in the survey whether they think their agencies support telecommuting: 35 percent said yes, 47 percent said no and 18 percent were unsure.

Regardless of their involvement in telecommuting programs, almost three-quarters of respondents cited two common concerns: fear of losing control over employees and loss of productivity.

That stands in contrast with the common perception that lack of funding and security issues keep managers from embracing telework. Last year, a survey of 200 federal technology officials found that nearly 40 percent worried about security breaches involving telecommuters. The technology officials listed concerns about remote access to systems, violation of employee privacy and disruption of agency operations.

But the survey of federal managers showed that managers who are most involved in telecommuting -- and telecommute themselves -- hold more favorable attitudes than their colleagues: 21 percent of managers who telecommute said they were concerned about security issues, compared with 43 percent of managers who have no telecommuters in their office.

Still, federal managers in the survey said telecommuting programs can affect productivity by making it more challenging to communicate with employees. Thirty-two percent cited the lack of face-to-face contact with employees as a problem, and 22 percent cited the inability to sit around a table with employees as a disadvantage.

The mangers also said they do not see e-mail and voice messages as a substitute for face-to-face contact, with 61 percent saying they had misinterpreted e-mail and 43 percent saying they had misunderstood a phone message from co-workers.GSA Increases Mileage Rate

The General Services Administration announced yesterday that the standard mileage reimbursement rate for federal employees who use their cars for official business will be increased to 48.5 cents per mile, a 4-cent increase over the current rate. The new rate becomes effective Feb. 1, the GSA said, noting that it mirrors the rate adjustment approved by the Internal Revenue Service last year.

Et Tu, George? (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Maybe George W. Bush is the education president after all. Whatever one thinks of his No Child Left Behind initiative, he has made the classics powerfully resonant today.

So for those schoolchildren and university students out there struggling through "Moby-Dick" or the "Aeneid," take heart! They're not just about white whales or Trojan wanderers — they're also about President Bush and Iraq.

Forget the Vietnam analogy that critics of the Iraq war usually toss out. A more trenchant analysis of Iraq-style adventures appears in the histories of Thucydides, written 2,400 years ago.

Great Athenian diplomats of the day, like Nicias, warned against military involvement in Sicily, calling it "a war that does not concern us," according to Thucydides. But smooth-talking neocons of the day, like the brilliant Alcibiades, said in effect that the Sicilians would welcome the Athenians with flowers. He promised that they would be treated not as occupiers but as liberators.

"We shall have many barbarians ... join us," Alcibiades declared, and he argued that the enemy would be easily defeated "rabble." "Never were the Peloponnesians more hopeless against us," he told the crowds.

So the Athenians rallied around the flag and dispatched a huge force. But as Thucydides notes, they had suffered a grievous intelligence failure: they did not get the support they had counted on, and the enemy was far larger and more organized than they had anticipated. The war went badly, and eventually Athens was forced to confront two options: withdraw or escalate.

The Athenians, deciding that defeat was not an option, went with the "surge." They dispatched an additional 70-odd ships and 5,000 troops.

The result was a catastrophic defeat. Thousands of Athenians were killed far from home, and others were sold into slavery. The Athenian navy was destroyed, and the double-or-nothing gambit meant that other nonaligned states sided with the Athenians' enemy, Sparta.

Within a few years, Athenian democracy had collapsed, and Athens, the great city-state of the ancient world, had been conquered by Sparta.

President Bush has lent a new thrill to readers of Virgil's account of the adventures of Aeneas from Troy to Rome. A marvelous new translation of the "Aeneid," by Robert Fagles, has just been published, and critics (and Professor Fagles himself) have noted its relevance: Virgil is suddenly newsy.

That's because this is a tale of war and empire, and a constant subtext is how easy it is to be uncivilized when promoting civilization.

DOJ_NMG_0120326

Aeneas is an exponent of reason who at the end of the book confronts an enemy who pleads with him to "go no further down the road of hatred." Aeneas sees that the enemy is wearing the sword-belt of his slain friend, and reason dissolves into fury: "Blazing with wrath," he plants his iron sword "hilt-deep in his enemy's heart." In war, moderation is the first casualty.

Yet the single best guide to Mr. Bush's presidency may be "Moby-Dick." Melville's book is, of course, about much more than Captain Ahab's pursuit of the white whale — a "nameless, inscrutable, unearthly" symbol of all that is dark and unknown in the world.

Rather, it is an allegory about the cost of obsession. Ahab has a reasonable goal, capturing a whale, yet he allows this quest to overwhelm him and erode his sense of perspective and balance. Ignoring warnings, refusing to admit error, Ahab abandons all rules and limits in his quest.

Ahab finally throws his pipe overboard; he will enjoy no pleasures until he gets that whale. The fanaticism becomes self-destructive, eventually destroying Ahab and his ship.

To me at least, Melville captures the trajectory of the Bush years. It begins with a president who started out after 9/11 with immense support at home and abroad and a genuine mandate to fight terrorism. But then Mr. Bush became obsessed by his responsibility to prevent another terror attack.

This was an eminently worthy goal, but Mr. Bush abandoned traditional rules and boundaries — like bans on torture and indefinite detentions — and eventually blundered into Iraq. And in a way that Melville could have foretold, the compulsive search for security ended up creating insecurity.

Melville's lesson is that even a heroic quest can be destructive when we abandon all sense of limits. And at a time when we hear the siren calls of moral clarity, the classics almost invariably emphasize the importance of moral nuance, an appreciation for complexity, the need for humility.

So, students, study those classics. They are timeless — and in the days of the Iraq war and Guantánamo, they have never been more timely.

US Productivity Growth Lowest For A Decade (FT)

By Chris Giles In London

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

The US economy last year recorded its lowest rate of labour productivity growth in more than a decade, with growth in output per hour worked falling behind the EU and Japan. The fall casts further doubt on the ability of the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates as the US economy slows.

Research to be published on Tuesday by the Conference Board, the international business organisation, shows that US labour productivity in the whole economy grew by 1.4 per cent in 2006 as slower economic growth was combined with a rapid rise in employment.

Gail Fosler, the chief economist of the Conference Board, told the Financial Times that the fall in productivity growth was unlikely to be cyclical and the result of weaker gains in services' industries, raising "concerns about the long-lasting productivity impact of information and communications technology".

If weak productivity growth continues, she said, "even in a slow growth environment, the US economy will be performing close to its potential", restricting the Fed's ability to cut interest rates.

Better economic figures released this year, alongside emerging signs of a slowdown in US economic potential, has led to tumbling market expectations of a rate cut in recent weeks. Investors now believe that there is only about a 10 per cent chance of a reduction in official interest rates by the May meeting of the Fed's interest rate-setting committee, according to the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland.

The US slowdown in whole economy productivity growth over the past three years - to a rate half that in 2002 and 2003 - contrasts with rising productivity growth in Japan, on the back of a surge in manufacturing exports on the Conference Board's internationally comparable figures.

Japan's labour productivity grew by 2.5 per cent in 2006 as manufacturing companies took advantage of new demand from China in addition to its traditional export destinations.

Europe improved its productivity performance considerably last year as it enjoyed its first year of strong economic growth since 2000. However, the improvement in Nordic countries and Germany masked continued weakness in southern Europe, where growth was generated by surging employment rather than an improvement in the efficiency of the economies of Spain, Italy and Portugal.

The Conference Board recorded that productivity growth remained extremely high in emerging countries of China, India and Eastern Europe, as inefficient companies fell away and huge numbers of workers moved from relatively inefficient sectors such as agriculture to manufacturing.

China recorded 9.5 per cent productivity growth in 2006, while India achieved 6.9 per cent and the 12 new EU member states achieved 4.1 per cent growth.

Earnings Growth Fears Push Stocks Down (USAT/BLOOM)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

NEW YORK — Stocks fell Monday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to its biggest decline in two months, on concern that reduced demand and increased competition will hurt corporate earnings growth.

The Dow slid 88.37 points, or 0.7%, to 12,477.16, its fourth-consecutive decrease since closing at a new high and biggest retreat since Nov. 27. The Standard & Poor's 500 fell 7.55 points, or 0.5%, to 1422.95. The Nasdaq composite lost 20.24 points, or 0.8%, to 2431.07.

Motorola, the world's second-largest mobile-phone maker, fell 55 cents to $18.72 and led technology shares lower after Piper Jaffray said the company's profit margins may be crimped by rivals' products. Boeing dropped $3.03 to $85.60 after Wachovia Securities downgraded the second-largest commercial-jet maker on concern deliveries for new aircraft may be delayed.

The retreat followed reports last week from Intel and IBM that suggested analysts may have to lower earnings estimates. Profits among S&P 500 companies are expected to rise 6.1% in the first quarter, according to analyst projections compiled by Bloomberg, down from a forecast of 7.8% made two months ago.

"We're not going to keep the same pace of earnings that we've seen in the past," says Barry James, chief equity strategist at James Investment Research. "That will eventually pass through the psyche of investors, and we're seeing that with the start of earnings season right now."

Eaton, the second-biggest maker of hydraulic equipment, lost $3.85 to $73.80 and was the biggest loser in the S&P 500 after the company said lower truck production will hurt orders. Pfizer fell 27 cents to $26.95 after the world's largest drug maker said it will lay off 10,000 workers to reduce costs (story, 1B).

Stocks were also dragged lower as natural gas futures rose to one-month highs on forecasts of colder-than-normal weather for much of the USA (story, 3B). Earlier gains in crude and heating oil futures were erased after midday.

All 10 major industry groups in the S&P 500 declined. A measure of consumer-related stocks fell for the first time in two weeks as concern grew that higher heating costs would limit spending and boost inflation. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker said late last week that inflation is still the "predominant" risk for policymakers because the recent slowing in price increases might be temporary.

P=MV/Q (WSJ)

By Robert D. Mcteer

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The main question on financial TV lately has been whether the economy will continue to weaken and possibly slip into recession, but allow inflation to decelerate, or whether it will pick up and cause inflation to accelerate. More slack in the economy, or a larger output gap, would reduce inflation; more output, it is presumed, would make inflation worse. While a weaker economy might well reduce inflation, that isn't a necessary condition. Faster growth can also reduce inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0120328

While inflation may respond to a reduction in aggregate demand, it would also logically respond to an increase in aggregate supply. In the simple equation of exchange, MV=PQ, so P=MV/Q. In other words, other things equal, prices respond positively to an increase in MV, or aggregate demand, and negatively to an increase in Q, or aggregate supply. This is not rocket science.

But it is a truism rarely articulated. The Phillips Curve is rarely mentioned anymore, but it still pervades the common view that inflation can be tamed only through a weaker economy. Disinflationary growth is not considered an option, probably because we think of output as responding only passively to changes in aggregate demand, so that they rise together or fall together.

That may be the usual case, but it doesn't have to be. Supply-side factors may stimulate output independent of aggregate demand, through shifts in investment, exports or shifts from imports to domestically produced goods. Or animal spirits.

Monetary policy is currently in pause mode as far as interest rates are concerned, but moderate increases in the monetary base must be considered anti-inflationary whether output remains weak, or strengthens, as I expect.

Supply-side economics is out of favor at universities that don't have good football teams. But that's largely because its bar for success has been raised too high. Tax-rate cuts may not fully pay for themselves at current rate levels, but they certainly have gone a long way in that direction, as the recent sharp decline in the budget deficit despite rapid spending growth clearly indicates. Tax-rate cuts that substantially pay for themselves in higher tax revenue are clearly a good thing.

Our economy is remarkably healthy. Inflation has crept above our comfort zone, but current policies are bringing it down without a recession. Monetary policy is just about right, and is being helped in its fight against inflation by other factors: the Internet, globalization, China, India and other new players. Let's not be afraid of growth.

Mr. McTeer is a distinguished fellow of the National Center for Policy Analysis and former president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

Class Of '07 Gets Plenty Of Job Offers (WSJ)

By Erin White

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Employers are diving back into the fountain of youth.

This year is shaping up as the strongest for college recruiting since the downturn earlier this decade, colleges report. Traditionally heavy recruiters, including management consulting firms, investment banks and accounting firms, are intensifying college recruiting efforts. They're also facing more competition from other employers in such fields as technology, consumer products, government and even nonprofits.

Employers plan to hire 17% more graduates from the class of 2007 than they got from the class of 2006, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers. That would make this year the strongest job market since 2000-2001, the association says. More than half of the surveyed employers said they planned to increase hiring; only 5% planned a decrease. Salaries were forecast to rise 4.6%, according to another survey by the same group.

"We now again have the nice problem of having to help some of our students choose among multiple job offers," says Jack Tinker, director of recruiting at the career office of Connecticut College. Mike Hendel, interim director for the career center at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn., says he, too, is counseling students deciding among "two or three really good offers."

Behind the increased recruiting are a relatively strong economy, growing business demands and heady corporate profits. Employers created about 1.8 million additional jobs in 2006. Average weekly earnings rose 4.5%, compared with a 3.2% increase in 2005.

Some companies are also planning for future work-force needs as the baby boomers' retirement looms. Employers "are finally starting to get the message that [they] really need to do more" with college recruiting as baby boomers age, says Dan Black, director of campus recruiting for the Americas at Ernst & Young LLP.

At New York University, close to 40% of seniors have job offers, which is more at this point in the year than in any year since 1998-99, estimates Trudy Steinfeld, executive director of career development. Salaries are up about 5% to 10% since last year, and companies are offering bigger signing bonuses -- up to $10,000, she says.

At the University of Chicago, 119 companies conducted on-campus interviews with seniors during the fall quarter, compared with 93 a year earlier. Employers posted 180 jobs in that quarter, up from 135 a year before. Recruiting mainstays such as management-consulting and financial-services firms are active at Chicago, but so are nonprofits and public-service groups: About 15 such organizations have expressed interest in an April career fair, compared with none at this time last year, says Meredith Daw, co-director of career advising and planning services.

At a November job fair in Boston, the 12 sponsoring schools turned away at least five employers clamoring for space. At the University of California, Los Angeles, officials squeezed 10 additional employers into a job fair last week that they had initially limited to 100 employers. Many of the companies attended a fall fair but need more recruits.

Christopher Bothur, a Connecticut College senior, in the fall accepted a job in an analyst-training program at Deutsche Bank AG. Earlier, he had spoken briefly with the bank about a possible summer internship, but he spent the summer working for the United Nations in China.

When he returned to school, the bank called him, whisked him to New York for interviews and offered him a position that will include stints in New York, London and China. "The job kind of fell into my lap," he says. Mr. Bothur says his base salary alone will be roughly twice as much as it would have been at the think-tank jobs he was considering.

College career counselors say the tone of campus recruiting doesn't approach the dot-com era frenzy, among employers or students. Students saw older friends and siblings suffer through the downturn earlier this decade, and they understand that the job market could tank again. And while the economy as a whole is strong, sectors such as housing and autos are suffering.

One employer contributing to the rising demand on campuses is accounting and consulting firm Deloitte & Touche. The firm is recruiting about 3,300 seniors for full-time positions in the U.S. this year, up from fewer than 3,100 last year, says Diane Borhani, head of U.S. campus recruiting.

To attract candidates, Deloitte is raising salaries and signing bonuses. Full-time starting base salaries in the U.S. are up about 5% on average to as much as roughly $60,000 in certain markets. Signing bonuses for new college hires in consulting range from $6,000 to $10,000 this year, up from $4,000 to $8,000 last year, Ms. Borhani says.

Employers also hit campuses earlier. Yum Brands Inc., which markets restaurant chains including Taco Bell and KFC, sent students welcome-back postcards and emails in August, the earliest it has ever started campus recruiting efforts. "We tried to be there literally the day that they got to school," says Misty Reich, Yum's vice president of global talent management. Recruiters and senior executives soon followed.

Companies are also trying to make their recruiting efforts more personal. The management consultancy Boston Consulting Group sent more young employees to campus this fall to talk one on one about life at the firm.

Personal outreach went a long way to recruit Wayne Vonder Heide, a 21-year-old senior at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, who recently accepted a management-training position at Kraft Foods Inc. He interviewed with about a dozen companies last fall, mostly for sales positions. "Just seeing how many jobs are out there was really encouraging," says Mr. Vonder Heide, an advertising major with a business minor. He was confident enough in his prospects that he spurned follow-up interviews with about four companies.

Around Thanksgiving, Kraft offered him a post in Cincinnati. Management trainees contacted him and the company invited him to tour the office there. He met his would-be co-workers; one took him around the city, including neighborhoods popular with young professionals. "I could really see myself getting up every day and going to this office and getting along well with all of these employees," Mr. Vonder Heide says. "That was a deciding factor."

Why Job Churn Is Good (WP)

By Robert M. Kimmitt

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

More than 55 million Americans, or four out of every 10 workers, left their jobs in 2005. And this is good news, because there were over 57 million new hires that same year.

These statistics illustrate a recent and growing trend of dynamism in our job market, especially among younger workers. Data on labor demand in the United States, gathered for the Job Openings and Labor Turnover Survey (JOLTS), show that the 12 months ending in November had the highest average of labor turnover since the U.S. government began tracking this information in 2000. But the data also show that our economy has maintained a consistently strong ratio of new hires to separations. Over the year ending in November, new hires in America exceeded employee separations by an average of 364,000 per month.

Indeed, the data show that each month millions of Americans leave their jobs -- most of them voluntarily -- and millions more are hired. This is what we want: an economy in which people looking to move up have as many opportunities as possible from which to choose. Promoting this dynamism, and the opportunities it creates, should be a focus of our economic policy.

This flexibility of our job market is one key reason the United States successfully competes in an increasingly interconnected global economy. In fact, our workers lead the international marketplace in this trend. Job tenure averages 6.6 years for Americans, compared with an average of 8.2 years for Britons, 10.6 years for Germans, 11.2 years for the French and 12.2 years for the Japanese. Even more striking is that, on average, workers in the United States will have 10 different employers between ages 18 and 38.

This dynamism of our labor force strengthens the U.S. economy because each move to a new employer can involve greater responsibility, greater pay or both. And the time workers spend in search of employment is decreasing. In December, the average duration of a job search was the shortest in more than four years.

Unfortunately, what usually makes headlines is a big company's layoff of workers. What gets less coverage is the 40 months of job growth we have recently enjoyed, the historically low unemployment rate (4.5 percent), record tax revenue and an acceleration in real wage growth over the past year. This is good news for the generation preparing to graduate from high school and college. Unlike their grandparents, who built careers around companies rather than opportunities, members of the class of 2007 will enter the workforce with an understanding that change may be the only constant in their professional careers.

The dynamism of our workforce helps keep the United States competitive because it increases not only the number of jobs available but also the productivity of those holding jobs. U.S. productivity has steadily accelerated over the past three decades, as workers look to improve their standard of living and pursue different opportunities through new employment.

The challenge for policymakers is to keep pace with the dynamism of our economy, since the trend is likely to accelerate in the future. Governments, both federal and state, must build upon and support the institutions that make our country great. One strength is our educational system. Americans seeking to make job changes have a resource not found elsewhere in the world: our nation's community college system, which provides higher education and the chance for workers to retrain at a relatively minimal cost after they enter the workforce.

Government must also ensure that neither fiscal nor regulatory policy impedes the growing dynamism of our economy. For example, job seekers would benefit from the freedom to change employment without having to disrupt their health coverage and their retirement savings plans. Recognizing this, we will work throughout the administration to implement policies that both keep pace with the rapid change in our economy and strengthen our position in the international marketplace.

Consistently Conservative Small-Business Lobby Reaches Out To Democrats (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The National Federation of Independent Business is a bastion of Republicanism. Its staff has for decades been a farm team for GOP operatives and its campaign giving has been notably one-sided. Of all major lobbying organizations last year, NFIB gave the lowest share of its political action committee money to Democrats, a mere 8 percent.

But with Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill, NFIB says it's changing. Its new president, Todd A. Stottlemyer, 43, wants to rebrand the nation's premier small-business lobby as "nonpartisan," and to prove his resolve he is talking extensively to Democrats and preparing to donate more to their coffers. "We're trying to reach out," he said. "It doesn't matter if you're an R or a D."

With many lobbying shops scooping up Democrats after last November's elections, Stottlemyer's effort may not seem that newsworthy. But for NFIB, it is huge. Stottlemyer's predecessor, Jack Faris, was viewed as a zealous partisan. A former executive director of the Republican National Finance Committee, Faris stopped talking even to pro-business Democrats in the House after he got involved in a shouting match over dinner with a group of Blue Dogs half a dozen years ago. NFIB, under Faris, also boasted of its role in defeating two of Congress's highest-ranking Democrats, House Speaker Thomas S. Foley (Wash.) and Senate Minority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.).

Now, however, Stottlemyer and his right-hand man, Executive Vice President Dan Danner, are working to rebuild the bridges that Faris burned. Stottlemyer, who declined to talk about Faris, has met with and offered to cooperate with such prominent Blue Dogs as Reps. Allen Boyd (Fla.) and John Tanner (Tenn.). In the Senate, he has visited moderates such as Blanche Lincoln (Ark.), Ben Nelson (Neb.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.), and asked them to join him on several issues, especially health care.

And in a move that the Faris-led NFIB would never have made, the organization did not list as one of its "key votes" of the year the House Democrats' recent push to increase the minimum wage. Small businesses despise few policies more, yet NFIB decided that the measure's success was preordained and that listing its defeat as a top priority would only antagonize the Democrats it now aspires to court.

One of those is Rep. Albert R. Wynn (Md.). Late last year, NFIB dispatched volunteers and a few of its lobbyists to help his campaign. Wynn is exactly the kind of middle-of-the-roader that NFIB now wants as an ally. He's also African American, and NFIB's long-term survival depends on attracting more minority members.

"We don't agree on everything," Wynn said of his new suitors. "But we've been able to find some common ground."

Boyd, like much of official Washington, remains dubious. "For the last 10 years, the NFIB was a difficult organization to deal with; it didn't play it straight," he said. "We'll have to see over a period of time how it conducts itself." But because of Stottlemyer's entreaties, Boyd said, "I'm a little optimistic." From a Democrat, that is huge.Ethics Gone Wild

As a good deed, the American Heart Association likes to conduct a mini-class in cardiopulmonary resuscitation for House and Senate staffers. It's a very popular course. But this year, new lobbying rules have gotten in the way.

Association lobbyists asked the House ethics committee if they could provide staffers with a box lunch, a CPR kit (consisting of a training DVD and an inflatable mannequin to practice on) and an hour-long lesson. The committee's lawyers said no to the lunch and the kit (as the lobbyists expected) -- and they also nixed the class. Under the new gift ban, it was deemed a thing of value that a lobbying group could no longer provide. The event has been canceled.

Capitol Hill has never been for the faint of heart. Now, even more so.Republican Hires of the Week

Lobbying is still bipartisan despite the Democratic takeover of Congress, with senior Republicans in big demand.

Asa Hutchinson, the former Arkansas congressman and undersecretary of homeland security, has returned to the law firm Venable. Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, former spokeswoman for Bush-Cheney '04 and the CIA, was hired by APCO Worldwide. John R. Russell IV, a former aide to ex-House speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), was brought in by Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal.

Womble Carlyle Sandridge & Rice added Tim S. McClain, former general counsel of the Veterans Affairs Department, to help its clients "obtain contracts with the VA and related agencies," a firm spokesman said.

Even all-Republican firms are expanding. Barbour Griffith & Rogers hired Stephen G. Rademaker, an ex-aide to former Senate majority leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), and Philip D. Zelikow, former counselor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Zelikow has for years served as a one-man think tank for Rice, advising her on Iraq and other policies. His role at the lobbying firm is undefined, though he won't be able to represent a foreign government for a year, said Ed Rogers, its chairman. "We'll see what evolves over time," said Rogers, a Zelikow friend.

But being under investigation is an impediment to a lobbying career for anyone, Republican or Democrat. Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles split with former deputy interior secretary J. Steven Griles, who is the target of a corruption probe connected to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.The Gelman Update

Microsoft's deal with the House Democratic leadership is even sweeter than I reported last week. The software giant has loaned Matt Gelman, its chief House lobbyist, to the whip's office.

It turns out that the stint won't be long at all -- just 59 days -- and for a reason. If Gelman were to stay a congressional consultant for 60 days, he would be barred for a year from lobbying the folks he had just assisted.A New Idea

During a recent Web chat on washingtonpost.com, I received a fresh suggestion from out of the blue. Well, actually it came from Indianapolis -- or at least that was the city the correspondent listed.

DOJ_NMG_0120332

Here it is: If you want to jam the revolving door between Congress and the outside world -- and discourage K Street from hiring former congressmen as lobbyists -- then deny a congressional pension to any former lawmaker who registers to lobby. A lawmaker can accept public funds in retirement via his pension, or he can make a living extracting public funds for clients as a lobbyist. But he shouldn't be allowed to do both. Whaddya think?

Clinton Dives In Media Waters (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

With a call to "let the conversation begin," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) fielded a handful of pre-selected questions from voters on her presidential campaign's Web site last night, speaking into a video camera as she held forth on movies ("Out of Africa" makes her top three), her football-fanatic brothers and her "nice middle-class upbringing in a suburb of Chicago."

The effort to "humanize" Clinton, as her advisers have put it, was in full swing just two days into her presidential campaign.

In a carefully controlled setting where inquiries about affordable tuition and health care counted among the tougher topics, she reminisced, in response to a question about Hurricane Katrina, about walking the streets of New Orleans on visits when she and her husband lived in Arkansas. She acknowledged that her position papers on energy policy were too "wonkish" for a Web chat and said she turns to her daughter, Chelsea, for "advice and support in every way."

The online chat came amid what, for Clinton, is a media blitz at the outset of her campaign for president. She appeared on all three major television networks last night, is scheduled to appear on the morning shows today, and will hold two more online discussions on her Web site tonight and tomorrow. This weekend she will head to Iowa, which she has not visited for several years.

In her first public forays, Clinton made little substantive news. In an ABC News interview, she would not pledge not to raise taxes. But she also equivocated on whether the costs of the war in Iraq would require a tax increase. "We're going to have to make some tough decisions," she told interviewer Charles Gibson. "We also don't want to be straitjacketed."

On CBS, she told anchor Katie Couric that voters who doubt her ability to win should reserve judgment. "I would say: Give me a chance," she said. "As a friend of mine said the other day, I'm the most famous woman that nobody knows."

Dressed in the same pastel jacket for all her appearances, Clinton sat on a sofa against a soft backdrop of bookshelves and a yellow curtain for her Web chat. She was joined by her campaign's blogger, Crystal Patterson, who read viewer questions aloud. Almost all of the inquiries were from women, and nearly one-third were from New York. One question was about the role Chelsea Clinton will play in the campaign (unclear, her mom said).

She hedged on her favorite movie, saying that, as a child, she had loved "The Wizard of Oz," only to discover "Casablanca" in college and law school, watching it so often that she memorized the lines. (Her passion for the Meryl Streep-Robert Redford classic "Out of Africa" came later, she said.) But she was clear about her own conviction that she can become president.

Responding to a questioner identified only as Barbara in Massachusetts, who asked what she should tell people who do not think the country is ready for a woman to be president, Clinton said: "I hope you'll tell them we won't know until we try."

On Web, Voters Question Clinton Directly (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton strived for an Oprah moment yesterday night, the third of her presidential campaign, by sitting in a fake living-room set and fielding questions on a live video Webcast about her vote for the Iraq war (if she had known then), universal health care (still wants it) and her favorite movies ("The Wizard of Oz," "Casablanca" and "Out of Africa").

But will she attain Oprah Winfrey's ratings? Advisers could not say how many people watched and took Mrs. Clinton's measure during the appearance — or whether any of them were anyone other than her diehard lovers and her diehard haters.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers say the Webcast demonstrates her determination to speak directly to voters, in as many ways as new technology allows, instead of dealing only with a news media that has sometimes been intensely skeptical of her actions and motives.

DOJ_NMG_0120333

The questions e-mailed from Linda in Pensacola, Fla., and other visitors to the Web site were vetted by Mrs. Clinton's staff and offered or elicited few surprises. Mrs. Clinton sat on a sofa in front of a bookcase looking relaxed as a young aide read questions from a monitor. Her answers suggested various personas that she wants to convey to voters: a hometown girl, a mother, a moviegoer, a churchgoer, a standard-bearer for women and a critic of the war.

She said she was rooting for the Chicago Bears in the Super Bowl, recalling that she grew up in Illinois (a crucial electoral state and the home of Senator Barack Obama, a rival). She spoke lovingly about her daughter, Chelsea.

She described her three favorite movies, linking herself with other Americans who can recite lines from "Casablanca." She told a 14-year-old girl that when she was young she found inspiration by volunteering through her church.

In response to the first question, about what Mrs. Clinton would say to people who wondered whether a woman could be president, she said it was "important that we demonstrate that women are fully capable to serve in the highest levels of government."

With the second question, about whether she regretted her vote on the Iraq war in 2002, the senator repeated her latest explanation, which she also used yesterday night on the network news programs — that if she knew in 2002 what she knows now "I certainly would not have voted" to authorize military action in Iraq.

Clinton In Clear Lead Over Rivals, Says Poll (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

Hillary Clinton has launched her race for the White House with a commanding lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential candidacy, according to an opinion poll published on Sunday.

The New York senator moved quickly to toughen her stance over the war in Iraq as she sought to sharpen her differences with President George W. Bush and fend off a challenge from Barack Obama, the first-term senator for Illinois and her closest rival.

In a Washington Post poll on Sunday, Mrs Clinton was backed by 41 per cent of Democrats questioned, more than double the 17 per cent rating of Mr Obama.

The former first lady is expected to lead the crucial early rounds of fundraising by the crowded field of Democratic aspirants – joined on Sunday by Bill Richardson, the New Mexico governor – in spite of a problematic record on both foreign and domestic policy.

Mrs Clinton called for withdrawal of US troops from Baghdad and an eventual end to the occupation of Iraq, which she backed in 2002 by voting in favour of a resolution authorising an invasion.

She did not have "faith" in Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, as she stayed ahead of her Senate colleagues by backing a binding resolution aimed at stemming the flow of funds to Baghdad.

A separate bipartisan resolution that criticises Mr Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq would be non-binding, while Mrs Clinton's resolution would impose a congressional cap on existing US troop levels.

Her greatest liability on domestic policy is seen as her association with failed healthcare reforms under her husband's presidency.

Healthcare is likely to emerge as a defining issue in the 2008 campaign as the costs of healthcare outstrip inflation and US employers pare back health benefits.

The attention on healthcare is unwelcome for presidential contenders in both parties who are confronted by ideological and fiscal dilemmas in formulating policies to address the problem of uninsured Americans.

But the issue is becoming unavoidable and Mr Bush is expected to use his presidential address tomorrow to introduce legislation that would use tax increases for some workers whose health plans cost more than the national average to fund tax breaks for the uninsured.

Reprise Of 'Hillary Care' (HILL)

By Bob Cusack And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120334

Former President Clinton has signaled privately that his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), will include aggressive healthcare proposals in her campaign for the White House, despite the debacle of what critics labeled "Hillary Care" 14 years ago.

In remarks to Democratic operatives last month, the ex-president caused a buzz by strongly defending the substance of his wife's 1990s plan, claiming it was a moderate, private-sector approach grossly mischaracterized by its critics.

The former president's statements, delivered during a Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) conference at the Charles Hotel in Cambridge, Mass., have been interpreted as signaling that candidate Clinton could revive aspects of her 1993-94 approach that was vilified by Republicans and health-industry groups.

President Clinton pointed out to the group of over 100 Democratic strategists the irony of today's debate on the government's negotiation of prescription-drug prices, saying that was part of "their" plan. The one-hour speech was closed to the press and deemed off the record for those who heard it.

He aggressively attacked the "urban myths" of his administration's plan, rejecting the widespread criticism that it was socialized medicine, according to a person in the room.

The indications are that Sen. Clinton's strategy will be to turn healthcare, a political weakness, into a strength.

"The difference is now for Sen. Clinton that she learned a lot from that experience," said Donna Shalala, who served eight years as secretary of Health and Human Services under President Clinton. "The fact is that she's learned a lot about tactics and a lot about getting things done," said Shalala, who is now president of the University of Miami.

A Democratic healthcare consultant said Sen. Clinton will be vulnerable to attacks again but it would not stop her from tackling the issue head-on.

"She could unveil President Bush's healthcare plan and the Republicans would call it a government takeover of healthcare," the consultant remarked. "People are kind of tired of that rhetoric. … [The GOP] would do that for every presidential candidate who has a 'D' by their name."

It would not work, the consultant predicted, because "if there was ever a more skilled communicator than the Clintons, I haven't seen them."

Judy Feder, professor and dean of the Georgetown Public Policy Institute who ran unsuccessfully against Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) last year, said, "It's a much different time than 1994," adding that the environment for major changes to the nation's healthcare system is "not so poisonous."

The former president's prominence in his wife's campaign will, similarly, be an issue; he was the only one on stage with the senator as she delivered her victory speech after winning reelection on Nov. 7.

The former president told DLC officials that healthcare would be the most important domestic-policy matter of the next election. The Clintons have relied on each other's advice throughout their political careers and that will not change during the senator's White House run, political observers say.

Sen. Clinton is a fundraising machine but has not yet articulated a sound-bite friendly message like former Sen. John Edwards's (D-N.C.) "Two Americas" theme. She is unlikely to base that message on foreign affairs because of her vote for the Iraq war in 2002, which is now unpopular in her party. And she does not want her opponents to own healthcare, an area in which Democrats have traditionally enjoyed huge poll leads over Republicans.

She could use the issue to her advantage, a former Clinton administration official said, because she is "extremely knowledgeable about how the system works."

Shalala agreed, saying, "I believe, knowing Mrs. Clinton, the senator, as well as I do … that no candidate understands healthcare as well as she does." Shalala added, "She also understands the politics."

Said the consultant: "You have less credibility if you haven't been involved in these issues and suddenly you are now. … The public generally thinks that she knows a lot about the system … and that she has something very constructive to offer."

The former official added, "Yes, it's political, but she really cares about it."

Clinton must revisit her failed healthcare initiative soon, and her husband's analysis means she will "not be defensive" about it, said an informed source.

DOJ_NMG_0120335

“She’s going to reject advice to avoid the issue,” the consultant said. “Only people in Washington think that people who have tried and not succeeded shouldn’t try again.”

President Clinton said to DLC attendees that the 1990s plan failed because it was “overwhelmed” by health-insurance industry opposition and its “Harry and Louise” TV ads.

Sen. Clinton may benefit from the fact that business and healthcare sectors have increasingly aligned with organized labor and other Democratically affiliated interests in calling for federal action to address the rising cost of medical care and the growing ranks of uninsured.

Several states are also moving ahead without national healthcare reform. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), another presidential contender, forged a deal with the Democratic-controlled legislature to enact near-universal coverage last year. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) and Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell (D) also recently proposed sweeping reforms.

Presidential candidates from both parties will have to put forward bold healthcare reforms, the former Clinton administration official said, adding, “I think we’re going to have a debate for the next two years. … The 2008 election is going to be a referendum on that debate.”

In announcing her bid for the White House and upcoming Web chats, Clinton said, “… and let’s definitely talk about how every American can have quality, affordable healthcare.”

Clinton’s first appearance after announcing her candidacy was at a Manhattan clinic Sunday, when she pushed for the expansion of the State Children’s Health Insurance Program (SCHIP).

SCHIP authorization expires this year, providing a prime opportunity for presidential candidates to champion the uninsured. Clinton is a member of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee, which will write the SCHIP bill, and has partnered with House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.), who will oversee the drafting of a companion bill. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a leading presidential rival, also sits on the HELP Committee.

President Clinton’s office, the DLC and Sen. Clinton’s campaign did not comment for this article.

Retreat Isn't An Option (WP)

By Liz Cheney

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Sen. Hillary Clinton declared this weekend, " I'm in to win." Anyone who has watched her remarkable trajectory can have no doubt that she'll do whatever it takes to win the presidency. I wish she felt the same way about the war.

In fairness, Clinton, with her proposal for arbitrary caps on troop levels and hemming and hawing about her vote for the war resolution, has company on both sides of the aisle. Sen. Joseph Lieberman is the only national Democrat showing any courage on this issue. We Republicans -- with help from senators such as Chuck Hagel -- seem ready to race the Democrats to the bottom.

I'd like to ask the politicians in both parties who are heading for the hills to stop and reflect on these basic facts:

Â· We are at war. America faces an existential threat. This is not, as Speaker Nancy Pelosi has claimed, a "situation to be solved." It would be nice if we could wake up tomorrow and say, as Sen. Barack Obama suggested at a Jan. 11 hearing, "Enough is enough." Wishing doesn't make it so. We will have to fight these terrorists to the death somewhere, sometime. We can't negotiate with them or "solve" their jihad. If we quit in Iraq now, we must get ready for a harder, longer, more deadly struggle later.

Â· Quitting helps the terrorists. Few politicians want to be known as spokesmen for retreat. Instead we hear such words as "redeployment," "drawdown" or "troop cap." Let's be clear: If we restrict the ability of our troops to fight and win this war, we help the terrorists. Don't take my word for it. Read the plans of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and Ayman Zawahiri to drive America from Iraq, establish a base for al-Qaeda and spread jihad across the Middle East. The terrorists are counting on us to lose our will and retreat under pressure. We're in danger of proving them right.

Â· Beware the polls. In November the American people expressed serious concerns about Iraq (and about Republican corruption and scandals). They did not say that they want us to lose this war. They did not say that they want us to allow Iraq to become a base for al-Qaeda to conduct global terrorist operations. They did not say that they would rather we fight the terrorists here at home. Until you see a poll that asks those questions, don't use election results as an excuse to retreat.

Â· Retreat from Iraq hurts us in the broader war. We are fighting the war on terrorism with allies across the globe, leaders such as Hamid Karzai in Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf in Pakistan. Brave activists are also standing with us, fighting for freedom of speech, freedom of religion, the empowerment of women. They risk their lives every day to defeat the forces of terrorism. They can't win without us, and many of them won't continue to fight if they believe we're abandoning them. Politicians urging America to quit in Iraq should explain how we win the war on terrorism once we've scared all of our allies away.

What about Iran? There is no doubt that an American retreat from Iraq will embolden Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, making it even less likely that the Iranian president will bend to the will of the international community and halt his nuclear weapons program.

A member of Lebanon's parliament recently told me that Lebanese Sunnis, Shiites and Christians are lining up with Iran and Syria to fight against Sunnis, Shiites and Christians who want to stand with America. When I asked him why people were lining up with Iran and Syria, he said, "Because they know Iran and Syria aren't going anyplace. We're not so sure about America."

Â· Our soldiers will win if we let them. Read their blogs. Talk to them. They know that free people must fight to defend their freedom. No force on Earth -- especially not an army of terrorists and insurgents -- can defeat our soldiers militarily. American troops will win if we show even one-tenth the courage here at home that they show every day on the battlefield. And by the way, you cannot wish failure on our soldiers' mission and claim, at the same time, to be supporting the troops. It just doesn't compute.

I suppose Hillary Clinton's announcement was a sign of progress. In 2007, a woman can run for president and show the same level of courage and conviction about this war many of her male colleagues have. Steel in the spine? Not so much.

America deserves better. It's time for everyone -- Republicans and Democrats -- to stop trying to find ways for America to quit. Victory is the only option. We must have the fortitude and the courage to do what it takes. In the words of Winston Churchill, we must deserve victory.

We must be in it to win.

Death Knell May Be Near For Public Election Funds (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The public financing system for presidential campaigns, a post-Watergate initiative hailed for decades as the best way to rid politics of the corrupting influence of money, may have quietly died over the weekend.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York became the first candidate since the program began in 1976 to forgo public financing for both the primary and the general election because of the spending limits that come with the federal money. By declaring her confidence that she could raise far more than the roughly $150 million the system would provide for the 2008 presidential primaries and general election, Mrs. Clinton makes it difficult for other serious candidates to participate in the system without putting themselves at a significant disadvantage.

Officials of the Federal Election Commission and advisers to several campaigns say they expect the two candidates who reach Election Day 2008 will raise more than $500 million apiece. Including money raised by other primary candidates, the total spent on the presidential election could easily exceed $1 billion.

People involved in the Republican primary campaign of Senator John McCain of Arizona say he, too, is beginning to seek private donations for the primary and general elections, albeit with the option of returning them. A longtime proponent of campaign finance change, Mr. McCain has recently removed his name as a co-sponsor of a bill to expand the presidential public financing program.

Former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, another Republican primary contender, has already decided to forgo public financing for the primaries. Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a rival to Mrs. Clinton for the Democratic nomination, declined to comment, as did spokesmen for several other candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0120337

In a sense, Mrs. Clinton was merely confirming what many in Washington already knew: that the public financing system has failed to keep pace with the torrents of money flowing toward the presidential elections. In 2004, President Bush and Senator John Kerry, the Democratic candidate, each opted out of the system for the primaries but not the general election. By accepting the public financing, they had to agree not to raise or spend any private money for the period after their nominating conventions.

But when Mr. Bush raised some $270 million, and Mr. Kerry about $235 million, it became clear that major-party candidates could raise far more from private donors than from the public system.

"The 2008 race will be the longest and most expensive presidential election in American history," said Michael E. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission. "Top-tier candidates are going to have to raise $100 million by the end of 2007 to be a serious candidate." He added: "We are looking at a $100 million entry fee."

The turn away from public financing is the twilight of a system once welcomed as a new era of clean government.

In 1986, a decade after the first publicly financed presidential election, a bipartisan commission headed by Robert Strauss, the former Democratic Party chief, and Melvin R. Laird, the secretary of defense under President Richard M. Nixon, concluded: "Public financing of presidential elections has clearly proved its worth in opening up the process, reducing the influence of individuals and groups, and virtually ending corruption in presidential election finance."

Formed to curb candidates' dependence on big donors without running afoul of Supreme Court rulings protecting political spending as a form of free speech, the system provides taxpayer money for candidates who voluntarily agree to abide by spending limits.

Any primary candidate who raises an initial $100,000 in small donations receives federal money to match the first $250 of each donation. For 2008, candidates could receive matching grants of as much as $25 million for the primary season, grants of about $15 million for a nominating convention and grants of about $83 million for the general election.

The system is financed by taxpayers who check a box on their returns to allocate $3 to an election fund, with about 33 million people a year in recent years directing a total of about $400 million to each quadrennial presidential election.

But the fund has faced chronic shortfalls as the percentage of taxpayers contributing has declined to less than 10 percent last year from over 30 percent in the 1970s. Those who could tap wealthy supporters began looking for ways to outmaneuver it almost from the beginning.

In the 1980 Republican primary, for example, John B. Connally, the former Texas governor, became the first candidate to reject public money and outraise his rivals, but his candidacy failed to catch on.

By the mid-1980s, candidates and donors were circumventing the spending limits by raising unlimited "soft money" donations to party committees from corporations, unions and wealthy individuals. The party committees used the money to help support a candidate's presidential campaign or to attack his opponent.

In 2002, Congress changed the campaign finance laws to ban soft money contributions to party committees, and donors turned instead to so-called 527 groups, which could still spend unlimited contributions.

By 2000, two Republican candidates, the billionaire Steve Forbes and Mr. Bush, had turned down public money for the primary campaign. Mr. Bush became the first major-party nominee to do so. And in 2004, for the first time, both the Democratic and the Republican nominees turned down public financing for the primaries.

For Mrs. Clinton and other 2008 candidates, deciding this early to turn down public financing means that she can immediately begin building two war chests, one for the primary and one for the general election. Candidates can raise twice as much from each individual donor: $2,100 for the primary and $2,100 for the general, for a total of $4,200.

It also means that the presidential candidates will be more beholden than ever to the so-called bundlers, often lobbyists, who solicit donations to present to campaigns in a lump sum. In 2004, President Bush honored his biggest bundlers by calling them Pioneers and Rangers who raised $100,000 or $200,000, respectively.

Beginning with the first quarterly disclosure of presidential campaign finances, due at the end of April, candidates can show off their cash on hand as a deterrent to competitors. Mrs. Clinton, who faces doubts among some Democratic primary voters about whether she can win the general election, may be able to point to her general election fund-raising as evidence of her strength.

DOJ_NMG_0120338

Candidates who wait until 2008 to start raising contributions for the general election may be starting too late to catch up. In 2004, for example, Mr. Kerry demonstrated during the primaries that he could raise far more money than public financing provided. But by the time he had won the nomination it was too late to raise private money to compete in the general election, and he relied instead on public financing.

On Monday, a spokesman for Mr. Kerry, who is weighing another presidential bid, said, "It's smart for Democrats to keep their options open."

Mr. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, said he expected that even if the major candidates bypassed the election fund, the money would still be used by dark horses. Any hypothetical surplus would remain in the fund, he said.

Lawmakers in both chambers of Congress have proposed legislation to revamp and expand the presidential primary financing system, but the ideas have not gained much traction in recent years. Phil Singer, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said she would support "modernizing" the system.

Spokesmen for the Democratic leaders of both chambers say they like the idea. But Republicans are wary. "The most massive poll ever taken on any subject is taken on the subject of using tax dollars for political campaigns," Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Senate Republican leader, said in a statement.

"That poll is taken every April 15 on our tax return," he said, referring to the voluntary check-off. "About 10 percent of Americans choose to participate; 90 percent choose not to."

Charles E. M. Kolb, president of the Committee for Economic Development, a business group that advocates for election laws, said, "It may take a collapse of the system in order to build it back up."

For now, Mr. Kolb added, "obituary may be the right word."

Clinton Bid Heralds Demise Of Public Financing (WP)

By Dan Balz And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The public financing system designed to clean up presidential campaigns in the wake of the Watergate scandal may have died on Saturday when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) announced her bid for the White House.

Little noticed amid the announcement rollout was a page on her Web site in which she asked potential contributors to give her campaign checks of up to $4,200. That figure signaled not only that she plans to forgo public funds for primary season but also that, if she becomes the nominee, she will not take public money for the general election.

By opting out of the system, Clinton will be able to spend as much money as she can raise, both for the primaries and for the general election, rather than being forced to abide by strict spending limits imposed by the Federal Election Commission on candidates who accept public financing.

Others have opted out of public financing for the nomination campaigns, but Clinton is the first since the current structure was created in 1974 to declare she will forgo public financing in the general election as well.

Clinton's decision will put pressure on other candidates in both parties to follow suit, and if they do, the 2008 campaign will complete what has been the rapid disintegration of a system designed to rein in unlimited spending in presidential campaigns.

One effect is to put lesser-known candidates at a further disadvantage in competing with rivals who have the capacity to raise huge amounts of money.

"It's going to be a tremendous test of whether this system survives," Robert Lenhard, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, said of the pressure building on the existing system. Michael Toner, his predecessor, was less restrained. This election, he predicted, will be "basically the death" of public financing.

Under the current system, candidates raise money for the nomination battle and can qualify for public funds. For the general election, however, the federal government underwrites the entire cost of the campaign but limits candidate spending to a fixed amount, meaning the nominees have never raised money for that part of the campaign. By starting to raise funds for both the primary and general elections, Clinton made it clear she plans to opt out of the entire system.

The 2008 campaign will be the most expensive in history. Candidates may be raising $2 million a week or more between now and early next year, and the eventual nominees of both parties will raise tens of millions between the time they clinch the nomination and the national conventions in late summer 2008.

Clinton is one of several candidates believed to have the capacity to finance their entire campaigns without any federal money, along with Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). A campaign plan for former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani indicated he would try to raise $100 million by early next year to win the nomination. Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R) attracted contributions and pledges worth $6.5 million in one day earlier this month.

President Bush built the new primary-season system in the past two campaigns, designating his most prodigious fundraisers -- those who raised $100,000 or $200,000 -- Pioneers and Rangers. The trend gives greater influence to wealthy fundraisers who can tap rich friends.

Campaigns are learning to tap into smaller contributors using the Internet, but Meredith McGehee, policy director at the Campaign Legal Center, said the breakdown of the system ultimately will put more distance between politicians and the people they are seeking to represent. "The pool of people that you're going to to finance the presidential election, the very nature of that pool of people is changing, and it's changing for the worse," she said.

A Clinton campaign official, defending her decision to opt out of all public financing, said the escalating cost of campaigns makes it difficult to stay within the current limits. "These dramatic increases make it clear that the current public financing system is in need of an update," said campaign spokesman Phil Singer, "and Senator Clinton would support modernizing it."

Among the presidential candidates, McCain has long championed the importance of campaign finance laws. Yesterday, his spokesman, Danny Diaz, said the senator thinks the current public finance system "is not fulfilling its original goal" and is also contemplating opting out.

The Watergate scandal helped produce a new system for financing campaigns, one that established limits on individual contributions to presidential candidates and disclosure requirements for campaigns to provide greater transparency about how money is raised and spent.

That system provided a carrot and stick for candidates designed to limit spending. For the primary season, the federal government agreed to match the first $250 of any individual contribution. In return, candidates agree to abide by strict state-by-state and overall spending limits during their nomination campaigns.

The system began to break down in 2000, when Bush decided to give up federal matching funds during his campaign for the nomination. That allowed him to raise and spend as much money as he could to win the nomination -- putting his rivals at a distinct disadvantage. He raised almost $100 million, breaking all previous records.

In 2004, Democrats John F. Kerry and Howard Dean joined Bush in opting out of public financing for the primaries. Bush and Kerry, the two nominees, both swamped Bush's 2000 campaign spending record. Kerry raised almost $235 million, Bush $270 million.

Both, however, chose to accept more than $80 million in public funds for their general election campaigns, though Kerry gave serious consideration to opting out. Few experts believe that either nominee will remain within the public financing system in 2008.

The system has broken down for several reasons, including the growing length of campaigns and escalating costs, especially for television advertising.

Public financing for the general election was designed to create a level playing field for the two nominees and relieve candidates of the need to raise money during the final months of the campaign. But candidates still see imbalances that can favor the party that holds the later convention, and the costs of both television and state-by-state organizations have strained what seem like generous allotments from the federal government.

Under new threshold limits adopted yesterday, individuals will be able to contribute up to $2,300 to a presidential candidate for the primaries and up to $2,300 for the general election. The limits are similar to those governing candidates for the House and Senate, but there is no public financing component for congressional candidates.

Clinton now will be raising money simultaneously for the presidential primaries and a possible general election campaign. Under federal rules, money for the general election cannot be spent until the candidate secures the nomination. If the candidate fails to win the nomination, the money must be returned.

Her campaign has another wrinkle in its fundraising plan. Like others before her, Clinton will have a group of big-time fundraisers tap their networks to help assemble hundreds of thousands of dollars for the campaign. But she also is recruiting what the campaign calls "Hillraisers."

Supporters can set up accounts on their Web sites and encourage friends to contribute to Clinton's campaign. Those contributions will be credited to the Hillraiser's account, and the campaign Web site will maintain a running total of how much each person produces.

Clinton To Bypass Public Funds For Bid (AP)

By Marc Humbert

AP, January 23, 2007

White House hopeful Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton will not accept public campaign financing for either the Democratic primaries or, if she wins the nomination, the general election campaign.

Clinton's decision had been widely expected given her and her husband's proven ability to raise vast sums of money quickly. Her advisers have not disputed estimates that she will raise $100 million or more before the year is out.

The New York senator already has more than $14 million in the bank, money left from her successful re-election campaign last year. The funds can be spent on her presidential bid.

While both President Bush and Democratic challenger John Kerry rejected public funding for their primary campaigns in 2004, they did accept $74.5 million each for the general election campaign. The funding for the general election was expected to reach $85 million for the major party candidates in 2008.

Analysts had been predicting that the major candidates for 2008 would reject the public financing option for both primaries and the general election because of the growing cost of competing. Not accepting public financing allows candidates to keep raising and spending as much as they want.

Clinton becomes the first of the top-tier candidates to announce the rejection of public financing.

"Both presidential nominees opted out of the public financing system in 2004 because the cost of running a modern campaign has gotten so expensive," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Clinton campaign. "These dramatic increases make it clear that the current public financing system is in need of an update and Senator Clinton would support modernizing it."

Strategists from both parties had estimated last year that the 2008 race could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund could afford. It is financed through the $3 checkoff on federal income tax returns.

The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money.

Big Bucks Needed To Wage Presidential Campaign (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Iowa caucuses that kick off the presidential campaign are nearly a year away. For the most viable contenders, make that one year and $100 million away.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has that capacity, and other contenders believe that they do as well.

To wage a serious presidential campaign in 2008, the ante is $50 million raised by Dec. 31 of this year, said one adviser to Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). And that is just to get a place at the table.

Those are daunting figures. To make the $100 million mark in a year, a candidate must bring in an average of nearly $2 million a week. That's $274,000 a day, including Sundays and holidays, all of it raised in increments legally limited to no more than $2,100 per person.

DOJ_NMG_0120341

Start late or fall behind and the remaining burden increases. "Every single day, the biggest part of your day is fundraising. Fundraising is going to take up more of your time than sleep if you're a candidate," said Democratic strategist Tad Devine, who advised presidential nominee Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004.

Clinton and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson joined in the competition for campaign money last weekend, announcing their own presidential exploratory committees less than a week after Obama entered the race, highlighting the importance of the intense competition for campaign funds.

On the Republican side, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas entered the race, part of a surge of early announcements that strategists attribute to a rush to raise campaign funds.

In this election, candidates will court well-heeled, well-connected supporters who can bring in hundreds of thousands of dollars from wealthy friends and business contacts. They will commute back and forth among New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Palm Beach, Fla., and other money centers for mammoth events that in some cases may raise $1 million or more in an evening. They will hone sophisticated marketing campaigns that use Internet sites, web videos and e-mail to galvanize large followings of dedicated supporters whose modest individual contributions can add up to staggering sums.

Federal Election Commission member Michael Toner predicted "an unprecedented fundraising sprint during the first six months of this year, with candidates raising up to $50 million to $60 million by the end of June and $100 million by the end of the year."

Presidential election campaigns regularly set records for their cost. But this time there is an extraordinary confluence of forces that most political professionals believe will drive the costs of the early primary campaigns especially high.

The primary schedule is highly front-loaded. In the Democratic Party, contests are tentatively scheduled in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina within a 15-day span next January.

So instead of the traditional focus on Iowa and New Hampshire, most top-tier candidates are expected to mount early full-fledged campaigns in all four states, with costly field operations, television advertising and travel back and forth among more locations. Moreover, because the contests are so close together on the calendar, there is less time to use a strong showing in one state to raise money for the campaigns in the others.

At the same time, the field of candidates is unusually crowded in both parties, with no incumbent president or vice president running for the first time since 1952, creating an open field. With such a large pack of candidates, a big campaign treasury demonstrates political strength that helps a candidate gain attention from the media and voters. And money also provides the means for a candidate's message to be heard above the din.

"You're not the only person competing for voters' attention, so you're going to have to be louder, more provocative, more consistent in your message and that's going to cost a lot of money," said Chip Smith, deputy campaign manager for Democratic presidential candidate Al Gore in 2000.

Add to that the wholesale defections of presidential candidates from a voluntary public financing system that previously had set strict limits on campaign spending for primaries in exchange for federal matching funds. Those candidates who choose to accept public financing, which provides matching payments for the first $250 of each individual contribution, will be limited to spending slightly over $40 million in their campaigns for the 2008 nomination and also must abide by state-by-state spending limits that inhibit the resources they can devote to crucial early primaries and caucuses.

George W. Bush opted out of the public financing system during the primaries in 2000 and went on to win the Republican nomination and the presidency. Kerry and Howard Dean declined public financing for the 2004 primaries and went on to lead the Democratic field that year.

Clinton already has declared she will forgo public financing in both the primary and general election campaigns to avoid the spending limits. Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson cited "the rising cost of campaigns."

Most campaign consultants now believe the public financing system places crippling limits on a presidential primary campaign and do not expect the leading candidates to accept matching funds.

"Essentially, the lid's been blown off on the scheme of funding," Devine said. "And when there's no roof, the altitude can be extreme."

DOJ_NMG_0120342

Most candidates and campaign advisers deliberately play down expectations for fundraising, anxious to avoid perceptions that their campaigns are under-performing should they fall short.

But a confidential campaign strategy memo prepared for former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who is considering a run for the Republican nomination, leaked to the media recently and offered an inside glimpse of his fundraising plans. His advisers calculated he would need to raise $100 million by Dec. 31 of 2007. Likewise, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who has created an exploratory committee for a presidential run, has set a goal of $100 million by the end of 2007.

Clinton starts with more than $14 million left over from her Senate campaign last year that she can transfer directly to her presidential campaign. That, noted one Democratic strategist, "is a considerable down payment toward $100 million."

Clinton also can draw on the kind of formidable fundraising base normally associated with an incumbent president. She and her husband have been cultivating key Democratic fundraisers and donors since before Bill Clinton's election as president in 1992, and the former first lady has accrued plenty of political and social IOUs. She has in her husband a surrogate with almost unmatched appeal to party donors. And in the Senate, she has represented the nation's most important financial center for more than six years.

Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), a presidential primary candidate and vice presidential nominee in 2004, built his funding base for his last campaign and has had plenty of time to nurture it for his current presidential run.

In order to compete, Obama and other candidates have to rapidly assemble their own fundraising networks, filled with the kind of people willing and able to ask friends for big-dollar donations and serve on the host committees that make sure that $2,100-a-seat fundraising dinners are sold out. It often takes plenty of personal attention from a candidate in advance to nurture that kind of commitment.

"Even if you're Barack Obama or John McCain, you can't just show up in Los Angeles," said Monica Notzon, a Republican fundraiser. "There is a whole bunch of legwork they hopefully have done already."

On the strength of his electrifying speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention, a compelling biography and his personal presence, Obama already has attracted an extraordinarily influential group of financial backers.

Billionaire investor Warren Buffett and Hollywood moguls Jeffrey Katzenberg, David Geffen and Steven Spielberg are among past supporters of Obama's political action committee, Hopefund. Billionaire philanthropist George Soros, an early supporter of Obama's U.S. Senate bid and Hopefund donor, demonstrated his backing for the presidential campaign by sending the maximum legal contribution—$2,100—within hours of Obama's announcement, Soros spokesman Michael Vachon said.

These high profile donors are helpful because they also bring with them potential networks of additional contributors. Corporations are prohibited from donating directly to campaigns; only individuals and political action committees can give candidates contributions.

The Internet opens the potential for a flood of additional money, particularly for a candidate who can generate excitement because of his personality or a cause.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) took in a surge of money after winning the 2000 New Hampshire primary and setting a style embodied by the name of his campaign bus, "Straight Talk Express." With his anti-war crusade, Dean attracted legions of givers through his Web site, bringing in more than $30 million from small-dollar donors who contributed no more than $200 each.

Broad-band Internet access is now much more common. And people have grown accustomed through electronic commerce to entering their credit numbers on a Web site and spending money with the click of a mouse. So most political strategists believe the potential for raising money through the web is even greater now.

"The real thing to watch is who's going to electrify the low-dollar donors," Smith said. "You can get to $40 million or $50 million very quickly."

Hillary Takes A Pass (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Congratulations to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for acknowledging right from the start that she won't accept public money for her White House bid. Now if she'd only admit how much the current fund-raising rules hurt her competitors.

DOJ_NMG_0120343

Top-tier or wealthy candidates have been forgoing public financing for the Presidential primaries for some time because it limits their spending ability. Steve Forbes shunned it in 1996, as did he and George W. Bush in 2000. Howard Dean, John Kerry and President Bush all refused public funds in the 2004 primaries. But now Senator Clinton says that if she wins the Democratic nomination, she will be the first to forgo taxpayer funding in the general election as well.

Congress enacted a public financing law for Presidential candidates beginning with the 1976 election. Taxpayers fund the system by checking off a box on their income tax form. In return for receiving public funds -- which are expected to total around $84 million in 2008 -- a candidate agrees to limit private-fund raising and overall campaign spending. The claim, then and since, has been that this will limit the influence of special interests and make Presidential contests more competitive.

The reality is close to the opposite. The system now benefits mainly well-known and well-heeled candidates and thus limits political competition. Serious Presidential contenders like Senator John McCain and Mrs. Clinton begin the race with greater name recognition, long donor lists and the ability to garner far more media attention.

Their lesser-known challengers have to claw for every $2,000 individual contribution, and then they are limited in how much they can spend. Long gone are the days when a few rich backers could elevate an unknown with a cause -- antiwar Eugene McCarthy in 1968 -- by writing big checks. Instead, you have to be a gazillionaire yourself, or be a famous Senator or have a last name of Bush or Clinton. One irony of the 2008 race is that popular former Governors such as Tom Vilsack and Mike Huckabee probably can't raise enough cash to be competitive, but New York City Mayor Mike Bloomberg might be able to make waves next year as an Independent because he's a multibillionaire.

As for special interests, those handful of rich donors in the past could at least be identified and their interests put on the record. Now the candidates have to bow to interest-group lobbies that can "bundle" contributions (trial lawyers) or provide in-kind support. Does anyone really believe that John Kerry's decision to accept public funds in the 2004 general election made him immune to the pleadings of Big Labor, the trial bar and other liberal groups? Or that Mrs. Clinton's decision to spurn public financing will make her any less accountable to voters if she wins?

Speaking of which, the public these days doesn't think much of the current election financing scheme. Fewer than 10% of taxpayers want a portion of their tax dollars siphoned off for political purposes. Perhaps voters are more sophisticated than campaign-finance "reformers" give them credit for being. Or perhaps taxpayers understand that limiting the pool of candidates competing for the most powerful job in the world is a really bad idea.

Clinton And Obama Campaigners Trade Insults (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

The Democratic party's presidential campaign got into full swing on Monday with campaign staff for Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton already indulging in sniping contests over the relative merits of their candidates.

Campaign workers for Mrs Clinton, who on Monday signed the papers to set up a presidential exploratory committee – the first step before declaring a formal candidacy – made indirect attacks on the relative inexperience of Mr Obama, who entered the race a week ago.

Democratic consultants said the campaign, which already includes five other candidates, most notably John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice-presidential candidate, was shaping up to be the most intense and long-running in the party's history.

Polls show Mrs Clinton leading by a wide margin among registered Democrats. "Hillary's Democratic primary support is climbing while others are stalled or falling," wrote Mark Penn, Mrs Clinton's chief pollster, in a memo. "She is not just strong, but the strongest in the field."

Joe Trippi, who was campaign manager for Howard Dean, who almost took the 2004 Democratic nomination, said both Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton had been bounced into declaring their candidacies early by the strength of the other's campaign.

George Soros, the New York-based billionaire, declared his support for Mr Obama the moment the first-term senator from Illinois signed the papers last week. Mr Soros, who has been one of the most generous supporters of Democratic campaigns in recent years, gave Mr Obama the maximum permitted individual donation.

"Both camps were watching the other sign up big-name donors in each other's cities [Chicago and New York] and realised there was no time to lose," said Mr Trippi, who is credited with running the most sophisticated internet campaign of its day.

On Monday night, Mrs Clinton kicked off what she said would be a running national "conversation" with voters via video weblink "about the direction our country is taking". At the weekend Mrs Clinton will make her first visit to Iowa, the venue of an early caucus in the Democratic nomination early next year, where John Edwards is already the front-runner. Mr Obama is ahead of Mrs Clinton in New Hampshire, the site of the first Democratic primary.

All three leading candidates are planning to launch extensive online operations to build campaign "netroots", which is considered important to their prospects. Mr Trippi, whose 2004 Howard Dean campaign attracted 650,000 internet supporters, says this time each will register millions.

"This is a completely different moment to 2004," he said. "Then we didn't have nearly as many blogs, we didn't have YouTube, or MySpace. It is a safe bet that one of these candidates will be derailed by some obscure video recording on a cellphone that will be posted on the web."

But the most intense competition between the candidates is likely to pivot around their Iraq war stances. Mrs Clinton, who last week returned from a visit to Iraq with a plan to launch a congressional resolution to "freeze" the number of US forces there at the January 1 level of 132,000, is probably the most vulnerable.

Having voted in favour of the war in 2002, Mrs Clinton has the most ground to make up among the party's liberal base. Mr Edwards also voted in favour but has since recanted. Mr Obama always opposed the war.

Headmaster Disputes Claim That Obama Attended Islamic School (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Fresh doubt was cast yesterday on a magazine's allegation that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) attended a madrassah, or religious school that teaches a fundamentalist version of Islam.

Hardi Priyono, deputy headmaster of the Basuki school in Indonesia, told CNN that his institution -- which Obama attended four decades ago, beginning when he was 6 -- is not a madrassah.

"This is a public school," Priyono told CNN correspondent John Vause in Jakarta. "We don't focus on religion." Classes in Islam are offered to the predominantly Muslim students at the school, CNN reported.

Insight, a weekly Internet magazine owned by the conservative Washington Times, had reported the madrassah allegation late last week and added, citing unnamed sources, that the information had been unearthed by researchers close to the campaign of Obama's rival for the Democratic presidential nomination Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. In an online posting, Insight called yesterday's Washington Post article on the controversy a "hit piece" by the "liberal media establishment."

While not addressing the veracity of the madrassah allegation, the magazine said it had contacted the Obama camp, which declined to comment.

"Insight's story was not thinly sourced," the posting said. "Our reporter's sources close to the Clinton opposition research war room confirm the truth of the story. The Clinton camp's denial has as much credibility as the 'I never had sex with that woman' statement."

Spokesmen for Obama and Clinton called the Insight story absurd. Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs yesterday criticized Fox News for picking up the allegations, saying of the network's slogan: "It would be nice if 'fair and balanced' included some actual journalism once in a while." A Clinton spokesman, Howard Wolfson, said yesterday that "comments like this prove the point: This is a biased publication with no discernible journalistic standards."

Fox says two of its programs merely took note of what Insight had reported. The morning show "Fox & Friends" aired a clarification yesterday, reporting that Obama's camp had called the story "completely ridiculous" and that "the Clinton camp has said, 'We had nothing to do with that.' "

Obama-mania May Backfire (CSM)

By Dante Chinni

DOJ_NMG_0120345

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

Unless you were stranded on a desert island last week, you probably know that Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois announced he is officially considering possibly running for president in an election almost two years away.

It wasn't exactly a shocking development, but it made big headlines. Last Tuesday, the day Senator Obama posted the video on his website announcing that he had created an exploratory committee – his intention to consider his intentions – cable news spent much of the day discussing the announcement.

In fact, there was so much coverage of the senator's statement that between Tuesday and Sunday last week the word "Obama" got 14,800 hits on a search of Google News. That was more than 10 times as many hits received over the same period for the terms "Iraq" and "34,452" – the UN's estimate last week of the number of Iraqi civilian deaths since the war there began.

Of course, last week's other big entry in the 2008 race, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) of New York, scored slightly more coverage in the period with 15,300 hits, but Senator Clinton legitimately made history with her entry – the first time the spouse of a former president has sought the White House.

While Clinton has served an entire term in the Senate, Obama is just two years into his first term and has a slight track record.

Yes, Obama's life story – father from Kenya, mother from Kansas – makes for compelling copy. But at this point in American political history, an African-American running for president isn't new. Shirley Chisholm ran back in 1972. Jesse Jackson made an especially strong run in 1988. A 2004 contender, Al Sharpton, recently said he may run again, though that announcement drew less media interest.

So what is it about Obama that has the press's pens scribbling and cameras flashing?

Well, the senator's media talents are formidable: He is smooth and natural on camera and is an engrossing speaker. And he is generating real excitement with voters. His 2004 convention speech is still talked about. And his recent visit to New Hampshire drew huge crowds.

Ironically, however, a big reason for the press's fascination with him is that he is almost as much a mystery to the media as he is to the public. He has no lengthy public record we in the media can go back and study, as is the case with most senators – including Clinton – or governors. Other than his two years in the Senate, his political experience consists of seven years in the Illinois Senate. He has no previous big, close campaigns we can look at to see what he did in a pinch. He is as fresh and new to most of us as he is to you.

As much as people like to talk about "the media" as though "it" is a monolith, they are complex organisms made up of people – people that have ideas about the issues and personalities they cover. Years of covering politicians and the electorate leads many reporters to think that a certain kind of person may be the right kind of person to fix the problems and run the country.

It's less a Democrat or Republican issue than it is a type-of-person issue. The press gravitates toward well-educated moderates who talk about a third way or new paradigm in politics. In 2000, it was Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona and his Straight Talk Express that captured attention.

For many in the media, Obama is a candidate to get excited about because he holds the promise of being interesting, different, and able to shake up Washington.

And that means Obama-mania will probably be alive and well in the press for at least a few more months. But at some point that lack of a long public history could present some problems for the senator.

Inevitably the "Who is Barack Obama?" stories will come – pseudo-psychological pieces that will put the senator on the couch. They will, as they most always do, look for "key moments" from his life to draw a picture. And what will they find?

Obama's short time in office means that image will be crafted probably even more than usual from old friends, old tales, and old pieces of writing. Those things may or may not have real significance – and may or may not be flattering – but are easy to draw from and more difficult to rebut.

Right now, Obama enjoys a sweet story line. But at some point, the media will be eager to fill in the missing pages. And when they do, Obama may find that his biggest strength with the media has its problems.

Never Too Early For Pollsters (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Let the hypotheticals begin. Conventional wisdom may say Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is the Democrats' prohibitive front-runner. But a Newsweek poll released over the weekend, which otherwise shows the candidates tightly bunched, indicates that former Senator John Edwards, below, is the only one to beat the top two potential Republican candidates in head-to-head matchups. The poll shows that Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina, Mrs. Clinton and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois all would beat Senator John McCain of Arizona by a few percentage points. But Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, would narrowly defeat Senators Clinton and Obama while losing to Mr. Edwards, 45 percent to 48 percent. But the numbers are all close and fall within the poll's margin of sampling error of plus or minus four percentage points.

The matchups, in percentages:

Edwards 48, McCain 43

Clinton 48, McCain 47

Obama 46, McCain 44

Edwards 48, Giuliani 45

Giuliani 48, Clinton 47

Giuliani 47, Obama 45

Experienced Dodd Toils To Win Notice In '08 Bid (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- At her first public event after declaring for president last weekend, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton drew a horde of cameras and reporters. For months before Illinois Sen. Barack Obama got into the 2008 race, fire marshals were turning fans away from his packed houses.

Meanwhile, another Democratic hopeful, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, travels the country, a year before the first nominating votes, "hoping someone will show up," he quips.

Mr. Dodd's experiences are typical of the early days of a presidential campaign, which often are humbling, even demeaning, for all but the rare Clinton-like celebrities and Obama-like phenomenons. His colleague Mr. Obama has been a senator for two years. Mrs. Clinton is starting her second term. Mr. Dodd has been in the Senate for more than a quarter-century and was in the House for six years before that. He is chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. And he is an asterisk in early 2008 presidential polls.

Yet ask many Democratic activists whom they'd personally most like to see as president, and Mr. Dodd's name comes up often -- including from some committed to other candidates, notably Mrs. Clinton. Frequently described as witty, smart, and one of the most qualified figures in the party, Mr. Dodd enjoys goodwill beyond Washington from his mid-1990s stint as national party chairman.

At the same time, few of these Democrats have been pressing him to run. With voters as disgusted by Washington's partisan games as at any period in recent memory and seemingly hungry for a fresh face, a man who has been in Congress for a third of a century would be a hard sell, Democrats say. So would a New England liberal, even one with a business-friendly record who has tangled with one of his party's most powerful interests, trial lawyers.

Meanwhile, the competition includes the first viable female, African-American and Hispanic (New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson) candidates, each of whom excites segments of the liberal Democratic base by the history-making potential.

Donna Brazile, Al Gore's 2000 campaign manager, who is neutral in the 2008 contest, says of Mr. Dodd, "He's like everybody's big brother. He's down-to-earth yet engaged in the nitty-gritty." But, she adds, "personally, I sometimes wish he'd just stay in the Senate. In a field that contains so many rockstars, I don't see how Dodd will take a slice of the electorate."

"I don't have any illusions about it," Mr. Dodd says, acknowledging his underdog status. But, he adds, "The most important compass is your own."

DOJ_NMG_0120347

The son of a senator who was a prosecutor at the Nuremberg Nazi war-crimes trials, and himself a Peace Corps volunteer in the Dominican Republic at 22, Mr. Dodd says he no longer can stay in the Senate "bleachers" with the country so tarnished in the eyes of the world. "I'm not afraid of using military force," he says, but the force of America's ideals around the globe have been squandered under the Bush administration. "I've got to try -- at this time -- because the nation's situation is too worrisome to me."

In politics, it is a truism that timing is everything. Yet politicians have their own clocks, as the contrast between the silver-haired, 62-year-old senator and the 45-year-old Mr. Obama suggests. Mr. Obama has said he didn't intend to run; the outpouring last fall at book-signings for his second bestseller, and the emergence of an Internet draft, spurred advisers to tell Mr. Obama he had to seize the moment.

Mr. Dodd, on the other hand, has been on the political scene so long that he can recall when one of his young campaign drivers was Mark Warner, who went on to be Virginia's governor and last year explored a presidential campaign himself -- before deciding this wasn't his time. Likewise, Mr. Dodd has weighed and ruled out presidential bids before, as evidenced by eBay's recent offer of an old campaign button featuring a dark-haired Dodd. In the past, he says, he believed being single was a liability, especially given something of a playboy image; or he had to defer when fellow Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman was running, or his Washington experience was a disqualifier in years voters preferred outsiders.

Now Mr. Dodd is married, the father of two young daughters. And despite the current "Obama-mania" for his less-seasoned colleague, Mr. Dodd argues that with the nation roiled by war, terrorism and economic globalization, he can persuade voters that his experience is an asset. "Certainly the last six years has reminded people that maybe, maybe, experience has value -- not that anyone's ever really ready for this job," Mr. Dodd says.

Having voted in 2002 to authorize President Bush to use force against Iraq, he now says Congress and the nation were misled. Last week, he proposed legislation to block Mr. Bush from sending more troops without new congressional authorization. As it happened, the media's focus that day was on the antiwar moves of his Democratic rivals, Sens. Clinton, Obama and Joe Biden of Delaware. Mr. Biden has been a senator even longer than Mr. Dodd -- since 1973 -- and faces some of the same doubts as he runs for president. But as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, his foreign policy pronouncements grab greater attention.

Mr. Dodd ranks just under Mr. Biden on that committee and has been prominent in foreign-policy debates for two decades; in the 1980s, he was a main target for Republicans' attacks as he came to define the Democratic opposition to the Reagan administration's interventions in Central America's conflicts. He knows numerous world leaders and met with those in Iraq, Syria, Jordan and Israel last month.

The liberal gets credit for popular laws for workers' family and medical leave, child care and Head Start, and testing of prescription drugs for children. Yet he has a moderate record on business issues, reflecting Connecticut's corporate presence.

In 1995 and 1996, the same years he was serving as President Clinton's chairman of the Democratic Party, in the Senate Mr. Dodd was chief sponsor of two business measures that drew Mr. Clinton's vetoes, and the wrath of his party's special interests. The first was a bill to limit securities lawsuits that high-technology companies wanted, and trial lawyers didn't; Mr. Dodd got Congress to override that Clinton veto. The second was a bill restricting product-liability suits, also opposed by trial lawyers; Mr. Clinton's veto stood.

Senators Don't Have Lock On 2008 Campaign (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, January 23, 2007

The last time the political stars lined up like this was in 1920. In that year's presidential contest, the nation was licking its wounds from a bruising war, and many Americans were angered by outgoing President Woodrow Wilson's attempt to turn that fight into a crusade to spread democracy around the globe.

Neither Wilson — who was ailing and had served two terms — nor his vice president, Thomas Marshall, sought the presidency in 1920. That lack of an incumbent candidate and the nation's obsession with foreign policy issues propelled Ohio Sen. Warren Harding into the White House.

"America's present need is not heroics, but healing; not nostrums, but normalcy … not submergence in internationality, but sustainment in triumphant nationality," Harding said before winning a landslide victory.

Not surprisingly, with neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney seeking the presidency next year, and foreign policy again the cause of great discontent, a growing number of senators are lining up for the job. And journalists are treating them as though they have the inside track.

Newsweek magazine ran pictures of Democratic senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York on its cover earlier this month with the headline, "The Race is On." Clinton launched her presidential campaign last week, and Obama is scheduled to officially announce his White House run next month.

Also this month, The Wall Street Journal reported that Sportsbook.com has made Arizona Sen. John McCain the odds-on favorite to win the GOP presidential nomination, even though he trails former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani in a recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. But it's too soon to turn this campaign into a senatorial foot race.

"I wouldn't discount the prospect of a governor, or Mayor Giuliani, winning the presidency," said Meena Bose, a presidential scholar at Hofstra University. "Governors bring executive experience" to a White House campaign, which is something that shouldn't be overlooked, she said.

"It's a lot easier to attack a senator who has a voting record," said Jamie McKown, professor of government and policy at the College of the Atlantic in Bar Harbor, Maine. "Opponents of a senator who is running for president can make an issue of their voting record, which is often not easy to defend."

Remember 2004 Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry's fumble in answering how he voted on a military funding bill? "I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it," he said. His more expansive answer never caught up with that sound bite.

Governors usually don't bring that kind of baggage into a presidential campaign. That may explain why, of the 19 men who have held the office since the beginning of the 20th century, nine went from the statehouse to the White House, but only two came directly from the Senate.

In the current campaign, there's no shortage of governors who have entered — or are poised to enter — the race. Among Democrats, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack have thrown their hats in the ring. And three Republicans who recently left their statehouse jobs — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, and George Pataki of New York — have set up exploratory committees.

Don't let the pundits and the early polls fool you. One of these governors could turn out to be a dark horse candidate, especially if Clinton and Obama split the Democratic Party's liberal base during the primary elections.

And if McCain is upended by his support of Bush's decision to send more troops into Iraq, and Giuliani's liberal stance on social issues generates a backlash among right-wing Republicans, the GOP may end up with a governor at the head of its presidential ticket.

This much is certain: It's much too early to treat next year's presidential election like a graduation exercise for the U.S. Senate.

Here, There And In Iowa (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

One of the striking things about the 2008 presidential campaign is the number of stages it is being played on at once. Take today in Washington, for example, where things will be happening on two fronts. The afternoon brings a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, a platform that could display the sharply contrasting views on Iraq of Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. The evening brings the president's State of the Union address, which many Democrats — notably Mrs. Clinton — view as providing an opportunity to tee off to advance their own presidential campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0120349

For the rest of the week, attention in the Senate will be focused on resolutions critical of President Bush's Iraq policy, giving a platform to other presidential hopefuls, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois, Joseph R. Biden of Delaware, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a Republican who is considering running. Antiwar activists are planning a big demonstration in Washington on Saturday, an event that could provide the candidates another gauge of public sentiment against the war.

But the action is not limited to Washington. At week's end, Mrs. Clinton is making her first trip to Iowa since creating her presidential exploratory committee; it seems fair to surmise that this will not be the kind of small living-room chats — with 10 Democrats and a local reporter or two — that have put the state on the political map. Halfway across the country, Mrs. Clinton's former and potential future political rival, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, will be competing for attention by heading for New Hampshire, a trip that was planned before Mrs. Clinton decided to spend the same weekend in Des Moines.

Throwing Their Blogs Into The Ring (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Last week's presidential announcement video from Barack Obama seemed fresh, futuristic and YouTube-friendly -- until Saturday, when Hillary Clinton's "I'm in to win" video, as pretty and polished as a Merchant-Ivory production, made Obama's clip look like a student project. Obama, here comes Mama. And she doesn't play.

As they size each other up, the Democratic front-runners might want to sneak a glance at John Edwards, who has outpaced them both in new-technology savvy. Edwards has been campaigning in cyberspace for months, building a deep, "sticky" Web site with tons of multimedia offerings and a destination-quality blog. Clinton is still working on a blog. Obama is apparently still working on a lot of things.

Who knows whether the presidential campaign Web sites of the three leading Democratic contenders reveal anything meaningful about the candidates? At this early stage, a year before the first primaries and caucuses, who knows what indicators to trust? A Post poll showed Clinton with a substantial lead nationwide, but other polls show a much tighter three-way contest in Iowa and New Hampshire, the states that count -- make that the states that will count, a year from now. New candidates are still piling in (e.g., Bill Richardson on Sunday). The race doesn't even have a complete starting field yet, much less a trend.

But the march of human progress does have a trend. More of you will read this column on the Internet than on newsprint. Those of you who want to tell me how surpassingly brilliant or irredeemably stupid it is will almost certainly do so by sending e-mails rather than putting pen to paper. In just about every realm of human activity I can think of, the Internet matters more now than it did five minutes ago. I can't think of any reason that politics should be exempt.

So what do the Web sites HillaryClinton.com, BarackObama.com and JohnEdwards.com tell us about their namesakes? At first glance, they seem to confirm what we think we already know. Clinton's site evokes a super-competent juggernaut, with every base covered and every hair in place. Obama's is very much a work in progress. And Edwards's Web site suggests the patience, attention to detail and willingness to take risks that you would expect from a trial lawyer who rose from nothing to become a self-made millionaire.

Clinton and Obama are first-name candidates on their sites -- "Hillary" says this, "Barack" says that. Edwards is more formal -- he's "John Edwards" or "Senator Edwards," if you please. Perhaps that's a necessary reminder, since he's not, technically speaking, a senator anymore.

As for overall tone and scope, it's hard to evaluate Obama's campaign cyber-HQ because it's so clearly a provisional, placeholding site with not much but a couple of videos (the announcement; a biography) and a big button you can click to become a contributor. There's a link to his Senate reelection Web site -- he would have to run in 2010 -- and if you find the link and click through, you get a fuller picture of the man.

The Clinton and Edwards sites, as one might expect, are largely about the business of getting elected. Clinton's home page tells you how to "Join Team Hillary" or become a "HillRaiser" of campaign funds. Edwards likewise prominently advises how to join his team, but his home page also focuses on some issues -- he's against global warming, we learn, and opposes an escalation of the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0120350

The real difference is depth and ambition. Both Clinton and Obama (he on his Senate campaign Web site) say they want to have a dialogue with the American people about how best to solve the nation's problems. But Edwards has already started his conversation with the nation. His Web site is an exercise in social networking that includes not only a blog, where surfers can post their thoughts, but also cyber-diaries written by Edwards's family members.

"The soft rain of last night has left the field behind the house dewy with a low fog. Maybe the gossamer meadow is the reason I feel contemplative this morning," begins a recent entry by Elizabeth Edwards. Her diary posts generally draw more comments than her husband's.

Somehow, it's hard to imagine Hillary Clinton waxing about any gossamer meadow.

Edwards's Web site is less YouTube than MySpace. It tries to take advantage of the Internet's great paradox -- that a technology so devoid of human contact can nevertheless create a sense of intimacy and connection.

So, Mama's playing it safe, Obama's not quite ready and Edwards is up to something interesting. In the "Second Life" sense, at least. We'll see about the real world.

Casino Executive Contributes $1 Million To Gingrich Group (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Newt Gingrich, a former House speaker and a possible presidential contender, jump-started his new political group with a check for $1 million from a source many in his conservative base would shun -- the gambling industry.

Gingrich's American Solutions for Winning the Future reported to the Internal Revenue Service that it collected a $1 million check from Las Vegas Sands Corp. Chairman Sheldon G. Adelson shortly after the November elections. The IRS reported the donation in recent days.

The contribution dwarfed the other checks, totaling just $60,000, gathered for the group's start-up. Gingrich announced the group late last fall, setting it up as a "527" organization, a type of political nonprofit that can collect and spend donations of unlimited size.

Though Gingrich says his group is seeking bipartisan ideas, his movement is clearly courting conservatives with a new "Contract With America for the 21st Century" that proposes private savings accounts for Social Security, "patriotic education" in public schools and the appointment of judges who understand the "centrality of God in American history."

A decade after $100,000 checks to political parties and groups were the jaw-dropping phenomenon, Adelson's donation marks a new frontier in political fundraising -- a seven-figure check to a group associated with a single politician whose aspirations may include the White House. Gingrich has said that he will decide by the fall whether to enter the crowded race for the Republican Party's presidential nomination.

Kent Cooper, a former Federal Election Commission official, said: "A check of this size could either bankroll the start of a new organization or underwrite the exploration, traveling and contacts of a potential presidential candidate."

Gingrich's spokesman, Rick Tyler, said last night that the former speaker was traveling and unavailable to comment. "The 527 is designed to foster a dialogue with Americans. Hence the name American Solutions," Tyler said.

Adelson's office in Las Vegas declined to comment.

Adelson's check underscores the uncomfortable position that Republicans face on the issue of gambling. The party rose to power under Gingrich in the early 1990s on the strength of social and religious conservatives, and many of the latter oppose gambling on moral grounds.

Conservatives were stung during the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal when it was revealed that one of their champions, political strategist Ralph Reed, made money from Indian gambling sources and that many GOP lawmakers wrote letters or intervened on behalf of Abramoff's casino-operating tribes and received donations from them.

"The problem is the income comes from what we call a vice, and that is an issue," said the Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, which has long been a powerful voice on social issues inside the GOP.

"I certainly could never have done that and I certainly can't encourage it, but if good will comes out of it in terms of these issues . . . then that remains to be seen. There's an old expression that the devil's had the money long enough, it's about time the good people got their hands on it," he said.

Adelson was listed by Forbes magazine in 2006 as America's third-richest man, with assets of more than $20 billion. His long list of political donations, primarily to Republicans, includes $100,000 to the Republican National Committee in 1997 and 1998, when Gingrich was speaker.

Adelson made his mark in business by creating the nation's most famous technology show, Comdex, and was a relative latecomer to Las Vegas's gambling scene. He got into the casino business in the mid-1990s, buying the old Sands casino and imploding it to make room for the massive Venetian casino. That opened in 1999, four months after Gingrich left the House.

Louisiana: Congressman To Run For Governor (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Representative Bobby Jindal, Republican of Louisiana, said he would enter the 2007 governor's race, his second attempt at winning the office. Mr. Jindal will be running against a weakened incumbent, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat. Ms. Blanco defeated Mr. Jindal in 2003, but her standing was damaged after Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Jindal, 35, the son of immigrants from India, has also been the secretary of the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals and an assistant secretary at the federal Department of Health and Human Services in the Bush administration.

Jindal To Run Again To Lead Louisiana (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

Republican Rep. Bobby Jindal yesterday declared his candidacy for the Louisiana governorship but vowed to delay campaigning until after the April conclusion of the state's legislative session to avoid politicizing Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

Mr. Jindal, who lost to Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco in 2003, has a significant edge in early polling over Mrs. Blanco, a Democrat who has drawn criticism for her handling of the response to Katrina.

"Politics has a way of impeding progress, and Louisiana cannot afford to lose another second," Mr. Jindal wrote in his e-mail announcement sent to supporters.

"The upcoming state legislative session this spring is vital. We cannot afford failure, and the surest way to attain failure is to politicize every initiative and decision."

Mr. Jindal, whose parents emigrated from India, was elected to Congress at age 33 in 2004. He served as secretary of the state Health and Hospitals Department and in the Bush administration as an assistant secretary in the Health and Human Services Department in 2001.

A poll by the Southern Media and Opinion Research shows Mrs. Blanco's support among voters is 35 percent, compared with 59 percent for Mr. Jindal. Mrs. Blanco defeated Mr. Jindal by four percentage points in 2003.

Mrs. Blanco has announced her intention to seek re-election in the primary set for Oct. 20; she could not be reached for comment yesterday. If no candidate gets 50 percent of the vote, a runoff election will be held Nov. 17.

Mr. Jindal, the first to announce a candidacy to challenge Mrs. Blanco, emphasized his interest in contracting the race's length -- a move that runs counter to electoral trends.

"It is my belief that campaigns are too long as they are, and that people grow weary of the barrage of charges and countercharges," Mr. Jindal said. "I want to avoid D.C.-style politics with mudslinging and instead focus on solving the problems that our state faces."

The poll, conducted Jan. 12 to 14, shows that Mr. Jindal, whose district is in the New Orleans' suburbs, received overwhelming support in New Orleans -- 72 percent -- while Mrs. Blanco pulled 22 percent support.

Mrs. Blanco's low numbers are attributed to her responses to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

DOJ_NMG_0120352

Mrs. Blanco initially rejected President Bush's offer to deploy federal troops, after waiting 24 hours to make a decision. Days later, Mrs. Blanco was wired for a television interview and whispered to her press secretary that she wished she had requested troops earlier.

New Orleans Project Residents Face Home Demolition (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — To some, the four sprawling three-story brick complexes may not look like real estate worth fighting over.

But with inhabitable housing of any kind at a premium here, the fate of New Orleans' four largest public housing complexes — St. Bernard, C.J. Peete, B.W. Cooper and Lafitte — is at the center of another battle in the city's turbulent efforts to reshape its future.

The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Housing Authority of New Orleans have approved plans to demolish these complexes, landmarks in their neighborhoods, and replace them with lower-density apartment clusters for mixed-income residents.

Their decision has brought relentless opposition from former tenants who insist they want to restore their lives in their old homes.

Last week, residents ignored "No Trespassing" signs and stormed through unlocked gates and torn barbed-wire fences into the St. Bernard complex to clean their units.

But Monday, lawyers for the city's public housing agency filed illegal-entry and property-damage claims against those trying to halt the public housing demolition. They are seeking a court order to bar entry into any of the projects without the agency's approval.

Housing officials argue that the apartments are too badly damaged to repair. They insist that redevelopment would improve tenants' lives by eliminating crime-infested dens of concentrated poverty.

"People deserve better than this," said Jereon "Jerry" Brown, a Washington-based spokesman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, as he showed reporters flood-damaged and ransacked units at Lafitte last month. "If they could just be patient. A mixed-income neighborhood can better attract businesses and better schools. It's all tied together."

"It's not just about bricks and mortar," said C. Donald Babers, the New Orleans housing authority's federally appointed administrator, who accompanied Brown. "We're looking at quality of life for our families."

Dressed in a tailored suit and bowler hat, and wearing a diamond-studded gold ring on each hand, Babers did not enter the mold-crusted apartments, citing respiratory concerns. But advocates for public housing — where about 5,100 people lived before Katrina, and where some 1,200 have since returned — insist that the complexes were safe during past hurricanes because they were solidly built of steel, concrete and brick. Many apartments escaped flooding from Hurricane Katrina.

The advocates also argue that tearing them down prevents a key segment of the city's workforce from returning, and excludes thousands from the city's rebuilding process.

Nearly all the families who lived in New Orleans public housing were African Americans on low incomes.

"It's definitely about race and class," said Judith Browne-Dianis, co-director of Advancement Project, a Washington-based civil rights and racial justice group that is also representing tenants in a class-action lawsuit seeking to restore them to their apartments. "If you look at what happened after Hurricane Katrina, the people who were residents of public housing were the people who were left behind at the Superdome and Convention Center, and now they are the same people who are being locked out."

For former Lafitte tenant Jeffrey Hills, 31, a tuba and sousaphone player who used to live at Lafitte, the desire to return to the projects is simple.

"It's affordable housing," said Hills, who used to pay $400 a month rent, which included utilities, for a two-bedroom apartment with a balcony and parquet floors. "I'm a young man with three kids. I can't afford to pay $1,500 in rent."

The sense of place, community ties and social networks are also what former tenants say they miss most.

DOJ_NMG_0120353

"Every single person still displaced is constantly reevaluating wishes to come home with the unfolding reality they are not welcome at this point," said William P. Quigley, another attorney for the plaintiffs.

But Babers said tenants were swayed by nostalgia and had been isolated in such communities for so long that they were unable to consider alternative, viable living arrangements.

"It's a 1940s mind-set," said Babers, a reference to when many of the projects were built. "Change is difficult for people. They're afraid of the unknown."

Brown, his colleague, recalled how plans for demolishing and rebuilding public housing in other cities, such as Chicago and Atlanta, had met similar resistance. But once tenants moved into new, modern units in mixed-income neighborhoods with easy access to shops and schools, the opposition quickly waned, Brown said.

Jacquelyn Marshall, 36, a former resident of C.J. Peete, said tenants' reluctance to forsake their old units stemmed from distrust that the authorities would do right by them. The experience of residents of the city's former St. Thomas housing project has bred further skepticism, advocates say. The complex, originally designed to house around 1,500 families, was demolished in 2002. So far, 296 units have been constructed, 122 of them as low-income housing.

"We are not against the redevelopment of public housing," Marshall said. "We are against the process. I'm not for tearing down something that's livable when it will result in thousands of families being homeless. They need to start renovating before they demolish."

Linda Lockhart, one of the few dozen residents who have been allowed to move back to the B.W. Cooper complex, wept as she spoke of losing an estimated $140,000 worth of household goods and personal belongings, acquired through decades of scrimping and saving.

"If we had been allowed to return home sooner, I could have saved some things," said Lockhart, 51. Tenants were shut out for several months after Katrina, allowing vandals to ransack and steal possessions not destroyed by the storm.

Lockhart, a security company worker who raised two college-educated children at Cooper, shares a cramped one-bedroom unit with her daughter. Both sleep on the floor. They have one bamboo chair and no dining-room set. The view from the back porch is rows of dark and deserted flats, some with missing doors and shattered windows.

"If somebody had given me a house, I wouldn't be back," Lockhart said. "But I can't make it out there. When I lived [at Cooper] before, I was able to save money because the rent was reasonable, and I had a steady paying job."

Few public housing residents deny that crime was sometimes a problem, but they say troublemakers were typically outsiders. And Quigley, the lawyer, said that given the recent surge of murders in the city — 15 killed since Jan. 1 — it's clear that criminality is not confined to public housing, since most of the complexes are closed.

Babers, however, pointed to the Iberville complex, near the city's French Quarter: Over seven months through December, the complex was the site of 12 murders, he said.

Iberville residents forcibly reoccupied their complex after Katrina. Former St. Bernard residents are following that example.

Relatives helped Stephanie Mingo, a mother of four, pry off a steel cover sealing her front door so she could start washing and disinfecting the apartment.

Power and water have been shut off at St. Bernard, and rodents inhabit the filth. But diehard residents said they would continue to clean the complex until authorities allowed them to return.

"Soon you're gonna be sittin' on my porch while I braid your hair," Mingo shouted to a neighbor as she raced across the compound to reclaim her unit.

"Girl, just like the ol' days," the woman shouted back.

State Farm Legal Woes Hit Gale Force (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Nearly a year and a half after Katrina, the legal storm spawned by the deadly hurricane is coming to a head in Mississippi. At its center is the nation's largest home insurer: State Farm.

DOJ_NMG_0120354

The Bloomington, Ill., firm is the only insurer, so far, to face a major judgment against it in a Mississippi court over a disputed homeowner's claim related to Katrina. The judgment came two weeks ago when a federal judge ordered it to pay a Mississippi couple $232,292, and a jury awarded the couple $2.5 million in punitive damages. On Friday, State Farm settled another case about to go to trial, and the insurer faces lawsuits from hundreds of other Mississippi homeowners.

State Farm also is one of a number of insurers named in a civil lawsuit filed by Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood. His office has been investigating what it calls "the insurance industry's fraudulent denial of claims." A grand jury met last week. A State Farm spokesman said the company is "cooperating fully" with the investigation.

Meanwhile, State Farm is involved in talks that could settle many of these legal issues, and the talks are at a critical stage, according to a person familiar with the matter.

A mutual company that is owned by its policyholders, State Farm insures more than one out of every five homes in the U.S. State Farm reported $3.24 billion in net income for 2005, a year when it experienced steep hurricane costs.

At the center of these and other insurance disputes is a long-running legal dilemma: Who pays a homeowner's claims when a house is damaged by both wind and water? Many homeowner policies cover wind damage but exclude flood damage because it is covered under the government's flood insurance program.

In 2005, State Farm was the largest home insurer in Mississippi, with roughly 30% of the market, according to A.M. Best Co. State Farm has already paid out $1.1 billion in Katrina-related claims in the state. But, besides the lawsuits from several hundred homeowners in Mississippi, more than a thousand homeowners in Louisiana have brought Katrina-related cases against the company. Other insurers, including Allstate Corp. and Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., are also fighting suits. (A backlash against insurers is building in several coastal states. See article.1)

Disputed homeowner claims in Mississippi could cost the industry hundreds of millions of dollars, aside from possible punitive damages, says Robert Hartwig, president of Insurance Information Institute, a trade group.

In an interview last week, Mississippi's Mr. Hood said he hoped the judge's recent ruling against State Farm would bring insurers "to the table." State Farm has said it would like to resolve as many of the outstanding cases as possible. It isn't clear whether other major insurers would follow its lead if the negotiations bear fruit.

Only two homeowner cases against insurers have gone to court in Mississippi, and they ended very differently. U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter presided over both cases. State Farm potentially lost out on millions last week when the judge ordered it to pay the Mississippi couple and the jury followed with a punitive damage award. The other case involved Nationwide Mutual Insurance. In that instance, Judge Senter decided Nationwide should pay Paul and Julie Leonard $1,228.16 in addition to the $1,661.17 the company had previously paid the couple. Then he dismissed the case.

The Nationwide case varied from the State Farm case in important ways. The house Nationwide insured was standing after the hurricane, leaving behind evidence for the insurer to make a case for the coverage it offered. Judge Senter found most of the damage was due to water and wasn't covered.

The State Farm-insured house was destroyed, leaving little evidence beyond the foundation. State Farm denied the claim outright. Judge Senter said the insurer still bore the burden of proof that water, not wind, did the damage, and it didn't prove it.

A State Farm attorney, Peter Martin, said in an interview last week the Nationwide case was "much easier" because it left behind evidence. State Farm says it is likely to appeal the decision.

Mom Is At Home In House, Senate (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — It probably wasn't chance that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first public event after announcing her interest in running for president — a stop at a New York health center named for the Chelsea and Clinton neighborhoods — echoed the name of her daughter.

Nor was it chance that the new speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, took up her gavel for the first time earlier this year surrounded by children, including some of her grandchildren.

DOJ_NMG_0120355

In recent days, female politicians have risen to new power and prominence. And they did so — deliberately — surrounded by reminders of their motherhood.

Whether being a woman is an asset or liability in national politics may be an open question, but being a mother — or a grandmother — appears to be a sure winner.

Strategists say that talking about motherhood is reassuring to voters, some of whom are still uncomfortable with women in powerful jobs. It also helps create a narrative for their lives that connects them to mainstream and traditionalist voters.

"Raising children is certainly something both have in common with millions of Americans, and parents everywhere worry about their kids' future, so why not talk about it?" said Democratic strategist Stephanie Cutter. "It's really no different than talking about a military record or experience in running a business — it gives voters a sense of who you are."

One example is freshman Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.), who brought her 11-year-old daughter, Abigail, to the Senate floor for her swearing-in this month. Abigail frequently accompanied her mom on the campaign trail, and the story of her complicated birth — and the family's struggles with their healthcare plan — was a frequent campaign theme.

"Being a mom is a big part of who I am. Historically, I don't think there have been enough moms in the U.S. Senate, and I think it was good for mothers across our state to get the sense that someone who understands their lives is in the United States Senate," Klobuchar said recently.

For Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who has been little known on the national stage except as a "San Francisco liberal," highlighting her motherhood and grandmother-hood — she has five children and six grandchildren — is also part of a strategy to make her less of a caricature.

But perhaps no female politician has used motherhood as effectively as Clinton (D-N.Y.), who is starting the most serious run at the presidency by a woman. Not coincidentally, when she was asked about her presidential ambitions on a women's TV talk show last month, Clinton noted that "we've never had a mother … [in] that position."

Also not coincidentally, Clinton has just released a new edition of her 1996 book on raising children. The cover features a large photo of Clinton surrounded by school-age children. Inside is a soft-focus portrait of the senator with her 26-year-old daughter, Chelsea Clinton.

"At the core of this book is my own experience as a mother and my conviction that parents are the most important influences on the lives of their children," Clinton writes in the new introduction.

For Clinton, whose eight years as first lady left many with a view of her as a strident feminist and partisan, talking about being a mother could "soften" her image. Strategists say they expect Chelsea Clinton, now working for a New York City-based hedge fund, to take on a prominent role in her mother's campaign.

"Gender stereotypes are still alive and well in America and cut across men and women in all ideologies," Republican strategist Dick Morris and his wife, Eileen McGann — no fans of Clinton — wrote recently on their website, Vote.com. "Survey research shows that all voters believe that women are more compassionate, more focused on children and education, and more pro-peace than men."

Although many conservatives consider Clinton a liberal, she has tried to position herself more as a centrist on issues from immigration to abortion. One reason, political analysts suggest, is electoral strategy: More than half of the electorate is female and some of the most sought-after voters are mothers. Those voters tend toward moderate views.

"Swing women tend to be married and moms," said Democratic pollster Celinda Lake, who noted that talking about being a mother "creates a connection to married women."

Although mentioning motherhood is often seen as a softener for women, Lake says that the reverse is also true: It shows them as strong in a nonthreatening way.

"People think that mothers are very tough. It's comfortable for voters to see a woman being tough in that way," Lake said.

Pelosi took advantage of that "motherly" toughness strategy during the recent scandal over former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate advances to teenage congressional pages.

"As a mother and grandmother, I think 'lioness,' " Pelosi said as she criticized the Republican leadership's response. "You come near the cubs, you're dead."

DOJ_NMG_0120356

Ellen R. Malcolm, head of Emily's List, which works to propel the careers of Democratic women, said she considered the past year a watershed for political women: "It's kind of a coming of age."

After the 2006 midterm elections, there are 71 women in the House of Representatives and 16 in the Senate — a record for both chambers.

And a female governor heads the National Governors Assn. for the first time.

"One of the strongest themes of the last election was that we needed a change for the next generation," Malcolm said. "By talking about being mothers, they show that they are looking ahead to the next generation."

In Arab Capital Of U.S., Ethnic Divide Remains (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich., Jan. 19 — After the longtime mayor, Michael A. Guido, died of cancer here in December, a flock of Arab-American candidates stepped forward in the hopes of claiming City Hall.

But despite the fact that roughly one in three Dearborn residents is of Arab origin, most of the Arab-American candidates had dropped out by mid-January. Poll numbers showed that none of them could win.

Internal rivalries echoing those that beset the Arab world, along with the general electorate's lingering unease about Muslims, combined to derail what many here had hoped would be the chance to prove that Arab-Americans had arrived politically — at least in Dearborn, their unofficial capital in this country.

"One day, an Arab-American will be in office at the top, but this will not be the time," said Osama Siblani, the burly publisher of the weekly Arab American News, whose friends tease him about his perennial "this is the time" editorial at every election. "There is no doubt that electing an Arab-American to the City Hall in Dearborn would have sent a strong message to the rest of the country that Arab-Americans are part of the political process. Would we want it? Yes. Is it possible? No."

Mayor Guido had something of a checkered reputation among Arab-Americans here, not least because his first campaign, in 1985, distributed a leaflet promising to address the "Arab problem." Things improved somewhat over the years — he visited Lebanon, and Arab-Americans donated heavily to his campaigns.

But last summer, he criticized the "mobs" protesting Israel's attacks against civilian targets in Lebanon and sent the Arab-American community a $23,000 bill for overtime for police officers and firefighters during the demonstration. The bill, sent to a coalition of Arab-American groups, resulted in a free-speech lawsuit.

When Mr. Guido died, several Arab-American candidates stepped forward, including a well-known local prosecutor and a former North American middleweight boxing champion who recently starred on "The Contender," a reality television series. An intensive vetting of candidates for the Feb. 27 election was started under the auspices of the Lebanese American Heritage Club so that the entire community could unite behind just one contender.

That did not happen, not least because the front-runner, John O'Reilly Jr., having been president of the City Council for 17 years, knew something about the internal rivalries pitting the Lebanese against the Iraqis against the Yemenis. Mr. O'Reilly, known as Jack, set out to separate the Yemenis from the rest of the Arab community here and succeeded in winning their early enthusiasm.

Arab-American candidates "come to us and say 'salaam aleikum' and a few other Arabic words to play on our emotions," said Nass Al Rayashi, one of the founders of the Yemeni American Political Action Committee, using the Arabic greeting of "peace be upon you." The committee was formed in March 2005 in large part because the Yemenis felt the Lebanese had dominated civic life at their expense.

The Yemenis, concentrated in the somewhat gritty South Side neighborhood sandwiched between the sprawling Ford Rouge plant and Woodmere Cemetery, want a candidate focused on local concerns. These include a lack of parking at the Dix Street mosque and pollution emitted by neighboring industrial areas including the Ford vehicle factory, which drew Arabs here for work for decades, but where fewer and fewer are finding jobs.

"Don't tell us you go to Ali so-and-so's house to eat Arab food," Mr. Rayashi added. "This is America, this is the melting pot. Our interests should be what is good for us here."

DOJ_NMG_0120357

There has long been a division between the economically better off western side of Dearborn and the eastern side. In the old days, recalled Mr. O'Reilly, whose father was mayor from 1978 to 1985, the division was known as the "cake eaters" versus the "factory rats."

Now some see it as more like the Muslims versus everybody else.

"People are a little bit afraid of them," Mr. O'Reilly said, attributing it partly to traditional Christian education that he said had long taught that "their philosophy of religion was 'convert to Islam or die.' "

The fact that Arab-Americans in Dearborn are prone to demonstrations, including protests against last summer's war in Lebanon and the recent hanging of Saddam Hussein, only adds to the unease, he said.

Although more affluent Arab-American lawyers and real estate developers have gradually integrated the western part of the city, an ethnic divide remains. Abed Hammoud, a lead lawyer in the Wayne County prosecutor's office and the favorite of the Arab community until he withdrew from the mayor's race on Jan. 12, said he was met with surprise when he knocked on doors in western Dearborn.

"People reacted like I had come from the moon," said Mr. Hammoud, 41, a kinetic figure with receding salt and pepper hair who left Lebanon in 1985. "They said things like 'It's good of you to come to this end of town,' or they asked me about the people 'over there' and they meant the other side of town."

The Arab American Political Action Committee, which Mr. Hammoud and Mr. Siblani, the newspaper publisher, helped found in 1998 largely to inspire Arabs to run and vote, commissioned a poll to assess Mr. Hammoud's chances. They found Mr. O'Reilly, suddenly alone in the non-Arab field, commanding an unbeatable 65 percent lead to Mr. Hammoud's roughly 30 percent. They consoled themselves with the fact that Mr. Hammoud was likely to do better this time as a candidate than he did in his first mayoral primary, which fell on the unfortunate date of Sept. 11, 2001.

But basically the results suggested that at best he would capture the Arab vote — not enough to win the entire city of 100,000.

Time alone may favor the Arab-Americans here. Mr. Hammoud cited numbers showing that in 1998, there were 60,000 registered voters in the city, 8,500 of them Arab-Americans. Today, it is 14,500 out of 57,000, and at least 60 percent of high school students are Arab-Americans.

"People look at an Arab now, and the first thing that pops into their head is terrorism," said Tarick Salmaci, the boxer, who withdrew from the race. "We want to change that. Arab-Americans have to become political figures to change that.

Illegal Health Care (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

GOP Governors Arnold Schwarzenegger and Mitt Romney have become media darlings for proposing sweeping state health insurance reforms aimed at achieving "universal" coverage. Now out of office, Mr. Romney is trying to ride his plan to the Republican Presidential nomination. But it turns out state schemes that feature "pay or play" employer taxes or mandates are probably illegal.

At least that's the clear implication of a significant but underreported ruling last week by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, which said that Maryland's "Fair Share" health legislation -- otherwise known as "the Wal-Mart tax" -- violates a federal employee-benefits law known by the acronym Erisa.

In this case, Maryland had sought to require all companies with 10,000 or more employees to spend at least 8% of their payroll on employee health care or pay the state the difference. Wal-Mart happened to be the only employer in Maryland large enough to fit that precise definition. But it joined with other firms under the Retail Industry Leaders Association to challenge the law, which was first struck down by a district court last summer.

Judge J. Frederick Motz wrote for that court that "The Act violates Erisa's fundamental purpose of permitting multi-state employers to maintain nationwide health and welfare plans, providing uniform nationwide benefits and permitting uniform national administration." Last week's Fourth Circuit ruling affirmed that decision, and it could spell trouble for the California and Massachusetts schemes.

Leave aside that the plan muscled into law by Maryland's Democratic legislature was far less ambitious. The basic similarity is that all three plans feature employer mandates or taxes aimed at changing employee-benefit plans -- in this case by requiring employers to provide health insurance.

Like the Maryland law, the California plan is explicit on the point, and would require all firms with 10 or more employers to provide health care or pay a 4% tax. This would seem clearly illegal according to the reasoning of the Fourth Circuit, which also said that the ostensibly "voluntary" nature of the Maryland tax was irrelevant from the standpoint of Erisa. No reasonable firm, it said, could be expected to choose to pay money to the state to avoid changing its employee-benefit plan.

Mr. Romney's Massachusetts scheme is slightly different, since it doesn't feature the same kind of percentage tax. But not only would Massachusetts charge a $295-a-head fee to employers that don't provide insurance, it would also make them liable for the catastrophic medical costs of uninsured employees. Again this is likely to fall afoul of Erisa, says one legal expert with whom we spoke, because these penalties are aimed at changing employee-benefit plans that are supposed to be voluntary according to federal law.

There were sound reasons that Congress decided to create a uniform national regulatory framework when it wrote the Erisa law way back in 1974. To wit: Freeing employers from the administrative burden of having to comply with a multitude of state and local requirements leaves them with more money to spend on actual health care and other benefits. It doesn't speak well of Messrs. Schwarzenegger and Romney and their staffs that they didn't seem to have given this well-known legislation much, if any, thought when crafting their reforms.

This week brings one other piece of bad news for proponents of the Massachusetts model, by the way. Early bids suggest the soon-to-be compulsory insurance policies that will pass muster under the scheme will be expensive -- starting at a whopping $380 per month, or $4,560 a year, for an individual. That's hardly surprising when you look at costs in other states that overregulate their insurance markets, such as New York. But it's more evidence that the better way to get people covered is to mimic the practices of less-regulated states such as Connecticut, where a 35-year-old man can get covered for as little as $50 per month.

We're all for state policy experiments, but these ballyhooed health care reforms are policy blunders that won't stand scrutiny in court, much less in the marketplace.

The Ironic Mr. Spitzer (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

What you denounce in politics can depend on where you sit, and here's hoping that's true of Eliot Spitzer. As New York's Attorney General, the Democrat was the scourge of the financial industry. And in a final rhetorical flourish in that job, he was among the first to denounce last month's report by the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation pointing to a decline in American financial industry competitiveness.

Now, however, Mr. Spitzer is New York's Governor, and it will be fascinating to see if he assumes a more statesmanlike pose toward the same industry. Both the New York state budget, and Mr. Spitzer's own political future, depend on the financial industry's prosperity, as the same Capital Markets Committee report made clear.

While the securities industry employs 2.2% of New York state's workers, those workers earned 9.2% of the state's gross income in 2005. The industry accounts for no less than 7% of "gross state product." And here's the kicker: At its peak in 2001, the securities industry paid 18.7% of total New York tax receipts, according to the state comptroller's office. The numbers for 2006 aren't yet in, but expect another banner year for bankers' tax bills. It's fashionable to decry big Wall Street bonuses, but New York politicians would be destitute without the income tax revenues from those bonuses.

Here's another irony: Mr. Spitzer's fate as Governor may also depend on the enforcement forbearance of his successor as AG, Andrew Cuomo. As the Capital Markets Committee noted, one of the main threats to U.S. public financial markets is multiple layers of regulation that can create double and triple jeopardy. In London, investors deal with a single regulator. But in New York, Mr. Spitzer made the state AG's office into another Securities and Exchange Commission. If Mr. Cuomo uses his powers the way Mr. Spitzer did, even fewer companies will want to go public in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0120359

Two other New York politicians -- New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Senator Chuck Schumer -- issued a new report yesterday on the regulatory risks to U.S. financial markets that we'll have more to say about soon. They're calling for less onerous regulation and tort reform. Perhaps Mr. Spitzer will have a similar epiphany once he discovers how dependent he now is on the state's financial entrepreneurs.

Scant Evidence Found Of Iran-Iraq Arms Link (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Greg Miller, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

U.S. warnings of advanced weaponry crossing the border are overstated, critics say.

BAQUBAH, IRAQ — If there is anywhere Iran could easily stir up trouble in Iraq, it would be in Diyala, a rugged province along the border between the two nations.

The combination of Sunni Arab militants believed to be affiliated with Al Qaeda and Shiite Muslim militiamen with ties to Iran has fueled waves of sectarian and political violence here. The province is bisected by long-traveled routes leading from Iran to Baghdad and Shiite holy cities farther south in Iraq.

But even here, evidence of Iranian involvement in Iraq's troubles is limited. U.S. troops have found mortars and antitank mines with Iranian markings dated 2006, said U.S. Army Col. David W. Sutherland, who oversees the province. But there has been little sign of more advanced weaponry crossing the border, and no Iranian agents have been found.

In his speech this month outlining the new U.S. strategy in Iraq, President Bush promised to "seek out and destroy" Iranian networks that he said were providing "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies." He is expected to strike a similar note in tonight's State of the Union speech.

For all the aggressive rhetoric, however, the Bush administration has provided scant evidence to support these claims. Nor have reporters traveling with U.S. troops seen extensive signs of Iranian involvement. During a recent sweep through a stronghold of Sunni insurgents here, a single Iranian machine gun turned up among dozens of arms caches U.S. troops uncovered. British officials have similarly accused Iran of meddling in Iraqi affairs, but say they have not found Iranian-made weapons in areas they patrol.

The lack of publicly disclosed evidence has led to questions about whether the administration is overstating its case. Some suggest Bush and his aides are pointing to Iran to deflect blame for U.S. setbacks in Iraq. Others suggest they are laying the foundation for a military strike against Iran.

Before invading Iraq, the administration warned repeatedly that Saddam Hussein was developing nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. Those statements proved wrong. The administration's charges about Iran sound uncomfortably familiar to some. "To be quite honest, I'm a little concerned that it's Iraq again," Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, head of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said last week, referring to the administration's comments on Iran.

Lowered credibility

The accusations of Iranian meddling "illustrate what may be one of our greatest problems," said Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official and military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"We are still making arguments from authority without detail and explanation. We're making them in an America and in a world where we really don't have anything like the credibility we've had in the past."

Few doubt that Iran is seeking to extend its influence in Iraq. But the groups in Iraq that have received the most Iranian support are not those that have led attacks against U.S. forces. Instead, they are nominal U.S. allies.

The Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, one of the two largest parties in parliament, is believed to be the biggest beneficiary of Iranian help. The Shiite group was based in Iran during Hussein's reign, and Iran's Revolutionary Guard trained and equipped its Badr Brigade militia.

But the Supreme Council also has strong U.S. connections. Bush played host to the head of the party, Abdelaziz Hakim, at the White House in December, and administration officials have frequently cited Adel Abdul Mehdi, another party leader, as a person they would like to see as Iraq's prime minister.

The Islamic Dawa Party of Iraq's current prime minister, Nouri Maliki, also has strong ties to Iran.

Some U.S. officials have also suggested that Iran, a Shiite theocracy, has provided aid to the Sunni insurgents, who have led most of the attacks against U.S. forces. Private analysts and other U.S. officials doubt that. Evidence is stronger that the Iranians are supporting a Shiite group that has attacked U.S. forces, the Al Mahdi militia, which is loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Top U.S. intelligence officials have been making increasingly confident assertions about Iran.

"I've come to a much darker interpretation of Iranian actions in the past 12 to 18 months," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden said in recent congressional testimony. Previously, Tehran's priority was to maneuver for a stable Iraq dominated by its Shiite majority, but that attitude has changed, he said.

"There is a clear line of evidence that points out the Iranians want to punish the United States, hurt the United States in Iraq, tie down the United States in Iraq," he said.

One high-ranking intelligence official in Washington acknowledged a lack of "fidelity" in the intelligence on Iran's activities, saying reports are sometimes unclear because it is difficult to track weapons and personnel that might be flowing across the long and porous border.

But U.S. forces have picked up specially shaped charges used to make roadside bombs capable of penetrating advanced armor, he said, with markings that could be traced to Iran and dates that were recent. The markings have been found on the devices themselves or the crates in which they were smuggled into the country, he said.

"Two years ago we were debating whether this was really happening," the official said. "Now the debate is over."

Documents withheld

U.S. officials have declined to provide documentation of seized Iranian ordnance despite repeated requests. The U.S. military often releases photographs of other weapons finds.

British government officials, including Prime Minister Tony Blair, have also accused Iran of supplying advanced explosive devices to Iraq.

Blair said a year ago that the weapons bore the hallmarks of Iran or Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed militia in Lebanon. But British officers stationed in Iraq at the time said they had seized no such weapons in the districts for which they had responsibility.

"We do have intelligence which suggests that weapons and ammunition are being smuggled in from Iran," Maj. David Gell, a spokesman for British forces in Basra, said last week. "We don't always manage to find any."

U.S. military officials in Diyala have had the same experience. No munitions or personnel have been seized at the border, officers said.

Sutherland, the U.S. colonel who oversees Diyala, believes that Tehran is prepared to work with any group, Shiite or Sunni, that can tie up U.S. forces. But State Department and intelligence officials have privately expressed doubts that Iranians are helping Sunnis.

Sunni insurgents in Diyala don't appear to need outside suppliers. They exploit massive weapons stashes containing materiel dating back to the Iran-Iraq war, when Hussein had a major military base in the area. U.S. military officials say they have found the type of shaped charges they attribute to Iran and Hezbollah in majority-Shiite parts of the province.

Outside military analysts have questioned how many of these sorts of weapons actually come from Iran. The technology used to make them is simple and widely known in the Middle East, they note. Iran is a likely source for some of the more sophisticated devices, but other countries could also be pitching in.

"A lot of rather sophisticated weapons have actually been released by Syria," said Peter Felstead, editor of the London-based Jane's Defense Weekly.

Others note that smugglers could be bringing weapons across the border from Iran without government approval.

'They are significant'

A second high-ranking U.S. intelligence official in Washington acknowledged that only a "small percentage" of explosions in Iraq could be linked to shaped charges coming from Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0120361

"But in terms of American casualties, they are significant," he said, because they are much more lethal than standard roadside bombs.

A senior U.S. military intelligence official said coalition forces in Iraq had also found shaped charges "in the presence of Iranians captured in the country." He declined to elaborate but noted that U.S. operatives who raided an Iranian office in the Iraqi city of Irbil this month captured documents and computer drives he called a "treasure trove" on Iran's "networks, supply lines, sourcing and funding."

Five Iranians were taken into custody in the raid, prompting angry protests from the Iraqi government.

U.S. intelligence officials emphasized that Iran intentionally stops short of steps that would be seen as direct provocation and provide justification for a military response. For example, Iran has refrained from supplying Shiite militias with surface-to-air missiles and other weaponry that was part of Hezbollah's arsenal in its fight with Israel last summer, they said.

A high-ranking U.S. intelligence official called it a "careful calibration" that probably reflected disagreements within the Islamic regime. "I don't doubt that Iranian national security council meetings are very contentious," the official said.

West's Iran Plan Shows Gains. Will US Stick To It? (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

With evidence mounting that international pressure on Iran is getting results, President Bush prepares to deliver a State of the Union speech Tuesday night that could provide signs of where efforts against Tehran and its nuclear program will go next.

Although it remains debatable what exactly is working – sanctions, Western unity, the threat of force, targeted US actions, or even deteriorating internal conditions – Iran appears to be responding, analysts say.

"The sanctions and international pressure are having an effect," says Joseph Cirincione, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington.

But Mr. Cirincione cautions against interpreting everything going on inside Iran as a direct response to international pressure on the nuclear program. "The sanctions are hurting Iran's economy, especially by [sowing] doubts among international investors and discouraging their involvement in the Iranian economy," he says. "At the same time, the pragmatists and reformers are using the sense of Iran's growing international isolation to strike back at [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad, but for reasons unrelated to the nuclear issue."

In an unusual step, a majority in Iran's parliament has sent a letter to Mr. Ahmadinejad laying responsibility for the country's dire economic straits at his feet, and criticizing him for his high-profile foreign travel.

In addition, Ahmadinejad – who has made a global name for himself by defying the United States, European powers, and the United Nations Security Council with his nuclear-related taunts – appears to be coming under growing political pressure at home to stifle the brinkmanship.

Last week two prominent Iranian newspapers, including one owned by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, rebuked Ahmadinejad over the nuclear issue and called on him to distance himself from nuclear policy. And in comments released Monday, Iran's most senior dissident cleric, Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, joined the chorus of criticism.

Still, Ahmadinejad remained defiant over the weekend, dismissing criticism that his country's economy has been hurt by UN sanctions. Iran also announced new tests of short-range missiles.

While it is too early to say if Tehran will be ready to alter its nuclear course or is simply concerned about Ahmadinejad's extremist image, some experts say it is equally unclear how Mr. Bush will interpret the events in Tehran – and whether or not he will see them as the fruit of diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0120362

"What we are seeing is the success of American and European pressure. It is not American pressure on its own," says Anatol Lieven, a foreign-policy expert at the New America Foundation in Washington. He sees growing Iranian isolation in the region "as a result of Iran's overambitious and menacing stance."

The turn of events is "an example of multilateralism, not of America working on its own," he says.

But will Bush see it that way?

It was in his State of the Union address of 2002 that Bush first spoke of Iran as part of an "axis of evil," for its support of what the US deems terrorist organizations. Since then, Tehran has advanced its nuclear program to uranium enrichment, while the US has developed contingency plans for taking out Iranian nuclear installations with air power.

Some analysts and a few prominent foreign diplomats – including Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov – have said they see unsettling parallels between US action and rhetoric on Iraq and America's Iran policy.

Yet since early 2005, the US has opened a diplomatic track, primarily with European powers, to stop Iran short of acquiring nuclear weapons through international pressure.

The Security Council approved a sanctions resolution against Iran late last year. The resolution was considerably weakened under veto threat from Russia and China – two of Iran's key commercial partners – but the move paved the way for the US to pursue tougher financial sanctions. It has also pursued action with a "coalition of the willing" of primarily European countries.

Earlier this month, the Treasury Department took action against an Iranian bank, prohibiting it from completing transactions in US dollars. The European Union is also considering tougher action against Tehran than the measures called for in the UN resolution.

At the same time, the US is taking some aggressive military steps: moving a second aircraft carrier into the Persian Gulf, for example, and detaining Iranians in Iraq, who it claims have links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that is allegedly supporting insurgents in Iraq.

Meanwhile, a number of US partners in the Middle East have adopted tougher stances vis-à-vis Tehran. Saudi Arabia is rebuffing Iranian efforts to engineer a cut in OPEC oil production that could stem a decline in the price of crude oil. And in a Jan. 16 meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan, and several Gulf states issued a critical statement that, while oblique in its references, was clearly aimed at Iran.

The question now may be how long Bush – who has flatly ruled out allowing Iran to acquire nuclear weapons – will be willing to stick with an approach whose steering wheel is not solely in American hands.

Yet another question – raised to national prominence by the Iraq Study Group – is whether the US will eventually move to talks with Tehran as part of a regional effort to stabilize Iraq.

Mr. Lieven, speaking at a Washington forum last week, said that Iran is a "natural ally" when it comes to Afghanistan – indeed, the US worked with Iranian officials in the early stages of stabilizing post-Taliban Afghanistan.

Iran Bars 38 IAEA Nuclear Inspectors (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, January 23, 2007

Iran has barred 38 nuclear inspectors on a United Nations list from entering the country, the foreign minister said Monday in what appeared to be retaliation for the U.N. sanctions imposed last month.

The rejected officials are on a list of potential inspectors drawn up by the International Atomic Energy Agency to visit and monitor Iran's nuclear facilities.

"The act of rejecting some inspectors is legal and in accordance with the agency's regulations," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told the official Islamic Republic News Agency. He said others on the U.N. nuclear watchdog's list remain eligible, but did not explain how Iran decided which inspectors to bar.

The IAEA "submits a long list of inspectors to member countries and the countries have the right to oppose the visit by some inspectors," Mottaki said.

DOJ_NMG_0120363

Last month, the U.N. Security Council imposed limited trade sanctions on Iran over its refusal to cease uranium enrichment, a process that can produce the material for nuclear energy or bombs.

Days later, the Iranian parliament passed a motion that obliged the government to revise its cooperation with the IAEA, but gave it a free hand to determine the steps to be taken.

IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming and other agency officials did not immediately return after-hours calls from The Associated Press.

The United States rebuked Iran for the move. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said it was "another example of the Iranians trying to dictate the terms to the international community — in this case, the IAEA."

The United States and some of its allies accuse Tehran of trying to develop nuclear weapons. Iran denies this, saying its program is only to produce nuclear energy.

Iranian hard-liners had urged the government to respond to sanctions by abrogating the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty — the agreement under which the inspections are held.

Analysts said the decision to bar a limited number of inspectors appeared to be a measured retaliation.

"Iran is carefully calibrating its response, saving harsher measures for a further tit-for-tat response to the next U.N. Security Council resolution," said Mark Fitzpatrick, an Iran expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

When the Security Council imposed sanctions on Dec. 23, it gave Iran 60 days to cease enrichment or face the likelihood of additional penalties.

Fitzpatrick said the decision to bar some inspectors was largely "a symbolic act of defiance."

"The IAEA has about 200 inspectors it could send to Iran, so stopping 38 of them will not impede its ability to carry out inspections, at least in the short term," he said. The move "demonstrates Iran's unwillingness to accept the U.N. Security Council mandate that it suspend enrichment."

The IAEA last visited Iranian nuclear facilities earlier this month when two inspectors came.

IAEA In Talks With Iran After Inspectors Blocked (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

The International Atomic Energy Agency said it was discussing with Iran its demand to withdraw some nuclear inspectors but was confident it could continue monitoring the country's nuclear facilities.

"It should be noted however, that there are a sufficient number of inspectors designated for Iran and the IAEA is able to perform its inspection activities in accordance with Iran's Comprehensive Safeguards Agreement," IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming said.

Earlier, the head of the Iranian parliament's national security commission told ISNA news agency that Iran has decided to block 38 IAEA inspectors in a fresh show of defiance over its nuclear aims.

Last month, Iran's parliament adopted a bill requiring the government to revise its cooperation with the IAEA after the UN Security Council passed a resolution to impose sanctions on Tehran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment work.

Alaeddin Borujerdi, head of parliament's national security commission, said on Monday that the blocking of the inspectors was a "first step in implementing the parliament legislation."

IAEA inspectors regularly visit Iranian nuclear sites under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, to which Iran is a signatory.

The parliament adopted the bill in response to the UN resolution 1737 that imposes sanctions on Iran's nuclear and missile programmes.

Iran, OPEC's second largest oil exporter, insists its nuclear programme is solely aimed at meeting peaceful energy needs. However, the West fears that it could be diverted towards building a bomb.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told reporters on Monday that "any country had the right to refuse admission to inspectors", a position confirmed by IAEA diplomats.

Last July IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said that 200 inspectors were charged with investigating Iran's nuclear activities, but did not stay permanently in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0120364

Previously they have only mainly encountered only minor problems, like delays in getting visas and restrictions on access to certain nuclear installations.

A diplomatic source at the IAEA said that Iran had a right to refuse access to its inspectors without giving a reason.

However, under Iran's agreement with the IAEA on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, the IAEA can take action if Iran repeatedly refuses access to designated inspectors.

"If as a result of the repeated refusal of the government of Iran to accept the designation of agency inspectors, inspections to be conducted under this agreement would be impeded," according to the agreement.

"Such refusal shall be considered by the (IAEA) board upon referral by the director general of the agency with a view to its taking appropriate action," it says

The next meeting of the IAEA's council of governors is slated for March 5.

It is not the first time that Iran has denied access to an IAEA inspector.

Tehran banned a Belgian inspector, Chris Charlier, last April for talking to the press. It has also limited inspectors' access to some of its sites on several occasions.

Iran Bars Inspectors; Cleric Criticizes President (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 22 — Iran is barring 38 nuclear agency inspectors from entering the country in retaliation for a United Nations resolution aiming to curb Iran's nuclear program, a senior Iranian lawmaker said Monday.

The announcement came only days after Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, Iran's most senior dissident cleric, criticized President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiant stance against the West on the nuclear issue in a speech on Friday, calling it provocative. His comments were the first direct public attack on the president's nuclear policy by such a senior cleric.

The two developments suggest an increasingly open debate within Iran over how forcefully to confront the West over Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as its government continues to defend them.

Two hard-line newspapers, including one owned by the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, have already called for the president to stay out of all nuclear matters. Ayatollah Montazeri said Iran has the right to nuclear technology but questioned the way Mr. Ahmadinejad has confronted the West.

"One has to deal with the enemy with wisdom," he said. "We should not provoke the enemy, otherwise the country will be faced with problems.

"We should get our right in a way that it does not create problems or excuses for others," he said.

"Besides, is this our only irrefutable right and we have no other rights?" he asked, referring to rising inflation since Mr. Ahmadinejad took office over a year ago.

Ayatollah Montazeri was once in line to become Iran's supreme religious leader, until he was banished and put under house arrest for his criticisms. His comments reflect the growing concern in Iran over additional economic sanctions if Iran continues to defy the international demand to halt its uranium enrichment program.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 and imposed sanctions banning the trade of goods related to Iran's nuclear program. It also gave Iran a deadline of two months to halt its uranium enrichment program or face tougher sanctions.

In response, Parliament passed a bill last month calling for the government to limit its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"The committee has decided to bar 38 inspectors from coming to Iran and we have announced the new limitation to the agency," said Alaedin Boroujerdi, the head of Parliament's committee for foreign policy and national security, the ISNA news agency reported.

The nuclear agency's inspectors visit Iran's nuclear facilities regularly. But last summer Iran said that it had decided not to let some of the inspectors return.

DOJ_NMG_0120365

Still, Mr. Boroujerdi said that Iran planned to continue its cooperation with the agency, and that Iran would remain a party to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

An I.A.E.A. spokeswoman, Melissa Flemming, said that the agency was confident that it could continue to monitor Iran's nuclear program.

"There are a sufficient number of inspectors designated for Iran, and the I.A.E.A. is able to perform its inspection activities in accordance with Iran's Comprehensive Safeguard Agreement," she said in an agency statement.

For his part, Mr. Ahmadinejad vowed again on Sunday that Iran would continue with its nuclear program, and brushed off the United Nations resolution as insignificant.

In Brussels on Monday, European Union foreign ministers called for all countries to enforce the sanctions against Iran. The British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said a collective application of the sanctions was essential "to keep pressure on Iran to accept the offer of the international community to come back to the negotiating table."

European Union officials said they would apply the measures next month, including a ban on selling materials and technology that could be used in Iran's nuclear and missile programs and the freezing of the assets of 10 Iranian companies and individuals.

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said it was time to take a tough and united stance on Iran but kept the option of diplomacy open. "There is a need to send a clear signal, and we need to show resolve," he said.

Iranian Cleric Hits Tehran's Tactics (WT/AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

TEHRAN -- Iran's most senior dissident cleric said President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's aggressive nuclear diplomacy had harmed the country, joining a chorus of criticism that has included even the hard-line leader's allies.

The comments by Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, released yesterday, reflected a growing feeling among many that Mr. Ahmadinejad has concentrated too much on fiery, anti-U.S. speeches and not enough on the economy.

Ayatollah Montazeri, 85, is one of a few grand ayatollahs, the most senior theologians of the Shi'ite Muslim faith. He had been the designated successor of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, founder of the 1979 Islamic revolution, until he fell out with Ayatollah Khomeini shortly before his 1989 death after complaining about powers wielded by unelected clerics.

He said Iranians have the right to nuclear power, but questioned Mr. Ahmadinejad's dealings with the international community in obtaining it.

"One has to deal with the enemy with wisdom, not provoke it," he said, according to a copy of his comments made available to the Associated Press.

"This [provocation] only creates problems for the country," he told a group of reformists and opponents of Mr. Ahmadinejad on Friday in the holy city of Qom, 80 miles south of the capital, Tehran.

In the kind of action that might be described as a "provocation" by the dissident ayatollah, Iran said yesterday it has barred 38 members of a U.N. nuclear-inspection team from entering the country, in what appeared to be retaliation for sanctions imposed last month over its contentious atomic program.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said some inspectors were admitted, but he maintained that Iran could decide who should be turned away.

Last month, the U.N. Security Council imposed limited trade sanctions on Iran because of its refusal to cease uranium enrichment, a process that produces the material for nuclear reactors or bombs. Days later, the country's parliament passed a motion that obliged the government to revise its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency but gave it a free hand to determine the steps to be taken.

Meanwhile, the prices of fruit, vegetables and food staples have skyrocketed since the U.N. imposed the limited sanctions.

"Some countries don't have oil and gas. Yet, they run their country and stand on their own. We have so much oil and gas but make useless expenditures work for others and don't think of our own people's problems, and the price of basic commodities go higher and higher every day," Ayatollah Montazeri said.

DOJ_NMG_0120366

Ayatollah Montazeri appeared to be referring to Mr. Ahmadinejad's foreign trips, the latest of which was to Latin America, and to Iranian financial aid to the Palestinians.

The Palestinian foreign minister for the Hamas-led government said in November while visiting Iran that Tehran had given his government more than $120 million in the previous year.

Mr. Ahmadinejad was elected last year on a populist agenda promising to bring oil revenues to every family, eradicate poverty and tackle unemployment. But he has faced increasingly fierce criticism in recent weeks for his failure to meet those promises.

Iran Tests Missiles As Fear Of Attack Grows (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

Iran began military manoeuvres in its central desert on Monday, testing short-range missiles at a time of rising tension with the US and as President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad faces continuing criticism at home.

State radio reported that Revolutionary Guards were test-firing both the 350km-range Zelzal-1 missile and the 70km range Fajr-5 near the town of Garmsar, 80km south-east of Tehran.

Mohsen Rezaei, an influential conservative politician and former Revolutionary Guards commander, told state television at the weekend that Washington had opted for "serious confrontation" with Iran, in which it "intends to resolve its problem in the Middle East".

That was a rare glimpse for the Iranian public of the seriousness with which leading officials view the situation, especially in his acknowledgment that America or Israel might attack Iran's atomic sites.

The US announced this month it was moving a second aircraft carrier into the Gulf and deploying Patriot missiles capable of shooting down shorter-range missiles.

Questioned on Sunday by reporters over the possibility of military clashes, a confident Mr Ahmadi-Nejad replied: "What war?" But he faces criticism over both foreign policy and the budget for the Iranian year 2007-8, which he presented to parliament on Sunday.

Deputies from parliament's economic committees quoted in Monday's newspapers were generally sceptical of the accuracy of the budget figures given by Mr Ahmadi-Nejad. One economist told the Financial Times the budget was "structured in such a way as to hide what looks like a growing deficit".

Kazem Jalali, a deputy, was more poetic. "I hope the president's dreams come true one day," he told Ayandeh-No newspaper.

Criticism has also come from one of the most senior Shia clerics. Grand Ayatollah Hossein-Ali Montazeri made a thinly veiled attack on the president on Saturday for his "radical and provocative slogans", and argued that Iran's rights could be defended without giving "pretexts" to the US.

Grand Ayatollah Montazeri, 85, is a reformist dissident based in the holy city of Qom, where Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's allies won only three of nine seats in last month's local elections.

¦Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran's foreign minister, said on Monday that the country was barring some inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations body monitoring its nuclear facilities.

But Mr Mottaki added confusion when he said Iran would make a statement next week on "the nationalities Iran opposes", apparently contradicting a statement from Alaeddin Boroujerdi, the head of parliament's foreign affairs and national security commission, who said Iran was refusing entry to 38 inspectors but that nationality was "not the main basis".

Melissa Fleming, of the IAEA, said "details of inspector designation" were confidential and the agency was discussing Iran's "request for withdrawing the designation of certain . . . inspectors".

Seoul Asks Washington To Ease Sanctions On Pyongyang: Reports (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

South Korea has told the United States that some of the frozen North Korean accounts in a Macau bank are from legitimate business and should be unblocked, news reports said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0120367

North Korea insists its accounts be unfrozen before any more multinational talks are held on dismantling its nuclear weapons programme.

Chosun Ilbo newspaper quoted an unidentifed high-ranking source in Washington as saying that South Korea asked the United States to consider unfreezing at least five of the 50 accounts with Banco Delta Asia (BDA).

Yonhap news agency also said on Monday that top South Korean officials have told US counterparts that five to seven of the BDA accounts are legitimate.

"This means that as far as we've confirmed, those accounts have nothing to do with drug trafficking, money-laundering or counterfeit dollars," the source was quoted as saying by Chosun.

"Releasing money in those accounts from the freeze is aimed at saving North Korea's face in order to encourage it to proceed with the six-party talks," the source said.

The talks that began in 2003 and reached a tentative deal in September 2005 have failed to bring any tangible progress. Pyongyang insists that a US blacklist, which led to a freeze of its Macau accounts and others in Asia, be withdrawn.

The US has said the matter is a law enforcement issue aimed at curbing the North's counterfeiting of dollars and is unrelated to the six-party talks.

Chosun quoted Kim Kye-Gwan, North Korea's chief delegate to the six-party talks, as saying he and his US counterpart Christopher Hill made progress on the bank issue in talks in Berlin last week.

"When we say progress, it includes the financial sanctions, of course," Kim reportedly told journalists in Moscow.

"(The result of the Berlin talks) was okay with us as we have agreed that the US side must not shun the issue (when the six-party talks resume)."

Hill said on Monday in Tokyo that host China is expected to announce the date for a new round this week.

U.N. Chief Announces N.Korea Fund Audit (AP)

By Justin Bergman

AP, January 23, 2007

Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon announced Monday that an external audit would be conducted of the U.N. Development Program in North Korea after the U.S. alleged the program had funneled millions of dollars to Kim Jong Il's regime.

The audit will initially focus on UNDP spending in North Korea and then be expanded to other U.N. agencies, though details have yet to be finalized, said Ban's spokeswoman, Michele Montas, who made the announcement his behalf.

The audit will be conducted by the U.N.'s Board of Auditors, which is comprised of accountants from eight U.N. members, she said.

U.S. deputy ambassador Mark Wallace alleged Friday that the UNDP's North Korea operation had been run "in blatant violation of U.N. rules" for years. He demanded an outside audit focusing on concerns that development funds had been used by Pyongyang for "its own illicit purposes."

UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis said Monday there is "no justification for the extreme allegations" made by Wallace, adding that UNDP is "doing its best in very difficult circumstances."

The agency said it welcomed the external audit, stressing it is committed to operating in a transparent manner.

"The external auditors can come in anytime they want and look at anything they want," said UNDP spokesman David Morrison.

U.S. officials said they first received indications there might be irregularities in UNDP's North Korea program last year. They raised concerns the cash might be misused, possibly for Pyongyang's nuclear program.

Wallace has made several allegations in letters to senior UNDP officials, which were first reported by The Wall Street Journal. He has said that UNDP's local staff is dominated by North Korean government employees who managed the agency's programs and finances in violation of UNDP rules.

The U.S. cited three other violations of U.N. rules — the government's insistence that UNDP pay cash to North Korean government suppliers, and UNDP's failure to oversee projects it funds in the country or to audit its programs.

On Monday, the agency sought to refute the allegations, insisting the North Korean program followed UNDP financial rules.

DOJ_NMG_0120368

Morrison said the agency has spent about $3 million annually over the last 10 years on programs in North Korea, in addition to about $600,000 in office costs, which include local salaries and supplies. The programs focus on food production, rural and environmental sector management, economic management and social sector management.

Morrison rejected the assertion that UNDP "has been doling out buckets of cash," saying the agency does the vast majority of its spending in euros through checks and bank transfers, using cash only for travel purposes and minor expenses.

He also said UNDP international staff have visited nearly all their project sites in the past two years to ensure funds are being used appropriately.

The UNDP has conducted three internal audits of its North Korean program in the last eight years, the last in 2004. Another internal audit was scheduled for this year, Morrison said.

The agency's executive board was expected to meet Thursday to discuss the program's mandate over the next three years. The agency is working with board members to find a compromise that would allow the program to continue operating in the country, said a UNDP staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity because talks were ongoing.

Ban Orders Audit Of U.N. Operation In N. Korea (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

NEW YORK -- U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday ordered a thorough audit of the U.N. Development Program's operation in North Korea, the first in a sweeping assessment of all U.N. agencies, funds and programs.

The audit will specifically look at hard-currency transactions, the independence of locally hired staff, and the agency's ability to monitor ongoing projects. UNDP, which spends about $3.6 million annually on a dozen projects inside the repressive country, yesterday welcomed the audit and promised to cooperate.

Mr. Ban said he wants the UNDP audit completed within three months, the first phase in an ambitious accounting that could take years and millions of dollars to complete. U.N. officials yesterday could not say how much the effort would eventually cost.

The United States -- which funds 11 percent of UNDP's annual budget but does not contribute to the North Korea program -- has raised serious concerns that hard currency from UNDP may be finding its way into the government's nuclear weapons program.

An editorial in Friday's Wall Street Journal suggested that hundreds of millions of dollars had been diverted by the government from UNDP programs, and said the agency was undermined by permitting the Pyongyang government to choose local personnel for its programs.

David Morrison, UNDP director of communications, told a small group of reporters yesterday that the program has four international staffers in North Korea. Those staffers have been able to visit 10 out of 11 projects in the country and have few concerns over access and monitoring issues, he said.

He rejected comparisons to the Iraq oil-for-food program, which Saddam Hussein was able to manipulate to siphon hundreds of millions of dollars into private pockets.

"Working in [North] Korea is a tough job," he said. "We always have to be wary of the possibility of any kind of misrepresentation of activities in any country in the world."

Mr. Morrison noted that UNDP long ago switched to using euros rather than dollars as the convertible currency in North Korea, in part because of U.S. concerns about counterfeiting and partly because Pyongyang prefers it for political reasons.

U.N. officials routinely refused to publicly criticize the governments of countries where they are running development or humanitarian work, saying that would will only make life more difficult for international staff on the ground, and possibly draw new restrictions on their efforts.

Many of these issues have been identified in UNDP's three internal audits of the North Korea program, in 1999, 2001 and 2004; a fourth will be under way shortly.

DOJ_NMG_0120369

Those audits are not made public or even shared with the 36 nations that serve on UNDP's Executive Board, which will discuss the North Korea program on Thursday. Instead, the reports are reviewed by an external auditor, then distilled further and presented to the executive committee.

U.S. officials, among others, have demanded access to the initial audits, as well as source material, saying that as major donors to UNDP programs they have a right to know how those programs are managed.

However, UNDP officials have maintained the audits are internal management tools and not intended for general distribution.

"We are aware that there is a difference between the regime I've just described and practices the secretariat has just introduced, and we are reviewing whether we should ... change our practice," Mr. Morrison said.

UNDP is also the coordinating agency for other U.N. efforts in the country, including programs of the World Food Program and UNICEF.

U.S. law prohibits using taxpayer money in repressive regimes such as Iran, Cuba and North Korea. Therefore, Washington subtracts its share of the North Korea program's costs from its overall contribution to the agency.

Korean Nuclear Envoys Meet In China (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

The North and South Korean nuclear envoys met in Beijing, the South Korean Foreign Ministry said Tuesday, part of the latest efforts to restart six-nation negotiations on Pyongyang's atomic weapons program.

The South's Chun Yung-woo met North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan in Beijing, the Foreign Ministry said, without giving any further details.

The meeting is the latest in a series of talks between envoys from the countries involved in the six-party negotiations — China, Japan, Russia, the U.S. and the two Koreas — aimed at setting a date for the resumption of wider discussions on dismantling North Korea's nuclear programs.

The last session of the talks in December, the first after the North's nuclear test, failed to make any progress. Officials have said they expect the negotiations to resume before mid-February.

Envoys At N. Korea Talks Optimistic (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, January 23, 2007

Envoys to the six-party talks on North Korean nuclear disarmament are sounding rare notes of optimism, raising hopes for progress after their expected return to the bargaining table in coming weeks.

The talks could bring the first steps toward turning back the clock on North Korea's nuclear development since Pyongyang restarted its main nuclear reactor more than four years ago and proved its long-claimed atomic arsenal with its first test explosion in October.

At the last round of the talks in December, the United States and its partners — China, Japan, Russia and South Korea — could not even get North Korea to talk about its nuclear program. Instead, the North stuck to its previous demand that Washington desist from a campaign to financially isolate the country for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

But there have recently been hints of a positive foundation being laid for future arms talks, even though no date has been set for their resumption. That includes hopeful talk from the North itself, after an unusual series of one-on-one meetings in Berlin last week between the main U.S. and North Korean negotiators.

The North went out of its way Friday to say that a "certain agreement" had been reached at those sessions, sentiment that encouraged other countries involved.

"On the whole, the impression is developing that the North Korean side has interpreted the results of the talks in Berlin with a certain optimism," Russian nuclear envoy Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov said Monday after meeting over the weekend with North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan, according to a report by Russia's Interfax news agency.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who represents Washington at the nuclear talks, said Monday in Beijing that there was "a basis for making progress" when the six-nation nuclear negotiations resume.

DOJ_NMG_0120370

Officials have not publicly elaborated on what progress would mean. But a South Korean newspaper report Monday said the North and U.S. had come close to an agreement in Berlin for freezing North Korea's reactor and allowing the return of international monitoring in exchange for aid for the impoverished country.

Pyongyang kicked out international inspectors at the end of 2002 as it restarted its nuclear reactor. That prompted the latest nuclear crisis, sparked after the U.S. accused the North of a secret uranium enrichment program in violation of an earlier disarmament deal.

Since then the North's reactor has churned out more plutonium for use in bombs, with experts estimating the country could now have enough radioactive material for as much as about a dozen bombs.

The United States also denied a report by the Russian news agency Interfax that separate talks between the U.S. and North Korea on the financial sanctions would resume in Beijing this week.

The six-nation talks started in August 2003, and since then only resulted in a single agreement in September 2005 on a statement of principles for the North's disarmament in exchange for aid and security guarantees. They have yet to be put into practice.

Several envoys have said they expect the nuclear talks to resume before mid-February, when the Lunar New Year is celebrated across Asia.

Actual progress could be added cause for celebration this year on the continent, where North Korea's nuclear ambitions have rattled nerves and raised prospects for an arms race that could spread across northeast Asia.

But if there are no results this time, the holiday will instead be a time for serious soul-searching about the viability of the process — possibly leading to new means of pressuring North Korea to give up its nuclear arms.

Nuke Talks Unencumbered (WT)

By Edward Lanfranco

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

BEIJING -- Christopher R. Hill, the top American envoy for eliminating North Korea's nuclear weapons program, said yesterday that the resumption of six-party talks in Beijing should not be affected by U.S. concerns over China's test of an anti-satellite missile.

"My government's position on that is pretty clear," Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, told reporters. "We've certainly conveyed [concern] to the Chinese, but I would say the six-party talks are on a different track."

Mr. Hill acknowledged having "private discussions" Sunday night with his Chinese counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, about the Jan. 11 test in which China shot down an obsolete satellite with a ballistic missile. He referred further questions to other State Department officials and the Pentagon, saying, "I don't want to be the spokesman on it today."

The American diplomat was in Beijing to inform the Chinese of progress made in Berlin last week during three days of discussions with Kim Kye-gwan, the head of the North Korean delegation to the six-party talks. He already had briefed counterparts in Seoul and Tokyo.

Mr. Kim appears to have shown greater willingness to treat U.S. financial sanctions and North Korean nuclear disarmament as separate issues, clearing the way for a resumption of nuclear negotiations that broke down at the end of December.

Mr. Hill said no venue had been set for discussion of the financial issue, "although that will not be a problem." The State Department will have to "fine-tune the date for the talks" with the Treasury Department, but he predicted they would take place "very soon, probably at the same time or even before the six-party talks."

"We are down to a question of logistics now," he said, adding that his latest talks had been held in Berlin only because of a "coincidence of schedules."

Mr. Hill offered few details about what he called "lengthy discussions" with Mr. Wu, but said the two had agreed on the need to restart the six-party process at an early date.

"We felt we should have done more in the December round, and we want to get going on implementing the September Statement," he said. "We have some ideas for doing that and have had some good discussions all around about how to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0120371

In September 2005, negotiators struck a deal in which North Korea would abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for security guarantees and economic aid. Subsequent six-party talks stalled after the Treasury Department moved to have a North Korean bank account frozen in Macau and were further complicated when Pyongyang detonated a nuclear device in October.

"I don't want to go into the specifics, but I do believe we have a basis for making progress in the six-party talks," Mr. Hill said. "People ask if I'm optimistic. I'd rather not make a bet on the game I'm playing in, but I think based on all the consultations we've had in the last week we have a basis for getting together as soon as possible."

Somali Islamists' No. 2 Leader Surrenders In Kenyan Capital (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 22 — The second in command of Somalia's defeated Islamist forces has surrendered to the Kenyan authorities and is staying at a hotel in Nairobi, Western diplomats and Somali officials said Monday.

Sheik Sharif Ahmed, the head of the Islamist Courts Union executive council, was part of a group of Islamist leaders being hunted down by American and Ethiopian troops in southern Somalia. Described as a moderate Muslim and potential peacemaker, he surfaced at the Kenya-Somalia border in the past week, Somali officials said, and now the Kenyan immigration authorities are deliberating on what to do with him.

"Sheik Sharif is in Nairobi," said Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for Somalia's transitional government. "We are waiting for the next move."

Several Western diplomats said American officials, who have urged Somalia's newly empowered government to reconcile with moderate Islamist leaders, were instrumental in arranging Mr. Ahmed's safe passage to Kenya.

"He decided to come to Kenya only after getting a guarantee from the Americans that he would not be deported" back to Somalia, said one Western diplomat in Nairobi who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He's been here a week."

Over the weekend, the BBC broadcast an interview with Michael E. Ranneberger, the American ambassador to Kenya, in which Mr. Ranneberger said, "We certainly have made clear to the T.F.G.," Somalia's transitional federal government, "that it needs to talk to all elements, and that includes people such as, for example, Sheik Sharif."

At that point, Mr. Ahmed, a school-teacher turned religious leader, was still widely believed to be hiding in the marshes of southern Somalia or possibly dead.

On Monday, an American Embassy official denied that the United States played any role in bringing him to Kenya. "We're not holding or interrogating or protecting him," she said on condition of anonymity. "We're not involved in this operation in any way."

Kenyan officials did not return calls for comment.

European diplomats in Kenya said that American officials were playing an increasingly large behind-the-scenes role in Somalia, pursuing an aggressive counterterrorism agenda but also trying to shape Somalia's political future.

Several Somali leaders seemed to welcome this involvement, saying that Italy, the other Western power in Somalia, had discredited itself by trying to establish a rapport with the Islamists before they were defeated.

Last month, the Islamists attacked Somalia's transitional government, which was based in Baidoa. What they did not expect was a crushing response from Somalia's neighbor Ethiopia, which sided with the transitional government because Ethiopian officials viewed the Islamists as a regional threat.

It took all of one week for the Ethiopian-led forces, with approval from American officials, to rout the Islamist army and install the transitional government in Mogadishu, Somalia's bullet-pocked capital by the sea.

Mogadishu is now loosely controlled by a mix of Ethiopian troops and government soldiers, who are struggling to pacify a population that is armed to the teeth. On Monday, residents said a gun battle between Ethiopian troops and masked men in a crowded livestock market killed seven people, four of them insurgents and three civilians.

Western diplomats said Mr. Ahmed, 42, could be enormously helpful in defusing the violence because he has a devoted following among former Islamist fighters, who are suspected of being the backbone of Somalia's growing insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0120372

United Nations officials said Mr. Ahmed could be granted political asylum in Kenya or another country in the region, possibly Yemen, so that he can meet with Somalia's new leaders on neutral soil and map out a path forward.

Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for transitional president Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, said that if Mr. Ahmed renounced violence, he would be welcome back in Somalia.

"We're not after his blood," Mr. Hassan said.

The case is a little different, though, for Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, the Islamists' top leader. Mr. Aweys is nowhere to be found, and most Somalis believe that he will never turn himself in because American and Ethiopian officials have accused him of being a terrorist.

Somali Islamic Leader Surrenders In Kenya (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

NAIROBI, Jan. 22 -- A top moderate leader of Somalia's ousted Islamic Courts movement surrendered to Kenyan authorities Monday, and U.S. officials are hoping he can help subdue a rising insurgency among the movement's supporters on the streets of the Somali capital, Mogadishu.

After dodging U.S. and Ethiopian airstrikes in the mangrove forests of southern Somalia, Sharif Ahmed is under the protection of Kenyan authorities in a comfortable Nairobi hotel that he is not allowed to leave. U.S. officials have never accused him of any crime and are portraying him as a moderate Islamic leader with whom the Somali government should negotiate.

European Union officials have made reconciliation with Islamic leaders in Somalia a condition of financing a proposal to send African Union peacekeepers to the country.

The U.S. and European diplomatic pressure to negotiate comes as Somali and Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu are conducting house-to-house hunts almost daily for people accused of supporting the Islamic movement, which Ethiopian troops overthrew last month.

The ongoing purge in the broken-down capital is creating an atmosphere veering toward paranoia. Many Somalis, including members of the new government's parliament, have gone into hiding for fear of being arrested, and others are afraid even to talk about the ousted Islamic movement, according to people in several Mogadishu neighborhoods who were interviewed by telephone.

Abdirahman Dinari, a spokesman for the Somali government, declined to comment on the prospect of negotiations with Ahmed or other Islamic leaders. He said the arrests in recent weeks have targeted people suspected of involvement in attacks on Somali and Ethiopian troops, including the shelling of the presidential residence in Mogadishu on Friday. On Saturday, the deputy chairman of the Islamic Courts, Ahmed Qare, asserted responsibility for that attack.

"If there is someone who is innocent, we will release them," Dinari said.

Families, neighbors and some local leaders, however, describe the arrests as part witch hunt and part orchestrated campaign of revenge.

"Anyone known to have spoken out in favor of the Courts is in hiding," said Mohamud Uluso, a prominent member of the sub-sub clan called the Ayr, which had provided substantial military and financial support to the Islamic Courts. "They did not commit any crime, but publicly they supported the Courts. They did not kill anyone. They did nothing."

According to witnesses, the arrests have at times been more like kidnappings, with plainclothes security forces blindfolding people, throwing them into trucks and hauling them off to secret locations. There have been reports of Somalis settling petty arguments with neighbors by accusing them of supporting the Islamic Courts, with Ethiopian troops then swooping in to take the accused away.

While some of those arrested have been released after several days -- or after relatives pay -- others remain missing.

Ethiopian and Somali government troops came after dark last week to Ahmed Luqman's crowded, lantern-lit neighborhood, where he has lived with his wife and six children for more than 20 years.

Soldiers surrounded the area known as Bulo Huvey, broke down a metal gate, shoved their way into a neighbor's house and arrested at least two people whom Luqman has known for years, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0120373

Certain he was next, although not sure why, he climbed through a window and ran.

"I escaped," recounted Luqman, who said he was never a staunch supporter of the Islamic movement. "Now I live somewhere far from where I used to live, because I'm afraid. I'm afraid for myself. I know a lot have been arrested. Some have been killed. But I can't tell exactly the number."

The U.S. State Department tacitly supported the Ethiopian invasion that pushed the Courts movement from power, and in December it cast the Islamic Courts as a group controlled by an al-Qaeda cell. Many regional analysts and diplomats have described that claim as exaggerated.

This month, U.S. and Ethiopian aircraft conducted strikes targeting not only three men suspected in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies -- and whom the Courts were accused of sheltering -- but also certain Courts leaders accused of having al-Qaeda connections.

"To defeat them, the U.S. put them all in one basket," said Uluso, who met with State Department officials when the Islamic Courts came to power last June. "Then, after they were defeated, the thinking was they could maybe reconsider and take the good guys and empower them, so that the image that America is against Islam will not be on the table. Because that has been the impression in the Islamic world."

But the U.S. airstrike in southern Somalia -- aid groups have reported that it killed at least 20 civilians -- plus the continuing arrests are working against the goal of inclusion, said a top leader of the Islamic movement who is still in the region.

The leader, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, warned that if the detentions continue, "things could get ugly."

He said that the leadership of the Islamic Courts is "completely intact" and that U.S. ambassadors have been in contact with some of its members.

Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi has often used the label "terrorist" to justify the detentions. But the pattern of arrests suggests to many analysts in the region that the situation is less about fighting a global war on terrorism than it is about Ethiopia trying to address its internal security problems and help Somali government leaders settle their own old scores.

For one, the arrests are heavily targeting Ayr neighborhoods that had supported the Courts. The Ayr are considered rivals of Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf's clan, the Darod. Moreover, Yusuf, a close ally of Ethiopia, has had a long-standing personal feud with Islamic Courts leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, who is Ayr and is on a U.S. list of people suspected of ties to al-Qaeda. Aweys has consistently denied such ties.

There has also been an ethnic dimension to the arrests. Ethiopian and Somali security forces are focusing on people such as Luqman who are from a region of Ethiopia along the Somali border where an underground group has been fighting for years to end Ethiopian control. The group, the Oromo Liberation Front, was suspected of having people in Mogadishu and of cooperating with the Islamic Courts.

But the Oromo region has also been the scene of droughts and other tribulations that have forced thousands of refugees across the border and into Somali cities, including Mogadishu.

"Whether a man has relations with those organizations or not, he will be arrested," Luqman said. "Because he is Oromo. They can't distinguish if he belongs to the movement or not. So that's the problem."

At one Oromo refugee camp, a sprawl of doorless houses with cardboard roofs, the people left were mostly old men, women and children. A leader there, Abdirahman Omar, 67, said that Ethiopian and Somali troops showed up after morning prayers Jan. 4 and arrested 12 Oromo refugees, including his son, Aden. All remain missing.

"He does not even speak the Oromo language," said Omar, who came to Somalia in 1979 and said his son is a math teacher. "He knows nothing about Ethiopia, let alone Ethiopian politics."

In another neighborhood, Kilometre Four, Habiba Dahir said that her husband, Abdijabar Isee, an Oromo, was arrested recently as he was walking down the street with a Somali friend.

The friend told her later that a plainclothes Somali policeman approached them and asked Abdijabar for his name, and that shortly afterward a pickup truck full of green-uniformed Somali police officers drove up, blindfolded her husband and threw him in the truck with another blindfolded man.

DOJ_NMG_0120374

"At first we were told he was killed, but later we learned he is alive," said Dahir, who denied her husband was involved with any militant movement. "I can't say any more."

China Denies Intent To Militarize Space (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

Chinese Foreign ministry officials have told a visiting U.S. diplomat that China's successful test of an anti-satellite weapon should not be seen as a threat and does not signal the beginning of a race to militarize space, the State Department said Monday.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill raised the issue with Chinese officials over the weekend in Beijing. China has not made a public announcement of the Jan. 11 test, in which it shot down one of its own old weather satellites, but officials acknowledged it during their meeting with Hill, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Hill, who heads the State Department's East Asia bureau, told the Chinese they should be more forthcoming about their military activities and their defense budget. These issues have been a long-running concern of the United States, and McCormack said the Chinese have taken only "baby steps" thus far toward more openness.

McCormack said the United States seeks "greater understanding of exactly what their intent was" in testing the anti-satellite weapon. He said Hill also asked for details of the test and what plans China may have for future tests.

"All of this is designed, really, to avoid any sort of misunderstandings, not only with the United States, but other countries around the world," McCormack said.

Hill was in Beijing as part of a three-nation visit to exchange views on talks with North Korea over its nuclear weapons program. He also visited South Korea and Japan.

In criticizing the test on Friday, the State Department said "modern life as we know it" depends on the security of space-based technology, whose uses include data transmission, communications and weather forecasting.

China Tells Senior US Official Not To Worry About Anti-satellite Test (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

China has told a senior US official that a recent test of a Chinese satellite killer missile did not signal a threat to other countries or a bid to militarize space, the State Department said.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill raised US objections to the test with senior Chinese officials during a visit to Beijing over the weekend, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"The bottom line is we encourage them to be more forthcoming, more transparent with respect to not only this test but also their space program," McCormack said when asked about the message delivered by Hill.

The Chinese, who had not previously confirmed carrying out the test earlier this month, told Hill "this was not a threat against anybody and was not meant to spark a race to militarize space," McCormack told reporters.

Hill was in Beijing for separate talks on organizing a new round of six-party negotiations aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

"It's has been a continuing topic for us to encourage the Chinese to become a little more transparent in terms of their military spending and their military programs," McCormack said.

"They haven't been very forthcoming, is the assessment to date," he said.

The United States revealed last week that China had destroyed an orbiting weather satellite earlier this month using a ballistic missile -- making it the third country after the former Soviet Union and the United States to shoot down an object in space.

The successful test meant China can theoretically shoot down spy satellites or other orbiters operated by other nations, sparking fears of a space-based arms race.

On Friday Washington voiced concern the test may also have scattered debris in space that could endanger the manned International Space Station or orbiting satellites.

DOJ_NMG_0120375

US magazine Aviation Week and Space Technology, which first reported the test, said the missile was fired from the Xichang space center in central Sichuan province on January 11 and had destroyed a Chinese weather satellite launched in 1999.

The impact reportedly occurred more than 500 miles (800 kilometres) above Earth, high enough to hit orbiting satellites.

Washington for now has virtual supremacy in space, with Russia having lost much of its means and China generally still just starting out.

A Global Mission For China And America (FT)

By Robert Zoellick

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

America and China need to develop an agenda as mutual stakeholders in the world economy. The new strategic economic dialogue and the energy group launched by China with the US, India, Japan and South Korea supply the means to do so.

So far the media focus has been on the appreciation of China's currency. Progress on this issue will establish a sense of fair competition. Yet the Sino-American agenda needs to be broader. Some steps can prepare the way for China's transition to a flexible exchange rate. Others lay the foundation for two important economies to advance and share in global prosperity.

ADVERTISEMENT

China is understandably preoccupied by its staggering internal challenges. Nevertheless, its leaders recognise that China's development depends on the international marketplace. The US, in turn, needs to show the American public that China's economic growth creates opportunities and that China will share international responsibilities.

A successful strategy will need to open doors for the US and others to benefit while supporting China's development and encouraging China to help sustain the international economic system to which its growth is linked. Take China's core concern: the creation of a "harmonious society". China's leaders are striving for more balanced development – between the coast and the interior, the cities and countryside, the rich and poor, the environment and growth. China is seeking to boost consumption, in part to lower the high savings rate that fuels the contentious current account surplus.

America can assist these transformations. US businesses can help develop the interior and link these provinces to global sourcing networks. American farm products can lower the cost of food as rural Chinese move to higher value-added products. US retailers can help Chinese consumers get better goods and services at lower prices, just as they do for families at home.

Second, the Chinese have a high savings rate because the old social safety net has disintegrated. Given the one-child policy and rising longevity, China will grow old before it grows wealthy. It would benefit from US private sector involvement in building healthcare and funded pension systems.

Third, China's high rate of investment has masked the fact that investment returns have been declining because capital is allocated inefficiently. China is starting to complement its reform of commercial banks with steps to strengthen insurance and equity markets, develop a bond market and foster asset management and disposition services. Properly pursued, these plans offer business opportunities for US and other foreign companies and create the prerequisites for opening China's capital markets and freeing its currency. That step will enable China's central bank to rely on monetary policy tools to moderate inevitable fluctuations, instead of being tied to exchange rate targets.

Fourth, China and the US share energy and environmental interests. Both need to expand energy supplies to nuclear, clean coal and renewables. Both would benefit from more diverse sources of oil and gas. Both need advances in energy efficiency. Both need to co-ordinate strategic reserves with international partners to cope with shocks. Both need to protect the energy transport choke-points.

Fifth, China wants a "knowledge economy". This creates a mutual interest in protecting intellectual property and preventing counterfeiting. There is a need for educational services, including innovative information technology. China should be encouraged to participate in the development of international technology standards, rather than using local standards to protect against competition.

Sixth, as Chinese businesses “go global”, both countries will have an interest in open, fair and transparent investment policies. Chinese companies will be pressed to improve corporate governance, transparency and to rely on private capital. When Chinese companies invest in developing markets, they should abide by standards for sustainable development and good governance.

Finally, China can be a responsible stakeholder in international economic, health, environmental and energy regimes. Since the new head of the World Health Organisation is Chinese, China can set a standard in practices to counter infectious diseases, chronic ailments and pandemics. China could strengthen enforcement against trade in endangered species and join the International Tropical Timber Organization. As a big investor in Sudan, it can press Khartoum to accept United Nations peacekeepers in Darfur. As one of the beneficiaries of the global trading system, China should play a more active role in closing a deal in the WTO’s Doha round.

China is sensitive to the history of rising powers. Its own story is different from past examples. China wants its economic rise to complement, not replace, the current order. If the US and China recognise the strategic stakes in guiding this transition, they can develop an agenda that builds confidence and support in both countries and beyond.

US Plans 'Substantial' Aid Pledge For Lebanon Government (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 23, 2007

The United States will announce a substantial aid package for Lebanon at a donors conference in Paris this week aimed at bolstering the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, senior US officials said.

The offer, to be unveiled Thursday by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, will come on top of more than 230 million dollars already pledged by Washington to help rebuild Lebanon following the devastating war between Israel and the Islamic militia Hezbollah last July and August.

"It will be substantial," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said of the new US contribution to Siniora's government, which since the war has been locked in a power struggle with Hezbollah and other pro-Syrian parties.

McCormack would not provide details of the US aid proposal.

But another senior official said it would be "an equivalent vigorous effort" in comparison to the 230 million dollars pledged by Washington at a donors conference in Stockholm shortly after a UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the war.

Washington has also begun delivering 39 million dollars in military hardware and other assistance to Lebanon's army, which under the UN plan moved into Hezbollah's stronghold along the Israeli border.

Siniora's government has estimated the 34-day Israeli offensive against Hezbollah left 3.5 billion dollars in damage, including flattened villages in south Lebanon and the destruction of major infrastructure around the country.

Israel attacked after Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid.

Siniora has since faced a growing challenge from Hezbollah's political arm and allied parties seen as close to Syria, which dominated the country until being forced by popular protests to withdraw its troops in 2005.

The administration of President George W. Bush cites Lebanon alongside Iraq and the Palestinian areas as key battlegrounds in a strategic confrontation between Arab moderates and radical forces backed by Syria and Iran.

The one-day conference in Paris will draw ministers and other top officials from some 30 potential donor countries in a potent show of support for Siniora, the senior official said.

In addition to pledges of aid, the conference is expected to endorse an ambitious five-year economic reform plan drawn up by Siniora in collaboration with international financial institutions, the United States and other governments.

The plan, which includes a sales tax hike and the privatization of Lebanon's electricity and mobile telephone sectors, has drawn sharp criticism from Hezbollah and its allies, who have called a general strike for Tuesday ahead of the Paris meeting.

Hezbollah, a fundamentalist Shiite Muslim party, is seeking to oust Siniora's Western-backed government and replace it with a national unity cabinet in which the pro-Syrian opposition would have a veto.

DOJ_NMG_0120377

The senior US official said the Paris meeting's backing for the reform plan, which was under discussion well before the Israel-Hezbollah war, was more important in the long term than specific aid pledges.

"The basic bargain has been that if they were willing to undertake these reforms, we would work with the international community in marshalling support for Lebanon," said the official, who spoke to AFP on condition he not be named.

He acknowledged the reforms were "politically difficult" due to Hezbollah's opposition and because some measures will involve painful economic adjustments.

"So Lebanon will need help as it goes through this, and that's why people are gathering now in Paris," he said.

While insisting the Paris conference was about helping all Lebanese and not just Siniora, the US officials said it would also highlight the failure of Hezbollah and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, to repair the war damage.

"There are a lot of questions in Lebanon about the mess that (Nasrallah) created," the official said, noting that the war left more than 750,000 displaced persons and devastated whole sectors of the economy.

"Why is it that they have joined -- and get this for ignominy -- Syria, Yemen and Iraq as the only countries in the Arab world which had negative per capita GDP growth rates last year?" he asked.

"These are things for which he and his leadership are responsible and I think there are many Lebanese who ask themselves, 'Did we deserve this?'"

U.S. To Contribute To Lebanon Revival (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, January 23, 2007

The United States will announce a substantial contribution to Lebanon at an international donors' conference this week as part of an effort to rebuild the country and strengthen its western-backed government, State Department officials said.

The total is expected to exceed the $230 million that the United States contributed for reconstruction efforts last year, a senior administration official said Monday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because details of the proposal have not been announced.

The money, which would have to be approved by Congress, would be a major increase over the $30 million to $40 million that Washington had pledged for aid to Lebanon in recent years. The funds will be announced at a donors' conference in Paris, which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will attend.

The U.S. contribution is expected to include an effort the U.S. announced last October to rebuild a vital bridge on the Beirut-Damascus highway, which is expected to cost about $20 million. Israeli jets bombed the structure during last summer's 34-day war against Hezbollah, the militant group backed by Syria and Iran.

The donors meeting comes amid efforts to buttress Lebanon's government, which is led by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. Since Dec. 1, Hezbollah has staged street protests and sit-ins aimed at toppling Saniora's government.

At the State Department on Monday, spokesman Sean McCormack said the donors' conference will demonstrate "the support of the international system for this democratically elected government and also the international system's support for the Lebanese people."

Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns said in Israel on Sunday that the assistance will be part of a world effort to defend Lebanon "from that axis of countries, Iran and Syria, and organizations like Hezbollah, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and others."

The donor's conference will be chaired by French President Jacques Chirac.

After the meeting in Paris, Rice will travel to Brussels for a NATO meeting that will focus on Afghanistan and the resources needed to restore stability there in the face of continuing insurgent activities, McCormack said.

The meeting also will touch on the issue of NATO countries in Afghanistan that are declining to send troops to regions in the south, where the bulk of the violence is taking place. Canada and Britain are among the countries that have troops in Afghanistan's south.

Activity Picks Up For Mideast Talks (AP)

By Amy Teibel

AP, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120378

After months of inaction, a flurry of diplomatic activity toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking is under way. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is planning a summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, top Israeli officials are floating peace initiatives and the moderate Palestinian president says he is ready to discuss the outlines of a final settlement.

But with Hamas militants dominating the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, and weak leadership on all sides, no one expects a deal any time soon.

The U.S. and Israel are trying to build on the "road map" peace plan by initiating confidence-building steps such as easing financial sanctions on the Palestinians and lifting West Bank roadblocks. They are also holding out the prospect of more wide-ranging concessions to help Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his power struggle against Hamas militants.

"We're at the pre-negotiation stage where the emphasis is on confidence-building measures," Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said Monday. "But we're not talking about the substance."

The 2003 road map — which outlines a staged plan for creating a Palestinian state alongside Israel — never got off the ground because each side failed to meet its initial obligations. With the Israeli-Palestinian peace process in deep freeze since 2000, and the political rise of Hamas in the Palestinian territories, moderates on each side have found themselves with little choice but to start talking again.

In the past few weeks, the Israeli and Palestinian leaders held their first substantive meeting, and Israel followed up by transferring $100 million in frozen tax revenues to Abbas.

Rice has promised to lead a summit with Abbas and Olmert by mid-February, and is talking about reinvigorating U.S. involvement in Mideast peacemaking.

Meanwhile, the estranged leaders of the two most powerful Palestinian factions, Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, met over the weekend in Syria to try to put together a governing coalition that could negotiate with Israel. Though they did not reach agreement, they said they would continue the dialogue.

Early next month, the so-called quartet of Mideast peace brokers who launched the road map — the U.S., the European Union, Russia and the U.N. — also plan to meet to explore ways to re-energize peacemaking.

Sharp differences have emerged between the Israeli and Palestinian positions, however. The Palestinians oppose an Israeli proposal for a provisional Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, believing Israel could use it to usurp land while the sides negotiate endlessly over so-called final status issues.

It is precisely the big-picture issues — final borders, the status of disputed Jerusalem and the Palestinians' demand to repatriate refugees and their descendants — that have caused past peace talks to collapse.

"We are for negotiations on a final status agreement, even if there are (confidence-building) steps," said Nimr Hammad, a political adviser to Abbas. "But (those steps) must be tied to a final status agreement."

The failure to reach agreement at the Abbas-Mashaal meeting bodes poorly for a resolution that could end months of Palestinian infighting. With Hamas holding so much power, Abbas' room for maneuvering in negotiations with Israel could be severely limited.

If the international community wants to move ahead in a meaningful peace process, "we have to get our act together internally," said Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator.

Israel and the U.S. insist they are not abandoning the road map, but rather attempting to find creative ways to revive it.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz have each offered peace plans based on the road map. Livni asked to strengthen Palestinian moderates by painting a clear picture of what a provisional Palestinian state would look like, and Peretz said a final peace deal could be reached within two years.

"Time is running out and we must use it to strengthen the moderates," Peretz said in a speech Monday at a security conference.

Speaking later at the same conference, Livni insisted the international community keep up pressure on Hamas beyond statements of principles.

"Now we are demanding that they enforce their values ... as a way of strengthening the moderates and weakening the extremists," she said.

Egypt has questioned the road map's viability, however, calling for a final deal that would bypass the plan's initial stages.

DOJ_NMG_0120379

Another obstacle to getting peace talks moving again is the weakness of the leading players.

A combination of corruption allegations and Israel's summer war with Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon have widely discredited Olmert in the eyes of the Israeli public.

Although his international standing is strong, Abbas has not prevailed over Hamas. And President Bush has his hands full with Iraq and a dismal approval rating at home, though achievements on the Israeli-Palestinian front could help burnish the U.S. image in the region.

Skeptics do not see real momentum building.

"No one treats the road map seriously any more," said Yossi Beilin, a dovish Israeli lawmaker who was involved in several rounds of negotiations with the Palestinians.

The re-energized U.S. involvement is intended "to create the impression that the Middle East is on their agenda," Beilin said. "They want to guarantee a pragmatic Arab coalition, and they know the stumbling block is the Arab-Israeli conflict," he said. "And since they can't solve it, they make do with talking about it."

Palestinian Factions Set To Resume Unity Talks (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, January 23, 2007

Palestinians were preparing to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after inconclusive talks between Khaled Meshaal, leader of the ruling Hamas movement, and president Mahmud Abbas, head of the rival Fatah party.

A statement from the umbrella group of Palestinian factions Monday said a meeting would take place in Gaza City on Tuesday between representatives of Fatah and Hamas, but gave no further details.

"We hope to achieve an inter-Palestinian understanding through this dialogue, because the Palestinian people and the factions have no alternative," Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan said.

Speaking for Fatah, Tawfiq Abu Khusa said, "We need a government capable of lifting the blockade, reducing the suffering of our people and getting the Palestinian cause back on the international agenda."

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erakat, speaking from Damascus, echoed Abu Khusa, while stressing that the new government's political programme would have to be "acceptable to the Palestinians, the Arabs and the international community."

Abbas and Meshaal said after meeting in Damascus on Sunday that their respective factions were committed to further dialogue "within two weeks" to try to resolve remaining differences.

The talks had been touted as key to resolving the long-running feud between Fatah and Hamas, where intermittent violence that boiled over in December left more than 30 people dead.

Fatah and Hamas have tried for months to agree on a unity government in the hope of ending a boycott and aid freeze by the United States and the European Union that crippled the already staggering Palestinian economy.

Washington and the EU consider Hamas to be a terrorist group and suspended direct financial aid to the Palestinians after it took power in March because the Islamists refuse to renounce violence or recognise Israel's right to exist.

"We reiterate that dialogue is the only way to resolve our political differences," Meshaal said at a joint press conference, adding that it was wrong to speak of a "power struggle" within the Palestinian Authority.

"There are still points of divergence but the dialogue will continue in Gaza ... or outside to arrive at the formation of a government of national unity," he said.

A joint statement issued after the meeting stressed that discussions had "made progress."

Both sides condemned the spilling of Palestinian blood and agreed to avoid provocation.

Last month's clashes erupted after Abbas said he would call for early elections as a way of resolving the standoff with Hamas, which vehemently rejected the move as an attempted coup and warned it could set off civil war.

Russia, one of the four members of the Middle East peace quartet, Monday welcomed the talks in Syria even though they ended inconclusively.

DOJ_NMG_0120380

Contacts "will eventually lead to formation of a coalition government" that meets international demands for Hamas to renounce violence and recognise Israel's right to exist, allowing for the lifting of the boycott and aid freeze, foreign ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin said in Moscow.

"In those circumstances a real chance appears for positive steps forward in Palestinian-Israeli relations and the resumption of a meaningful negotiations process between Israel and the Palestinian Authority on the basis of the roadmap," Kamynin said.

In Amman, Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Jawdeh too welcomed Sunday's talks.

"If the result of the meeting ... leads to reviving the peace process, a national unity government, and a halt to inter-Palestinian fighting and bloodshed, then all this is positive and Jordan supports it," he said.

Father Of Dead West Bank Girl Seeks Peace With Israelis (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

ANATA, West Bank, Jan. 22 — Even as Bassam Aramin mourns his 10-year-old daughter, killed last week during a clash between stone-throwing Palestinian youths and the Israeli police, he says he wants to talk to Israelis about making peace.

It has been a long journey for Mr. Aramin, 38, a former Palestinian fighter. He spent seven years in Israeli jails, from 1986 to 1993, for weapons possession and for belonging to the Fatah movement, which was banned at the time.

But his views gradually changed, and for the past two years he has been an active member of Combatants for Peace, a group of former Palestinian militants and former Israeli soldiers who have teamed up to urge reconciliation to both sides.

With his Israeli partner, Zohar Shapira, a former member of an elite commando unit, Mr. Aramin has been speaking to students and community groups in Israel and the West Bank.

“Over time I became convinced that we couldn’t solve our problem with weapons and we had to talk to the other side,” said Mr. Aramin, who lives in Anata, on the outskirts of Jerusalem. “I want to keep talking to Israelis so they can understand what happened to my daughter.”

His daughter, Abir, was in an upbeat mood last Tuesday after completing a math exam at the Anata Girls School. She walked out the front gate and crossed the dusty street, where she bought a small gift for her mother, Salwa, who had helped her study.

As Abir emerged from the store, a clash was erupting between stone-throwing Palestinian youths and the Israeli border police. A moment later Abir was hit in the back of the head, a blow that threw her headlong into the street, according to her sister, Areen, 12, who was with her. After three days in Hadassah University Hospital in Jerusalem, Abir died without ever regaining consciousness.

Israel’s separation barrier, a towering concrete wall here, is just a few yards from the adjacent boys’ and girls’ schools, and the area was the scene of frequent confrontations during its construction. But work on the wall was finished several months ago, and the area was calm until the border police began patrolling neighborhoods on the West Bank side of the wall in recent days. Youths threw stones at the Israeli jeeps on several occasions, residents said.

Areen and other Palestinian witnesses say they have no doubt that Abir was hit by Israeli fire. Michael Sfard, a prominent Israeli lawyer representing the Aramin family, said he had received a rubber-coated steel bullet that witnesses said they had found at the scene, which he presented to the Israeli police.

A preliminary report of the autopsy conducted by an Israeli government pathologist and one appointed by the Aramin family found that Abir’s head wounds were consistent with the impact of a rubber-coated bullet, though other possibilities could not be ruled out, Mr. Sfard said.

But the Israeli police say the autopsy did rule out the possibility of a rubber-coated bullet. The police say an investigation has found that police officers fired tear gas but has not confirmed the use of such bullets. A police official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the inquiry is continuing, said the police suspected that Abir might have been hit by a rock that one of the Palestinians had thrown toward the police.

The Aramin family adamantly rejects the police theory and is quick to note the strong support they have received from Israelis, particularly those from Mr. Aramin’s group.

DOJ_NMG_0120381

"They were at the hospital with me the entire time," said Mr. Aramin, who works at the Palestinian National Archives in Ramallah. "I received phone calls from tens of Israelis expressing their sympathy for my family and condemning the killing of my daughter."

In a conflict so long and bitter, killings more often prompt calls for revenge rather than understanding. Mr. Aramin said his own outlook had changed slowly, over many years.

Like many Palestinian prisoners, he learned to speak Hebrew while in jail and began conversing with prison guards and watching Israeli television. The peace negotiations of the 1990s gave him hope, and despite the chronic fighting of the last several years, his work with Combatants for Peace has helped sustain him, he said.

The group has about 300 members, with about half from each side, according to Avichay Sharon, 25, an Israeli who was one of the founders and who spent time at the hospital alongside Mr. Aramin.

"When I heard what happened I rushed to the hospital," Mr. Sharon said. "All of us took it upon ourselves to do what we could. Bassam knows there are a lot of people who love him and care about him."

The Israeli members of Combatants for Peace have already served their mandatory military service, though they may be called up for reserve duty that can last for several weeks each year. As an infantry soldier, Mr. Sharon fought in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip from 2000 to 2003. He decided he would not do it again as a reservist.

"I wouldn't point to any one incident," said Mr. Sharon, now a student at Hebrew University in philosophy and Jewish studies. "It was an accumulation of events that opened my eyes."

As a reservist he works in logistics and does not expect to be sent into Palestinian areas. But other members of Combatants for Peace have refused such orders, and served jail time as a result.

The group has held dozens of meetings in recent months, but finding an audience remains a challenge.

"I wouldn't say it's simple," Mr. Sharon said. "Many Israelis don't want a dialogue with someone they think is a terrorist. Palestinians don't want to speak to people they see as occupiers."

Israeli members wanted to pay condolences in Anata, where Mr. Aramin lives with his wife and their five surviving children. But the Aramin family advised against it, fearing that angry neighbors might insult a visiting Israeli, or worse.

Mr. Aramin said he would soon be back at work with his Israeli colleagues.

"I want my daughter to be the last victim," he said. "There are partners on the other side who believe what I believe."

Veteran Of Lebanon Campaigns Is Set To Lead Israeli Army (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 22 — A former infantry officer who commanded Israeli troops against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon for many years was appointed Monday as the Israeli military's new chief of staff.

Gabi Ashkenazi, 52, a former general and currently the director general of the Defense Ministry, was chosen to replace Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, who resigned last week after heavy criticism of his handling of the war in Lebanon last summer.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz agreed on the appointment at a meeting on Monday evening, the prime minister's office said. The nomination must still be approved by the cabinet and a government committee.

In a country where security is the paramount issue, the army chief is one of the country's most important and closely scrutinized positions. The vast majority of Israelis were disappointed with the inconclusive outcome of the one-month war last year with Hezbollah, the radical Islamic group.

Since then, the Israeli news media have engaged in almost daily speculation over possible shake-ups in the military. Two senior officers resigned before General Halutz announced last week that he also was stepping down.

Mr. Olmert has also faced intense criticism and has seen his poll ratings crash. In addition, Mr. Peretz has come under pressure to resign, but insists that he will not.

The prime minister has appointed a committee to examine how the war was handled. In response to a petition by a private group, Israel's High Court of Justice on Monday ordered Mr. Olmert's government to explain why naming a new chief of staff should not be delayed until the committee presents its report. But the nomination indicated that Mr. Olmert plans to press ahead.

General Ashkenazi began his military service in 1972. Last July, he was appointed the Defense Ministry's director general.

U.S. Looks To Poland For Missile-shield Site (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

The United States is asking Poland to allow ground-based interceptor missiles on its territory as part of a missile-defense system, the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw said Monday. Polish Defense Minister Radek Sikorski indicated a willingness to discuss the issue with "our most important ally" but said nothing had been decided. Poland joined NATO in 1999.

The prime minister of the Czech Republic — another NATO member that was once part of the Soviet bloc — said Saturday that the United States has asked to base a radar station in his country for the system.

U.S. officials have said the missile shield is not intended as a defense against Russia, but the prospect of sophisticated U.S. radar and interceptor systems in formerly communist Eastern Europe has led to Russian warnings of a new arms race. The system "would create a clear threat for Russia," Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, the chief of Russia's Space Forces, said Monday.

Serbian president backs reform coalition

Serbian President Boris Tadic urged pro-democratic reform parties to put their differences aside and quickly form a coalition government to stave off gains made over the weekend by ultranationalists in parliamentary elections. The formation of a government has taken on added urgency because a United Nations report this week will probably recommend that the southern Serbian province of Kosovo become independent. The Serb Radicals, loyal to the ideas of the late Slobodan Milosevic and opposed to Kosovo's independence, gained seats but fell well shy of a majority. Democratic parties are trying to form a coalition government.

Somali militia leader reportedly gives up

A top leader of the Islamic militia that was driven from power in Somalia surrendered to authorities in neighboring Kenya, the Associated Press reported. Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed of the Council of Islamic Courts was flown to Nairobi, according to a police report seen by the AP. In Somalia, the remnants of the militia are being hunted by Ethiopian troops and forces from Somali's transitional government. The militia, which had gained control of most of the country, was ousted in December. Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on one another.

Clashes in Guinea leave 10 dead

At least 10 civilians were killed and 115 were wounded in Guinea's capital, Conakry, when security forces clashed with protesters seeking the ouster of President Lansana Conte, hospital officials said. Most of the casualties appeared to have been caused by security forces firing on demonstrators, said Ousmane Bah, a physician who treated some of the victims. Protesters are in the second week of a strike aimed at toppling Conte, who seized power in a 1984 coup and has refused to step down despite ill health.

U.S. Plans Missile Bases In Europe (AP)

By Vanessa Gera

AP, January 23, 2007

The United States has entered a decisive phase in a plan to set up missile defense sites in Eastern Europe — a system Washington says is aimed at protecting itself and its allies against potential attacks from the Middle East.

But the prospect of sophisticated U.S. radar and interceptor systems in formerly communist Eastern Europe has led Russian military leaders to warn of a new arms race. The system "would create a clear threat for Russia," Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, the chief of Russia's Space Forces, warned Monday.

The United States told Polish leaders it wants to open formal negotiations on the possibility of locating ground-based interceptor missiles in their country as part of a larger missile defense system, a U.S. Embassy spokesman in Warsaw said Monday.

Poland's Defense Minister Radek Sikorski indicated a willingness to talk with "our most important ally" on the issue, but said nothing had been decided.

The request comes after two years of exploratory talks and after the neighboring Czech Republic's prime minister said Saturday that Washington had asked to base a radar station in his country as another part of the system.

DOJ_NMG_0120383

Washington has repeatedly sought to reassure Russia it has nothing to fear from the system — a message Andrew Schilling, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw, echoed Monday. He told The Associated Press a U.S. missile defense system in Europe would be solely aimed at countering "the evolving Middle Eastern ballistic missile threat."

Some experts single out Iran as the motivator behind the U.S. push to develop the system, meant to act as a protective umbrella over most of continental Europe with sensitive radars able to detect ballistic missiles and interceptors that could shoot them down.

"This is completely driven by the threat from Iran," said Riki Ellison, president of the Missile Defense Advocacy Alliance, a non-governmental group that promotes missile defense in the belief it increases world security.

"As Iranians continue to grow both their nuclear capabilities and their ballistic missile capabilities, this site in central Europe is needed," Ellison argued. "Not only for Europe and the troops that the United States has stationed in Europe ... but also for secondary protection of the United States."

Schilling said the request to Polish officials was first made Friday and a "formal diplomatic note" would follow. The U.S. hopes talks on the plan will begin "in the course of the next several months," he added.

Agreement is not guaranteed. Both the Czech and Polish parliaments would have to first approve the plan. Although their governments expressed their support, they are weak and face broad public opposition to the plan. Many fear it will raise the risk of attacks on their countries.

"The current governments are in favor because both of them are right-of-center and Euro-skeptic and they think that as far as security is concerned, they have to maintain very close ties with the United States," said Jiri Pehe, a Czech political analyst and director of New York University in Prague.

By supporting U.S. missile defense, the two European Union members are showing they do not trust the EU to guarantee their security — and are perhaps even trying to prevent the formation of a unified EU defense policy, Pehe said.

So far, four countries have working missile defense shields, including the U.S., which has interceptor bases in California and Alaska. Russia, Israel and Japan also have systems, while about 15 countries are also working to develop them, Ellison said.

In past months, Russian military leaders have occasionally threatened that an expansion of the U.S. system so close to its borders could provoke a new arms race.

But Pehe, the Czech analyst, said Russian threats should be taken with a grain of salt.

"Russians in the past have threatened to do all kinds of things — for example when NATO was enlarged," Pehe said. "I think they are aware that this particular system, if it's ever built, isn't aimed against them. I would see this more as pressure — and a bit of bluffing."

Global View Of U.S. Worsens, Poll Shows (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The global view of the United States' role in world affairs deteriorated significantly again last year, according to a poll of more than 26,000 people in 25 countries.

Negative feelings about the war in Iraq were prevalent, and nearly 7 in 10 people polled said the American military presence in the Middle East provoked more violence than it prevented.

In 18 countries polled previously, an average of 29 percent of those surveyed saw the United States as having a mainly positive influence, down from 36 percent last year.

Across all 25 countries, half of those polled said the United States played a mainly negative role in the world, according to the poll, done for the BBC World Service by GlobeScan and the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland.

Disapproval of the way the United States handled the Iraq war was strikingly strong, at 73 percent.

View Of US's Global Role 'worse' (BBC)

BBCNEWS, January 23, 2007

The World Service survey, conducted in 25 nations including the US, found that three in four respondents disapproved of how Washington had dealt with Iraq.

The majority of the 26,381 respondents also disapproved of the way five other foreign policy areas had been handled.

The poll, released ahead of President Bush's State of the Union speech, was conducted between November and January.

Poll findings in more detail

At-a-glance

The number of those who said the US was a positive influence in the world fell in 18 nations polled in previous years.

In those countries, 29% of people said the US had a positive influence, down from 36% last year and 40% two years ago.

Across the 25 countries polled, 49% of respondents said the US played a mainly negative role in the world.

In Kenya, Nigeria, the Philippines and the US most of those polled said they thought America had a positive role.

But among Americans, the number of those who viewed their country's role positively fell to 57% - six percentage points down from last year and 14 percentage points down from two years ago.

Mid-East role

Respondents were also asked about the Bush administration's handling of six areas of foreign policy:

The war in Iraq: an average of 73% of respondents disapproved (57% in the US). Disapproval was strongest in Argentina and France, while people in Nigeria, Kenya and the Philippines were more likely to approve.

Detainees in Guantanamo: 67% disapproved (50% in the US). Backing for America on this issue was highest in Nigeria, where 49% approved.

Israeli-Hezbollah war: Washington's role met with approval from respondents in Nigeria and Philippines, but on average 65% disapproved across the 25 countries (50% in the US).

Iran's nuclear programme: again, support for US actions appeared strongest in Kenya (62%), Nigeria (53%) and the Philippines (52%). But, overall 60% of respondents disapproved (50% in the US).

Global warming: more than 80% of respondents in Argentina, France and Germany disapproved compared to 56% overall (54% in the US). But the White House had 50% or more support among those polled in Nigeria, Kenya, the Philippines and South Korea.

North Korea's nuclear programme: opposition to US policy was strongest among respondents in Argentina and Brazil. On average across the 25 countries 54% disapproved (43% in the US).

When asked about US military presence in the Middle East, an average of 68% of respondents across the 25 countries answered that it "provokes more conflict than it prevents".

Views On U.S. Drop Sharply In Worldwide Opinion Poll (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 23 -- Global opinion of U.S. foreign policy has sharply deteriorated in the past two years, according to a BBC poll released on the eve of President Bush's annual State of the Union address.

Nearly three-quarters of those polled in 25 countries disapprove of U.S. policies toward Iraq, and more than two-thirds said the U.S. military presence in the Middle East does more harm than good. Nearly half of those polled in Europe, Africa, Asia, South America and the Middle East said the United States is now playing a mainly negative role in the world.

More than 26,000 people were questioned for the survey.

"It's been a horrible slide," said Doug Miller, president of GlobeScan, an international polling company that conducted the BBC survey with the Program on International Policy Attitudes, an affiliate of the University of Maryland. He said views of U.S. policy have steadily declined since the annual poll began two years ago.

In the 18 countries previously polled by the BBC, people who said the United States was having a generally positive influence in the world dropped to 29 percent, from 36 percent last year and 40 percent the year before.

"I thought it had bottomed out a year ago, but it's gotten worse, and we really are at historic lows," said Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes. Kull attributed much of the problem to a growing perception of "hypocrisy" on the part of the United States in such areas as cooperation with the United Nations and other international bodies, especially involving the use of military force.

"The thing that comes up repeatedly is not just anger about Iraq," Kull said, adding that the BBC poll is consistent with numerous other surveys around the world that have measured attitudes toward the United States. "The common theme is hypocrisy. The reaction tends to be: 'You were a champion of a certain set of rules. Now you are breaking your own rules, so you are being hypocritical.' "

The BBC survey found that a majority of those polled hold negative views on U.S. policies on a wide range of issues. Sixty-seven percent disapproved of U.S. handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Sixty-five percent disliked the U.S. stance on last summer's military conflict between Israel and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon, 60 percent opposed U.S. policies on Iran's nuclear program, 56 percent opposed Washington's position on global climate change and 54 percent disapproved of U.S. policies toward North Korea.

"If this keeps up, it's going to be very difficult for the United States to exercise its moral suasion in the world," Miller said.

The survey of 26,381 people was conducted in Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Britain, Chile, China, Egypt, France, Germany, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Italy, Kenya, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, the Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Russia, South Korea, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and the United States. The polling took place from November to January.

Although Prime Minister Tony Blair has been Bush's chief foreign ally in the Iraq war, British views of U.S. policies were particularly negative. Fifty-seven percent of Britons surveyed said the United States plays a mainly negative role in the world; 33 percent said the U.S. influence was mainly positive, down three percentage points from last year.

Eighty-one percent of Britons opposed U.S. actions in Iraq, while 72 percent said the U.S. military presence in the Middle East provokes more conflict than it prevents. Just 14 percent of Britons said the United States was a "stabilizing force" in the region.

Globally, the most common view in 23 of the 25 countries is that the United States is causing more Middle East conflict than it is preventing; the most common view in only one country, Nigeria, was that U.S. policies were "stabilizing" the region.

Views of U.S. foreign policy are also becoming more negative among U.S. citizens, the poll found. Of the 1,000 Americans surveyed, 57 percent said the United States is having a mainly positive influence in the world. That is down from 63 percent last year and 71 percent two years ago.

Armenian Editor's Death Leads To Conciliation (NYT)

By Susanne Fowler And Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 22 — The killing of an Armenian-Turkish editor in Istanbul last week and the sorrow it has generated within Turkey are leading to rare conciliatory gestures between Turkey and Armenia, historic enemies, and to calls for changes in laws here defending Turkish identity.

On Monday, Armenian political and spiritual figures accepted an invitation from the Turkish government to attend the funeral of Hrant Dink, the founder of an Armenian-Turkish newspaper, who was killed outside his office on Friday, apparently by a young nationalist fanatic.

The suspect in the slaying, Ogun Samast, 17, was escorted back to the scene of the crime Sunday night by law enforcement authorities.

The head of the Istanbul security forces said that Mr. Samast "was driven to commit the crime by his nationalistic feelings" and had no ties to any group.

Mr. Dink was a staunch defender of free speech and like other intellectuals was prosecuted for insulting "Turkishness" and sentenced to six months in jail, though his term was suspended.

Bulent Arinc, the parliamentary chairman from the ruling Justice and Development Party, said he would back efforts to abolish the measure under which Mr. Dink was prosecuted, known as Article 301.

"It can be discussed to totally abolish or completely revise the Article 301," Mr. Arinc said, adding that members of Parliament "are open to this."

DOJ_NMG_0120386

Despite the fact that the Armenian-Turkish border has been sealed since 1993 and diplomatic relations severed, Armenia is sending a deputy foreign minister, Arman Kirakossian, to the funeral, and the archbishop of the Armenian Church of America, Khajag Barsamian, also accepted the government's invitation to the ceremony.

Earlier, the Armenian defense minister, Serzh Sarkisyan, called for improved relations so that Armenia could "establish ties with Turkey with no preconditions," the Turkish news channel NTV reported.

High-level Turkish government officials are expected to attend the funeral.

Turkey and Armenia have long been at odds over Turkey's refusal to use the term "genocide" to describe the deaths of Armenians beginning in 1915. Many scholars and most Western governments say more than a million Armenians were killed in a campaign they describe as genocide. Turkey calls the loss of life a consequence of a war in which both sides suffered casualties, and has suggested that a group of envoys from each country analyze the history. Armenia has expressed a willingness to participate but insists that the border must first be reopened to trade.

But many Armenians living abroad hold a much harder line and are lobbying the United States and European governments to deny Turkey entrance into the European Union until Ankara recognizes the killings as genocide.

Norman Stone, professor of history at Koc University in Istanbul, said Mr. Dink was killed at a time when Turkey was reacting to pressure to respond to the Armenian issue.

"There are a lot of balanced people here who say, 'Look, the genocide issue is unclear, but if you just leave it as a matter of massacres, then we can start making progress,' " Mr. Stone said.

The funeral is shaping up to be far more than a farewell to a popular though controversial figure. The fact that the government is permitting it to take place on a grand scale is another sign of a change.

A wide boulevard in the heart of Istanbul's main commercial district will be closed to traffic as the funeral cortege gathers outside the offices of the newspaper where Mr. Dink was shot.

The mayor of the district, Mustafa Sarigul, said the local government will hand out carnations and release hundreds of pigeons as a symbol of peace. Mr. Dink once said, "I may see myself as frightened as a pigeon, but I know that in this country people do not touch pigeons."

The procession is expected to advance for about a mile before the body is driven across the Golden Horn to the Kumkapi district for a Christian funeral Mass at the Church of the Virgin Mary. Among the Turkish government officials expected to attend the Mass are the interior minister, Abdulkadir Aksu, and the deputy prime minister, Mehmet Ali Sahin. Burial is to follow at the Balikli Armenian Cemetery.

Most Armenian Turks live in Istanbul, the diverse and cosmopolitan center of Turkey. But the antinationalist demonstrations that followed Mr. Dink's killing also surfaced in places as diverse as Izmir, the Aegean coastal city that is Turkey's third largest, and in Sanliurfa and Hatay, which are close to Turkey's eastern border with Syria.

"Public opinion in both countries, weary of the years-long conflict, had reached a point of explosion," said Kaan Soyak, a director of the Turkish-Armenian Business Development Commission, the only bilateral trade council of Turkish and Armenian executives. "That's what lies behind the massive outpouring for Mr. Dink."

Ethnic Armenian Turks, like Jewish and Greek Turks, are an officially recognized minority group and as such are allowed to operate their own schools. Mr. Dink, for example, attended Armenian schools in Istanbul until entering a state-run university.

Mr. Dink was labeled as a target among nationalist groups on their Web sites. Mr. Samast, the suspect, read and was influenced by those postings, according to the Anatolian news agency.

Seven other suspects were also being detained over the weekend, including Yasin Hayal, who served 11 months in jail for the bombing of a McDonald's restaurant in Trabzon in 2004.

Mr. Hayal, a known nationalist, is suspected of having a history of Islamic militant activity. He attempted to join the rebels in Chechnya but was turned away at the border, his former lawyer, Fatih Cakir, said by telephone on Sunday.

Havva Samast, Mr. Samast's mother, knew that her son and Mr. Hayal were friends.

"I couldn't believe my eyes when I saw him on television and had a shock," she said during a televised interview with the Dogan News Agency from her and her son's home city of Trabzon. "He couldn't have done this on his own. I know that he was friends with" Mr. Hayal.

DOJ_NMG_0120387

But many here still blame Article 301 for Mr. Dink's death and see it as an obstacle to freedom of speech in Turkey.

Assassination Link Embarrasses City (WT)

By Nicholas Birch

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

TRABZON, Turkey -- Few were surprised in this Black Sea coast city when a local youth confessed over the weekend to the shooting death of Turkish-Armenian journalist Hrant Dink, the latest incident to darken Turkey's international reputation.

"I bet that's the work of a local man" was the instant reaction to news of Mr. Dint's death in the mind of Mehmet Akcelep, a city councilor who has grown used to seeing his hometown in the news for the wrong reasons.

It was here, last February, that a 16-year-old boy fatally shot an Italian priest in the local Catholic church. It was also here, in May 2005, that four students distributing leaflets about prison conditions narrowly escaped death at the hands of a 2,000-strong lynch mob.

Mr. Akcelep did not have to wait long to see his fears justified. Arrested Saturday on an overnight train, 17-year-old high school dropout and amateur soccer player Ogun Samast turned out to be from Pelitli, a suburb of Trabzon.

"I said my prayers and then I shot [Mr. Dink]," Ogun reportedly told interrogators. "I feel no remorse. He said Turkish blood was dirty blood."

Nationalism always has been a fundamental ingredient of Turkish society. As a political movement, it has traditionally been strongest in the towns south of the 13,000-foot-high mountains dividing Trabzon from the bleak Anatolian interior.

Now, Trabzon has become a leading center of militant Turkish nationalism, and locals said the phenomenon could spiral out of control.

"What you have here is a headless monster, a nursery for potential assassins," said Omer Faruk Altuntas, a lawyer and local head of a small left-wing party.

"You may not like its policies, but at least the MHP controls its followers," agreed Mehmet Akcelep, referring to Turkey's biggest extreme nationalist party, the National Movement Party. "But Samast and hundreds of others like him aren't party people; they're free particles."

Locals say the sources of what one Turkish commentator has labeled "banal fascism" in Trabzon are partially economic. Surrounding villages used to be prosperous; then the hazelnut market collapsed and farmers fled to the city in the tens of thousands.

Ogun's district of Pelitli is made up of former villagers forced out of their homes by floods and landslides. Youth unemployment is high and most teenagers while away their time in one of two Internet cafes, or playing soccer.

Those deep-seated grievances have been stoked by the belief that Trabzon has suffered more than its share of casualties in Turkey's 25-year war against Kurdish separatists.

The May 2005 mob attack on four students occurred in an atmosphere of national hysteria triggered by an attempt by two Kurdish teenagers to burn the Turkish flag. Turkey's top general called the flag-burners "so-called citizens."

Critics of developments in Trabzon blame all local authorities, but reserve their harshest words for the press.

"Three or four times, they've pretty much invited people to take out their guns and start shooting," said retired teacher Nuri Topal. The lynch mob formed after local television stations ran news flashes saying the students were separatists.

In most Anatolian towns, few people watch local television or read local newspapers. In Trabzon, both are immensely popular and influential, mainly because of the town's obsessive relationship with soccer.

The only non-Istanbul club ever to win Turkey's soccer league, Trabzonspor is a central part of the city's identity. The club has long been rumored to be close to local mafia groups enriched by Trabzon's key position in Black Sea human-trafficking networks. Many think its influence on local society is negative, too.

"Trabzonspor and its supporters associations have become a semiofficial channel for nationalist thought," said local human rights activist Gultekin Yucesan.

No Quick Moves On Doha Round Likely (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

DOJ_NMG_0120388

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Chief U.S. trade negotiator Susan Schwab said Monday there is no prospect of an imminent breakthrough in long-stalled global trade talks.

Schwab leaves Wednesday for the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, where she plans to meet with counterparts from Europe and key developing nations in hopes of reviving the flickering Doha Round negotiations. The talks, named for the Qatari capital where they began in 2001, deadlocked in July and have made scant progress since then.

"We're still not close, I would say, to being able to sit down as trade ministers to talk about closing a Doha Round deal or to talk about a Doha Round breakthrough in substance," Schwab said in an interview with USA TODAY.

The trade chief said ongoing "technical" talks are advancing and could pave the way for an eventual deal. But major disagreements remain about the numerous components of a global accord billed as reducing trade barriers and promoting growth in developing nations. Any eventual deal would require the U.S. to reduce its farm subsidies in return for expanded access to overseas markets.

"We have a ways to go before we can translate the initial progress we are making on the technical front into a meaningful breakthrough. … It's not going to be at Davos," Schwab said.

The Doha Round was launched after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, in hopes of diminishing the economic despair in poorer countries believed to serve as a breeding ground for terrorism.

Now, after more than five years of fitful negotiations, the political calendar is an increasing concern. At the end of June, the president's "fast-track" authority to get congressional approval of trade deals on a straight yes or no vote expires.

The administration plans to seek a fast-track extension, Schwab said. That request is certain to trigger an intense political battle. In 2002, the last time Congress granted the president such powers, the legislation passed the House by just three votes. Achieving a Doha Round breakthrough would make it easier to obtain the extension, she said.

Peter Mandelson, Europe's top trade negotiator, has warned that if Doha Round progress is not made by the end of March, a new global trade deal would have to await the next U.S. president. Schwab rejected that "artificial deadline," but acknowledged that time is running out. "At some point, countries sort of stop paying attention. It stops being a priority. That is the only deadline out there now that we're concerned about," she said.

Still, her toughest bargaining may lie at home with Democrats who control Congress. Key Democrats, backed by the AFL-CIO labor organization, want tougher labor and environmental standards in any new trade deals. Schwab said discussions with the new Capitol Hill powers have only just begun.

European Trade Negotiator Sees Some Hope (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And Carter Dougherty

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 22 — The European Union's chief trade negotiator said Monday that efforts to restart stalled global trade talks were showing new vigor. But he sought to discourage expectations that a breakthrough could come during a meeting of trade ministers this week alongside the Global Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

"We are in the endgame, but we are not in a situation where we have the outlines of an agreement," the trade commissioner, Peter Mandelson, said.

Since Mr. Mandelson met with President Bush two weeks ago, the United States and the Europeans have tried to come up with a formula for cutting agricultural subsidies and tariffs, the major sticking point when the talks collapsed in July.

The talks — called "what if" negotiations by the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab — are aimed by each side at sounding out what it would take for the other to improve its offer, American and European officials said. If both sides like what they hear in private, they could try to win over other countries, notably India and Brazil.

"We can move, and we will do so, as long as it's not unilateral and as long as it is in proportion to the effort that others are making," Mr. Mandelson said.

The Europeans would like to see the United States improve its offer of limiting farm subsidies at $22.5 billion — something the Bush administration has said is possible with greater openness in Europe's markets.

DOJ_NMG_0120389

Roughly two dozen trade ministers are expected at an informal meeting Saturday on the sidelines of the economic forum in Davos, providing an opportunity to widen the scope of the talks.

That said, all sides have played down the possibility of tangible progress. One major matter in Davos will be how India reacts. India has proposed using exceptions for “sensitive products” to keep high tariffs on some of the most-traded goods, creating a sharp conflict with advanced industrial nations.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, an economist, is thought to be amenable to a trade deal. But his political party depends heavily on the votes of India’s vast rural population, limiting his room to maneuver.

European officials said Monday that the bloc had signaled its willingness to make concessions by reducing barriers to foreign farm products an average of 54 percent. This would bring Europe to a level sought by large developing countries, although it would be only a slight improvement over what Mr. Mandelson hinted last year that Europe might offer.

The European offer depends on an American reduction of farm subsidies to $15 billion or less a year, European Union officials said Monday.

American officials, in turn, have said that for a European offer to be politically viable, the European Union had to raise it significantly above last year’s proposal, and above 54 percent.

Outrage Over British Collusion In N. Ireland Killings (AFP)

By Eamonn Mallie

AFP, January 23, 2007

British police colluded with paramilitaries behind at least 10 murders in Northern Ireland in the 1990s, a damning report said, triggering outrage in Dublin and Belfast and remorse in London.

The report about Protestant militants threatens to cloud current efforts to restore self-rule in the long-troubled British-run province, in which Catholic lack of confidence in policing is a key stumbling block.

"Today's ombudsman's report is deeply disturbing," said Irish premier Bertie Ahern. "Its findings are of the utmost gravity. It paints a picture of despicable past behaviour."

"This was a war of terror that was inflicted on Republican and nationalist people for a very long time," said Sinn Fein head Gerry Adams, whose Republican movement meets next week to decide whether to back the current policing system.

The 160-page study by the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland also found evidence linking police informants to 10 cases of attempted murder, 10 punishment shootings and 13 punishment attacks by Protestant outlaws.

The report said that, from 1991-2003, one Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) informer was paid 79,840 pounds (157,640 dollars, 121,710 euros) including a series of "incentive payments" by his police Special Branch handlers.

Police Ombudsman Nuala O'Loan "established a pattern of work by certain officers within Special Branch designed to ensure that (the informant) and his associates were protected from the law," said the report's authors.

"She also identified a series of instances when they took steps to ensure that police informants who had committed crimes were protected from police officers investigating those crimes and from other agencies within the criminal justice system."

The British government admitted the report made "uncomfortable reading."

A spokesman for Prime Minister Tony Blair said the activities by the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) revealed by the report were "deeply disturbing, wrong and never should have happened."

"The serious failings that have been exposed within parts of the RUC Special Branch ... cannot be justified and no-one should attempt to justify them," added Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Hain.

"They should never have happened."

The report was the result of a three-and-a-half-year investigation centred on activities in north Belfast, during which more than 100 serving and retired police officers were interviewed, 24 of them under caution.

As well as the murders, attempted murders and punishment attacks, the report also cited police informant links with a bomb attack in the town of Monaghan, 110 kilometres (70 miles) southwest of Belfast across the border in the Republic of Ireland.

DOJ_NMG_0120390

The report also said informants were "babysat" by their minders to prevent them incriminating themselves during police interviews.

Britain and Ireland are battling to persuade both sides in Northern Ireland -- Catholic-backed Republicans who want union with Ireland, and Protestant Loyalists who favour keeping ties with Britain -- to end their differences.

Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, is resisting cooperation with the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the successor of the Protestant-dominated RUC.

Under the St Andrews Agreement struck last November, power-sharing in Belfast -- foreseen under the 1998 Good Friday Agreement, but suspended for the last four years -- can resume on March 26.

The British government insists it is still possible to achieve that date, but only so long as Sinn Fein agrees to cooperate fully with police in the British-run province.

Serbia Vote Could Lead To Coalition Of Democrats (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

PRISTINA, Kosovo, Jan. 22 — Two leading democratic parties emerged Monday as the groups most likely to form a government in Serbia, despite a first-place showing for a nationalist party in the parliamentary elections on Sunday.

But the prospect of slow negotiations to secure a coalition complicates international efforts to find a solution for the disputed province of Kosovo, which are approaching a turning point.

The nationalist Radical Party took 82 seats in the 250-member Parliament, initial results indicate. A strong performance by the Democratic Party, led by President Boris Tadic, held back the Radicals.

The Democratic Party won 65 seats, according to initial results from the state election committee. Other parties, led by the Serbian Democratic Party — a different group from the Democratic Party — took 47 seats. That positions the two Democratic groups to lead a slightly broader coalition.

It will not be easy, however, because the two main democratic parties have longstanding rivalries, and the prime minister, Vojilsav Kostunica, seems unwilling to negotiate his job away, though his Serbian Democrats came in third.

Western governments are hoping for the installation of a strong negotiating partner in Belgrade as the United Nations prepares to make its proposals for the future of Kosovo, the Serbian province that has been under United Nations control since 1999.

Western diplomats in the region say that a Democratic Party-led coalition would be most able to track down Serbia's remaining war crimes suspects, notably the wartime Bosnian Serb Army commander, Ratko Mladic.

In Brussels on Monday, the European Union pledged to keep its door open to Serbia despite the strong showing by the nationalists. Speaking after a meeting of foreign ministers, Olli Rehn, the European Union's enlargement commissioner, commended the country for conducting a democratic vote.

President Tadic on Monday urged the rapid formation of a new administration, saying he would award the position of prime minister "to the one who has a best chance to gain a majority in the new Parliament."

Mr. Kostunica, the prime minister, who has headed a minority government for three years, said he was "open for talks with other parties." But he implied that Mr. Tadic's party would have to compromise.

The former Finnish president who is the United Nations envoy to the Kosovo negotiations, Martti Ahtisaari, has held back from announcing his proposals for Kosovo's future until the elections were over, in order not to influence them.

A spokesman for Mr. Ahtisaari's office said a version of the document would be presented to diplomats on Friday.

Mr. Ahtisaari's plan is expected to enable Kosovo to seek international recognition, and to transfer supervision of the province from a United Nations mission to a small body led by the European Union.

A 78-day bombing campaign led by NATO forced the Serb-dominated security forces to cede control of Kosovo in 1999, after the forces were accused of committing atrocities against the ethnic Albanians who predominate in Kosovo. In the election on Sunday, Serbs in Kosovo voted, but most Albanians did not.

DOJ_NMG_0120391

Diplomats familiar with the negotiating process say that Mr. Ahtisaari's document, which is ultimately subject to Security Council approval, is unlikely to mention independence explicitly. Instead, recognition of Kosovo would be left to individual countries.

But Russia has said it will oppose any resolution that does not have Serbia's support.

In Serbia, a leading contender for the job of prime minister, Bozidar Djelic of the Democratic Party, suggested that Mr. Ahtisaari should not act until the Serbs form a government, because earlier action on the delicate issue of Kosovo could strengthen the nationalists' position. Under Serbian law, the parties have until the end of April to agree on a coalition, or face the possibility of new elections.

One European affairs analyst suggested that some European Union nations might be reluctant to back a settlement that leads to an independent Kosovo. Spain, Slovakia, Romania, Greece and Cypress have all voiced their concerns about such an outcome.

"It could provide more opportunity for disunity to emerge," said the analyst, Judy Batt, a senior researcher at the European Union Institute for Security Studies in Paris, who was in Belgrade to monitor the elections.

Conversely, she said, "The longer Belgrade takes forming a government, the less sympathy they will have among member states."

Russia Limits Foreign Labor To Fight Illegals (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

MOSCOW -- Thousands of migrant workers from the Caucasus, Central Asia and China are leaving Russia as the government institutes tough new measures aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration.

Campaigners against illegal immigration are welcoming the measures, saying low-paid migrants were distorting the job market and taking work from Russian citizens. But critics say the moves are ill-advised because they will drive up retail prices and create a labor shortage that could hurt Russia's booming economy.

About 12 million people, mostly citizens of impoverished ex-Soviet republics who do not require a visa to enter the country, are currently working illegally in Russia, according to analysts.

The new rules set the quota for legal foreign workers at 6 million, while at same time imposing fines of up to $30,000 on companies that employ foreigners illegally. Also, as of this month, only 40 percent of workers in Russia's retail markets are allowed to be foreigners, and none should be by April 1.

Foreign workers have traditionally dominated in Russia's retail markets, with people from Azerbaijan, for example, selling fruits and vegetables, and Chinese selling cheap manufactured goods. Illegal migrants, mostly from Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, are also heavily employed as laborers in the construction industry.

"We aren't wanted anymore, so I guess we'll be going home," said Artak, an Armenian who sells cigarettes and alcohol at a kiosk in central Moscow. "I'll be surprised if they can find a Russian who is willing do this work all day for what they pay me."

With illegal migrants difficult to track, it's not clear exactly how many are leaving Russia. But Russian police have been out in force to enforce the new laws, and signs are that few are taking the risk of staying.

Many stalls at food markets across Moscow are empty as vendors leave the country. Some markets have closed altogether, while others have posted signs looking for vendors with Russian citizenship. Russian television has shown images of empty markets in the Far East, where Chinese stallholders have fled across the border.

A Russian union organizer who works with illegal migrants in the construction industry said companies are throwing thousands of workers off job sites in fear of being prosecuted.

"You used to be able to get off the plane and immediately find work. Now everyone wants to get back on planes to go home," said the organizer, who did not want his name used because he worries that he'll be targeted by authorities.

The new measures appear to be a response to a surge in ethnic nationalism and opposition to immigration that has occasionally erupted in violence. In August, a bomb tore through Moscow's Cherkizovsky market, killing 13 persons, mostly illegal workers from Central Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0120392

Racist attacks have grown dramatically, with at least 53 persons killed last year in racially motivated assaults, according to the human rights group Sova.

Last fall, President Vladimir Putin denounced "ethnic gangs" that control Russia's markets and called for regulation to protect "the native Russian population."

Alexander Belov, the head of the influential Movement Against Illegal Immigration, welcomed the new rules as "a step in the right direction." But he said Russia needs to go further and impose full visa requirements on "people from poor countries who take jobs from Russians and give nothing back to our society."

Russia's population is shrinking by 750,000 people a year and has fallen below 142 million due to low birth rates and high mortality rates, especially among working-age men. There are fears the new measures could lead to an economic slowdown if foreign workers cannot be replaced.

"Most of the migrants working in Russia are doing jobs Russian citizens don't want," said Svetlana Gannushkina, the head of the Migration and Law Network, which assists immigrants.

She said the measures are little more than a populist move ahead of elections to the State Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, later this year. This could backfire, she added, because the crackdown may also drive up costs in retail markets, hurting Russia's poor.

The average Russian earns only about $5,000 a year, and low-income Russians do most of their shopping in retail markets. "This is going to damage not only migrant workers but also all the people who won't be able to afford to pay more for fruits, vegetables and meat," she said.

The government appears to be hedging its bets promising that prices will not rise and that the April 1 deadline for foreigners to be banned from markets could be extended.

"The laws are aimed at regulating the normal functioning of markets and not at reducing the quantity of goods traded," Economic Development Minister German Gref said in televised comments. "If we see any threat, the time limit can be extended by a government decision."

The Mystery Of The Chinese Baby Shortage (NYT)

By Beth Nonte Russell

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

McLean, Va.

ACCORDING to a State Department report released this week, American citizens adopted 6,493 children from China in 2006, a decline of 18 percent from the previous year's total of 7,906. And yet, just over a month ago, this newspaper reported that China had prepared strict new criteria for foreign adoption applications because the country claimed it lacked "available" babies to meet the "spike" in demand.

China has always limited foreign adoptions, and it does not publish reliable statistics on the number of children in its orphanages. So how is one to know whether the decrease in adoptions reflects a lack of supply or a lack of demand?

In the week following the report on the new guidelines, more than one bewildered person said to me, "But I thought there were lots of babies in orphanages in China!" My response was to helplessly reply, "So did I." My understanding of this was based not on conjecture, but on having been to China twice to adopt, having seen orphanages with my own eyes, and on research and other eyewitness accounts. Many hundreds and perhaps thousands of orphanages operate in China, most of them full of girls.

According to a February 2005 report in The Weekend Standard, a Chinese business newspaper, demographers in China found a ratio of 117 boys per 100 girls under the age of 5 in the 2000 census. Thanks to China's one-child policy, put into effect in 1979 in order to curb population growth, and a strong cultural preference for male children, this gender gap could result in as many as 60 million "missing" girls from the population by the end of the decade, enough to alarm even Chinese officials.

And what happened to these girls? According to the International Planned Parenthood Federation (a term that takes on a whole new meaning when referring to China), there are about seven million abortions in China per year, 70 percent of which are estimated to be of females. That adds up to around five million per year, or 50 million by the end of the decade; so where are the other 10 million girls? If even 10 percent end up in orphanages... well, you do the math.

A few months ago, in a conversation with my friend Patrick Mason, executive director of the International Adoption Center at INOVA Fairfax Hospital in Virginia, I confessed a growing fear: that China, the country from which my two daughters were adopted, would sooner or later shut down its international adoption program. Dr. Mason immediately dismissed my concern, saying, "The number of orphans is just too great."

And yet, I continued to wonder whether, as China increasingly asserts itself on the world stage and prepares to host the 2008 Summer Olympics, allowing Westerners to adopt thousands of infants each year would fit the image it wanted to project. I suspect not, and China's new restrictions lead me to believe that national pride is more important than getting these children into loving homes.

The issue of abandoned and institutionalized children remains a taboo subject in China, a problem the government does not even acknowledge exists. The impulse to hide it seems to stem partly from embarrassment and partly from fear of revealing the grave human rights abuses the one-child policy has produced; surely, watching a parade of well-off foreigners cart off thousands of babies would make the Chinese authorities understandably uncomfortable.

But the answer is not to stop the foreigners from adopting; it is to put an end to their reasons for doing so. My fondest hope, and the hope of thousands of parents who have adopted from China, is for all the orphanages there to close because there are no more abandoned children to put in them. This will be accomplished only when China decides that there is no economic or political justification for the magnitude of suffering that has resulted from the one-child policy. The government must openly acknowledge the problem, in part by publishing verifiable information about the status of its orphaned children, and take real steps to correct it. To do so would go a long way toward building the international trust and respect China seems to want so badly.

China has announced the lifting of restrictions for foreign journalists in preparation for the 2008 Olympics. Perhaps this will allow reporters to look for answers to some basic questions: how many children are there in institutions in China? If there is nothing to hide, why do visitors need approval to visit orphanages? Why are only certain orphanages allowed to participate in the international adoption program, and what is going on in the ones that are not?

The Hague Convention on Intercountry Adoption, to which China and 69 other countries are signatories, goes a long way toward ensuring against child abduction and trafficking; but it does not include provisions that would require member countries to report such information as the number of children housed in institutions or the criteria used for selecting "suitable" children for adoption.

The treaty states that "for the full and harmonious development of his or her personality," each child should have the opportunity to grow up in a "family environment, in an atmosphere of happiness, love and understanding." Indeed, it requires that each signatory take "as a matter of priority, appropriate measures to enable the child to remain in the care of his or her family of origin." One could argue that China's one-child policy directly violates the treaty by ensuring that many children will not remain in the care of the family but be relinquished to the care of the state.

Under the new Chinese adoption guidelines, the international adoption celebrity Angelina Jolie could not adopt from China (she's not married, and alas, she and Brad have more than two divorces between them, which is a no-no); nor could the actress Meg Ryan (again, not married). Another person who is not eligible is yours truly. My husband is over 50, so I would have to trade him in, marry again, wait the required five years (another new rule) before beginning the adoption process, and by that time I would be sneaking up on 50 myself.

It is comforting to know that Madonna is still eligible, at least until she turns 50, gets fat (the new regulations call for a body mass index of less than 40), gets divorced or goes broke (anyone with a net worth of under $80,000 is excluded).

The Chinese have asserted that the demand for adoptions far exceeds the number of babies it deems "available," based on criteria that have never been made public. We can only wonder how many babies will be left behind by Beijing's new policies — perhaps spending their lives in institutions because of these arbitrary and artificial limits.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al Qaeda Linked To Plot To Use Student Visas (LAT)

By Josh Meyer,

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

Papers found in an Iraq militants' hide-out refer to a plan to get terrorists into the U.S., though none did.

WASHINGTON — Al Qaeda's Iraq-based faction considered trying to use student visas to get a dozen or more operatives into the United States to launch an attack, a ploy that was successful for one of the hijackers in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, U.S. counter-terrorism officials confirmed Monday.

The plot appeared to be little more than an informal list of Al Qaeda-affiliated operatives and initial plans found during a search of a militants' hide-out in Iraq shortly before Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June, said one official.

But it was deemed serious enough to alert the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security, which mobilized agents in the United States to look for possible terrorists and for signs of attempted infiltration, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss classified details of the case.

"Almost anything from Al Qaeda in Iraq is taken very seriously.

"Even though they don't normally operate beyond the region, the fact that they were thinking about that, and considering this method to enter the country, is serious in and of itself," said the U.S. official.

In the end, U.S. authorities concluded that none of the operatives had entered the United States, that one of its leaders was already dead and that the effort never got off the drawing board, the official said.

The plot was confirmed by a second U.S. counter-terrorism official, who described the seized document as showing the scheme to be a group of men "discussing ideas, not an actual operation that was in progress."

Details of the nascent plot were first reported Monday by ABC News.

It also was cited by Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, during his testimony two weeks ago at a Senate Intelligence Committee hearing on threats to the United States.

Maples did not provide any details, saying only that documents seized by coalition forces "revealed [Al Qaeda in Iraq] was planning terrorist operations in the U.S."

The FBI issued a statement late Monday, saying it "has been aware of the information cited by the DIA…. Based on this information, we have no indication of a specific threat at this time."

The U.S. counter-terrorism officials said that Al Qaeda operatives appeared to have begun discussing the plot sometime after Al Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman Zawahiri, sent Zarqawi a letter encouraging him to launch attacks far beyond the borders of Iraq.

One of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers, Hani Hanjour, was allowed into the country on a student visa from Saudi Arabia after being turned down for a tourist visa, Janice L. Kephart, the former immigration counsel to the Sept. 11 commission that investigated the attacks, said Monday.

U.S. authorities now require that schools keep much closer tabs on visiting students.

Also on Monday, a Washington-based terrorism analysis group released a videotape in which Zawahiri purportedly ridiculed President Bush for his recently announced plan to send more than 20,000 additional American troops to Iraq to counter the increasing bloodshed and sectarian violence.

In the 14-minute videotape released by the SITE Institute and later broadcast on Islamist websites, Zawahiri challenged Bush to send "the entire army," vowing that insurgents could defeat the equivalent of 10 armies.

U.S. intelligence officials believe Zawahiri is hiding out in Pakistan or just over the border in Afghanistan, but is separated from Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

In his latest tape, which included English subtitles, Zawahiri described Bush's Jan. 10 address in which he outlined his new proposal for Iraq as "ravings."

He also said U.S. and allied forces have not deprived Al Qaeda of a haven in Afghanistan, and he reiterated an earlier offer to Americans to reject Bush administration policies if they wanted to avoid being attacked by Al Qaeda and militant Islamists.

The America Terrorists Never See (USAT)

By Dinesh D'souza

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Congress and the Bush administration are reconsidering America's policy toward Iraq, a topic that the president is sure to emphasize in his State of the Union address tonight. But perhaps a more radical re-examination is necessary.

More than five years after 9/11, we are still under the illusion that America is fighting a war against the enemies of modernity. We hear that these people are against modern science, modern capitalism and modern democracy. In President Bush's words, "They hate our freedoms."

Many of us think of radical Muslims as semiliterate seminarians or mullahs, the product of fanatical madrassa schools. But if you consider the suicide bombers who struck at 9/11, or in Madrid, or in London, most were born in the West, studied in the West, or lived in the West, and had scientific training. Osama bin Laden was a civil engineer, his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri a medical doctor, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (the chief architect of 9/11) a mechanical engineer, Muhammad Atta (head of the Hamburg group) an urban planner. The man who beheaded journalist Daniel Pearl attended the London School of Economics.

If the radical Muslims aren't opposed to science, neither do they reject capitalism. Historically, Islam has been quite friendly to free markets. The prophet Muhammad was a trader. The bin Laden team targeted the World Trade Center not simply because it represents capitalism, but because it represents U.S. capitalism, which is viewed as exporting the debased values of U.S. popular culture to the Islamic world.

Finally, in recent years Islamic radicals have become converts to the benefits of democracy. True, the Taliban hated democracy and bin Laden still rails against elections, charging that they substitute the will of the people for the will of God. But radical Islam's leading groups, such as Hamas, Hezbollah and the largest one, the Muslim Brotherhood, all support elections. Indeed they are, according to Islam expert Noah Feldman, "the loudest voices calling for democracy in nearly every Muslim country." This is not because their leaders have been reading John Stuart Mill or The Federalist Papers. Rather, these groups support democracy because they have discovered that it is their best way to win power.

The first lesson came in the early 1990s when a Muslim radical group called the Islamic Salvation Front ran on a platform of reinstituting Islamic holy law and won electoral victories in Algeria. More recently, Hamas was freely elected in the Palestinian territories, and the Muslim Brotherhood swept the 2005 parliamentary elections in Egypt. Hamas leader Sheikh Nayef Rajoub says radical Muslims have learned to love "the democracy game." And even though it has been called a terrorist group, Hamas thus far has governed like any elected government.

So, for now, Islamic radicals find it in their interest to embrace democracy. What they do when they lose their first election remains to be seen.

Radical Islam's main charge against America is that we are a decadent, immoral society that is projecting its culture and values throughout the world and threatening their faith. This is the basis of bin Laden's call to jihad. U.S. military power is viewed by many as one means for transmission of American values to the Muslim world, which is why radical Islam has been gaining recruits.

So how should the Bush administration respond? First, it should stop calling for democracy worldwide. Is America willing to risk a free election in Saudi Arabia in which bin Laden supporters take control of two holy sites and a significant portion of the world's oil? Of course not. Foreign policy is not philanthropy.

Iraq is part of a legitimate American effort not to have democracy everywhere but to have democracy somewhere. A pro-American democracy in the region would give traditional Muslims an alternative to the two bleak options currently on offer in the Middle East: Islamic tyranny (as in Iran) or secular tyranny (as in Syria, Jordan, Egypt, etc.). The radical Muslims are fighting so desperately in Iraq because they don't want Muslims to have a third choice that may prove vastly more attractive.

The best way for America to refute the radical Muslim allegation that we are an immoral, pagan society is for the Bush administration to show the rest of the world the face of traditional America. This is the America that is not portrayed by Hollywood and the music industry, and it is an America that the Muslims rarely see. Bush should highlight this America in his foreign policy speeches. He should not hesitate to speak out against American cultural exports that are shameless and corrupting. And America should promote traditional family values, not feminism and homosexual rights, in international forums like the United Nations.

If traditional Muslims realized that there are millions of Americans who go to church, take care of their families and live by traditional values, they would be less likely to view us or our leaders as the Great Satan, and fewer of them will be tempted to join the camp of the Islamic radicals. Improving our moral reputation is not just a way to look better, it may also be the best long-term strategy to make our country safer.

Prosecutors Say Padilla Defense Leak Could Taint Jury (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

The leak of transcripts of Jose Padilla's intercepted telephone conversations by a defense lawyer to The New York Times violated a court order and could jeopardize selection of an impartial jury, federal prosecutors said Monday.

"There is no question that the disclosure was calculated and deliberate, with the effect of exposing potential jurors to evidence before it is introduced at trial when both sides will have the opportunity to argue its significance," prosecutors said in court papers.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke has scheduled a hearing Wednesday on the issue, the latest in a string of complications to arise in the case of the alleged al-Qaida operative.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and former Chicago gang member, is charged with being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremists. Originally accused of plotting a radioactive "dirty bomb" attack after his 2002 arrest, Padilla was designated an enemy combatant by President Bush and held without criminal charge at a Navy brig for 3 1/2 years.

He was added to an existing Miami terrorism-support case in late 2005 during a legal battle over the president's wartime detention powers. The dirty bomb allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment.

Three Miami-based public defenders representing Padilla - Michael Caruso, Anthony Natale and Orlando do Campo - admitted in court papers that "one of Jose Padilla's counsel" provided the transcripts to a Times reporter for a story published Jan. 4. The lawyer responsible was not identified.

Padilla is also represented by attorney Andrew Patel of New York, but his name does not appear on the document acknowledging responsibility for the leak.

The seven transcripts were covered by a June 21, 2005, order by Cooke prohibiting dissemination of "sensitive" evidence. The transcripts were declassified telephone intercepts on which Padilla's voice is heard that were obtained under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Prosecutors contend that their disclosure violates Florida Bar and American Bar Association rules governing attorneys' professional conduct. Penalties for such violations vary greatly, from jail time in extreme cases to a judicial reprimand.

The defense lawyers said in their own court papers that disclosure of the transcripts was "born of confusion" about the judge's order. Because the 2005 order had been replaced in 2006, not everyone on Padilla's team understood that the rules regarding sensitive material still applied.

Prosecutors, however, cast doubt on the argument, noting that Assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Killinger said in a letter when the transcripts were turned over to the defense on Jan. 23, 2006, that they were "sensitive discovery materials" covered by Cooke's original order.

Prosecutors accused defense lawyers of "whipping up a media frenzy" that could taint the pool of prospective jurors.

A spokeswoman for The Times declined comment. None of the four defense lawyers responded to e-mail messages seeking comment about the latest government claims.

The Padilla trial had been scheduled to start Monday but was delayed until April, in part to allow time for a mental competency evaluation. Two mental health experts hired by Padilla's lawyers say he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder stemming from his long isolation in military custody and is unable to adequately assist in his own defense.

Padilla's lawyers claim he was tortured while in the brig and are seeking dismissal of the charges on that basis. Pentagon and Justice Department officials have denied those.

Editorial: Congress Must Press For FISA-rule Details (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 23, 2007

Crucial questions remain about new NSA wiretaps.

Just watching Alberto Gonzales being grilled over the Bush administration's new, classified domestic-surveillance agreement with the FISA court was an exercise in frustration. One can only imagine what it was like for the senators doing the grilling; they were simply trying to figure out whether the deal undermines or meets the intent of their own law to protect Americans' privacy.

They didn't get very far. In Thursday's Judiciary Committee hearing, the ever soft-spoken, ever genial attorney general would neither describe FISA orders that ended the warrantless wiretap program nor agree that senators had a right to see them.

DOJ_NMG_0120401

That stance is untenable. Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to prevent unlawful eavesdropping by government, and it cannot determine whether to give congressional blessing to the new rules or amend the FISA law unless its members -- who are accustomed to receiving sensitive, classified material -- know how the rules work. Congress must press the White House until it gets the information.

After more than a year of defending its warrantless surveillance on the basis of executive authority, the administration has clearly done some fast footwork in the face of two new factors: an emboldened, Democratic-led Congress and the prospect of imminent federal appeals-court proceedings on its wiretap program.

Talks between the executive branch and the FISA court reportedly accelerated after the November elections. According to the Los Angeles Times, government officials said the negotiations "centered on securing an agreement that would allow the administration to seek warrants on groups of people in certain circumstances, rather than being required to obtain separate court orders for every individual under suspicion." The Times said the changes "appear to require individual warrants when the target is a U.S. citizen or has permanent legal resident status."

But senators heard no such explanation from Gonzales. They must persevere until they do.

Editorial: End To Warrantless Taps? (STNIA)

Staten Island Advance (NY), January 23, 2007

Late last week U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in a two-page letter to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, announced the death of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the super-secret program authorized by the president to eavesdrop on phone calls and e-mails of Americans believed to be communicating with suspected terrorists.

Mr. Gonzales' announcement ended a 13-month brewing battle over the constitutionality of the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the warranteless wiretapping conducted by the Bush administration, which had vehemently defended its right to conduct super-secret eavesdropping on phone calls and e-mails of Americans without going through the well-established legal channels before doing so.

The president and Mr. Gonzales, as well as other members of the Bush administration have vehemently defended the program, insisting that it was "critical," "vital," and "crucial to our national security," ever since The New York Times broke the news that the program existed, catching Americans off-guard.

The administration has also claimed that it did not need to request and receive a warrant from the appropriate court -- the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, the sole purpose of which is to monitor the government's wiretapping and monitoring of Americans.

Critics of the National Security Agency program have said from the beginning that FISA should handle the program in the first place. Yet the government argued that going through the FISA court took too long; they said it would impede the program's "speed and agility."

They argued that NSA, the government's eyes and ears of worldwide communication, needed to be able to listen to terror suspects as they moved throughout the world and communicated with people within the U.S. Now, it appears that the "speed and agility" issue is a moot point. And that the White House has beat a hasty retreat.

Or has it?

Democrats are crowing that the Bush administration could no longer -- in the face of widespread criticism from scholars and some Justice Department lawyers -- defend its actions.

But one senior Justice Department official said: "Obviously, this issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny ... considering all of these circumstances, the president determined that this was the appropriate course."

Mr. Gonzales, appearing on the Hill last week, and under intense questioning, said: "We believe the court's orders will allow the necessary speed and agility the government needs," he said. When asked if the court is now a 24-hour drivethru for electronic surveillance, a senior Justice official said that "the judges of the FISA court often make themselves available at all hours to approve emergency authorizations. So that's not something new."

A former Justice Department official has told CBS News that emergency wiretaps can be started and the necessary paperwork can be completed retroactively. Which by the way, was always the case, and the main argument advanced by critics of the program in response to the administration's claim that going through FISA took too long.

So, has the administration actually backed down on one of its key interpretations of executive power?

Already some are speculating that the Gonzales letter is really a Trojan Horse. They claim that a closer reading of the letter provides a major, unresolved loophole the administration plans to exploit.

DOJ_NMG_0120402

As one expert pointed out, the National Security Agency surveillance program and the FISA system, as it currently exists, are fundamentally incompatible. Any hasty reconciliation of the two, he said, would involve either a "dramatic revision" of U.S. espionage activities or a very creative reading of the wiretapping statute. The question, he said, is which one?

Critics have also questioned the timing of the Bush administration's policy change, coming two weeks before scheduled oral arguments in the 6th Circuit Appeals Court of a trial court's finding that the wiretapping program is unconstitutional.

Regardless, of which side of this debate readers fall, the program raised troubling questions, not the least of which is the extent and depth of presidential powers even in the time of war.

We also find ourselves wondering why the Bush administration felt it necessary to make an end run around FISA in the he first place, especially in light of the fact that the court in all of its years has only turned down a handful of requests out of the thousands it has granted.

In addition, New York Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer pointed out that the White House is labeling its cooperation with FISA as a courtesy, and not a legal obligation, meaning the administration does not feel bound to follow a new set of procedures.

"Just as you instituted this program," Mr. Schumer said, "you could just go back to it if you get a decision you don't like."

That fact is the most worrisome about this whole affair, that the White House, having publicly announced its compliance, would behind the scenes still do just the opposite.

We will, for the moment at least, reserve judgment, but urge Congress to continue oversight of this program to ensure that the administration keeps its promise to the American people.

Editorial: Change Of Tactic Only (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, January 23, 2007

Congress and the courts must not be placated by the administration's alleged change of position on spying. It's? a matter of accountability and constitutional obligation.

"The truth of the matter is we looked at FISA, and we all concluded there's no way we can do what we have to do to protect this country under the strict reading of FISA."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Senate Judiciary Committee last week

The element of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act that likely caused such consternation? The one that said eavesdropping on Americans should occur with a warrant. And the all-too-typical administration response? Ignore the law.

FISA actually is abundantly clear on this matter of warrants. Nonetheless, the administration had some choices. It could have asked Congress to change the law. It might have noted another part of FISA that allowed warrantless surveillance on an emergency basis for 72 hours before the warrant was requested.

Instead, the Bush administration followed the now familiar script - it ignored the law until it looked as if it would be forced to comply. Last week, the Justice Department announced that it would put its surveillance program under FISA court supervision. This occurred weeks after Democrats assumed control of Congress, just before Gonzales was to appear before the Senate committee and two weeks before a federal appeals court in Cincinnati was going to hear arguments about whether the program is legal. The administration's change of heart was clearly no coincidence.

Among other things, it now hopes that the court challenges to the program will be ruled moot. It also is gambling that Congress will be placated. Neither should occur.

That's because still unexplained is whether this change means each individual warrant has to gain court approval or whether the court will use blanket approvals. The former is what should be occurring.

Also left unclear is whether the administration - which has claimed the president had the constitutional authority for warrantless eavesdropping - has in fact been spying on Americans with no connection to terrorism.

As for the court cases, a New York Times analysis Friday by Adam Liptak observed that the Supreme Court has ruled such court cases are moot only if it is "absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur."

Anyone buying that with this administration's track record?

Congress must continue its oversight of this program. The court cases challenging it must also proceed. There are simply too many unanswered questions.

The President Is More Equal? (WT)

By Bruce Fein

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

George Orwell had his "Animal Farm," and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has his version of the Constitution.

According to the attorney general, the three branches of the government are equal, but President Bush is more equal than Congress or the Supreme Court. Thus, the president is constitutionally empowered to open mail, conduct electronic surveillance, break and enter homes, or torture detainees in defiance of federal statutes. Congress is impotent to check the president's national security powers to prevent the massive intelligence abuses disclosed by the Church Committee, including the gathering of political intelligence under a false foreign intelligence banner. Mr. Gonzales further lectures that the president is authorized to sign bills passed by Congress but to disregard those portions he asserts are unconstitutional, which is tantamount to a line-item veto power rejected by the Supreme Court in New York v. Clinton (1998).

He adds that President Bush, like British kings, can do no wrong in national security matters. Thus, the Supreme Court improperly rebuked the commander in chief over indefinite detentions of alleged unlawful enemy combatants, habeas corpus and military commissions by disputing Mr. Gonzales' doctrine of presidential infallibility doctrine.

The Founding Fathers, in contrast, believed the three branches of government should be equal in the Constitution's checks and balances. Since men were not angels -- even saintly President George Washington -- ambition must be made to counteract ambition to forestall the tyranny of "Animal Farm." Judicial review of presidential actions was enshrined in the expectation the White House would chronically seek to usurp or misuse power to boost its political standing, especially in times of conflict.

The Supreme Court adjudicates the constitutionality of national security measures not because it commands military expertise or foreign intelligence genius. On the latter counts, the president is demonstrably superior. But the commander in chief, unlike the justices, is institutionally motivated to twist the law or distort the facts to gain a direct political advantage.

Mr. Bush, for example, benefits from the hundreds of alleged enemy combatants held at Guantanamo Bay irrespective of whether the detentions are justified. Detainees in large numbers testify to the president's dubious claim that international terrorism is as dangerous to the nation as were Josef Stalin, Adolf Hitler or Hirohito.

While a former commandant and deputy commandant have opined that most of Guantanamo's detainees do not belong there, reducing the number to a handful would be a staggering political embarrassment to Mr. Bush. How can the nation's clash with international terrorism be deemed "war" without a sizable collection of captured illegal enemy combatants on display? The same reasoning will incline Mr. Bush's military commissions established to try alleged war crimes to convict every accused al Qaeda defendant. Any acquittal would undermine Mr. Bush's hyperbolic claim of a Manichean battle between international terrorism and Western civilization.

All presidents are irresistibly tempted to indiscriminate or wrongful detentions, punishments or overreaching whenever exigencies arise to generate popular political support or to justify the indefinite exercise of emergency or war powers. The White House gains from inflated fears. The justices of the Supreme Court do not. Neither do they possess a personal political agenda that would systematically warp their constitutional judgments in favor or against the president's national security actions. That is why the Founding Fathers did not exclude the latter from judicial review, which history vindicates.

President Harry Truman insisted seizing steel mills was essential to the Korean War effort. The Supreme Court voided the seizure in Youngstown Sheet & Tube v. Sawyer(1952), and Truman was proved wrong.

President Richard M. Nixon maintained that publication of the Pentagon Papers would irreparably damage the United States in Vietnam. The Supreme Court rejected the claim in New York Times v. United States (1971), and Nixon was proved wrong.

President Bush asserted that any judicial review of his decision to detain American citizens indefinitely as enemy combatants would cripple the fight against international terrorism. The Supreme Court repudiated the claim in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2005), and Mr. Bush was proved wrong. It speaks volumes that Attorney General Gonzales has failed to cite even one Supreme Court decision which he believes handicapped the president's national security performance.

When the Supreme Court virtually abdicated judicial review in line with the attorney general's views, mass injustice ensued. With congressional support, President Franklin D. Roosevelt interned 120,000 Japanese Americans five months after Pearl Harbor to placate popular racism. Not a crumb of evidence of disloyalty or sabotage was ever forthcoming. The Supreme Court ratified that abomination through blind deference to the commander in chief in Hirabiyashi v. United States (1943), and Korematsu v. United States (1944). Congress later apologized in the Civil Liberties Act of 1988.

Notwithstanding the attorney general, the equilibrium of power among the legislative, executive and judicial branches has proven the best way to preserve an enlightened democratic dispensation for the ages.

Bush's Abrupt About-face On Wiretaps Is Welcome (CCCT)

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, January 23, 2007

Decision to abandon insistence that such surveillance could be conducted without warrants came late in the day, however.

DOJ_NMG_0120404

A year ago, when the program of warrantless wiretapping of overseas calls came to light, the Bush administration argued strongly that the surveillance was outside the purview of the courts.

By virtue of the president's executive powers on behalf of national security, the White House said, the administration already had the power to monitor those communications.

And aside from the inherent powers that gave the president the right to monitor those calls, the kind of massive electronic eavesdropping that was being done by the National Security Agency simply made the Carter-era Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court an outmoded tool for dealing with the threat of terrorism.

Trust us, the White House said reassuringly: The program has all the necessary constitutional protections built into its system without any courts.

Then the November elections happened. And last week, in a quiet turnabout, the Bush administration announced that it was discontinuing the program of warrantless wiretaps and said that any future wiretaps would be done under the authority of the FISA Court.

It was a welcome change of method, even if it did not represent a change of heart on the part of the Bush White House.

The administration still believes that what it was doing before was not against the law, although a federal court had already found the program to be unconstitutional. It was highly likely that an appeal court later this month would have upheld the trial court.

The administration, before the takeover of Congress by Democrats, might have been inclined to continue the legal fight.

However, pragmatism, if not respect for the Constitution, prevailed. Not by coincidence did Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announce the change just as he was about to testify for the first time before the new Congress.

The warrantless wiretapping program was an abuse of presidential powers and its dismantling should be welcomed by Americans. The program, while it operated, overrode one of the basic constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures by the power of the state. That abuse fit the Bush administration's view that national security trumps all other concerns, when in fact the need to preserve our way of life in times of crisis demands that we uphold those constitutional protections then more zealously than ever.

Canadian To Remain On U.S. Terrorist Watch List (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Despite a Canadian inquiry that cleared a Syrian-born Canadian citizen of any terrorist ties, the Bush administration has formally refused a Canadian government request that it remove the man, Maher Arar, from the terrorist watch list, saying that the United States has secret information justifying his inclusion.

On Monday, the Justice Department released a letter affirming Mr. Arar's listing sent last week by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, to the Canadian minister of public safety, Stockwell Day.

In the letter, dated Jan. 16, Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Chertoff said their departments and American intelligence agencies "have re-examined the materials in the possession of the United States regarding Mr. Arar. Based on this re-examination, we remain of the view that the continued watch listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate."

After the letter was sent, Mr. Day met last week with Mr. Chertoff and Mr. Gonzales and reviewed the American dossier on Mr. Arar in its entirety, but still disagreed with the American decision, Canadian and American officials said.

For human rights advocates, Mr. Arar became a symbol of the United States' counterterrorism policies gone drastically awry, when he was detained in New York in 2002 while trying to change planes and then sent to Syria. He was imprisoned in Syria for more than a year and beaten repeatedly with a heavy metal cable before the Syrian authorities released him in October 2003.

A two-year investigation by a Canadian government commission concluded in September that Mr. Arar had no terrorist ties and that the Canadian authorities had passed misleading information about him to the United States before he was sent to Syria. The revelations led to the resignation of the head of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and a formal protest by the Canadian government to the Bush administration over Mr. Arar's treatment.

The Bush administration refused to provide documents or witnesses to Canada's Arar Commission, and it has never admitted to any mistakes in its handling of Mr. Arar.

At a hearing last week, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, a Vermont Democrat who is the new Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, angrily pressed Mr. Gonzales about the case. In a statement on Monday, Senator Leahy said he was "puzzled" by the decision to keep Mr. Arar on the watch list.

DOJ_NMG_0120405

"This abhorrent practice stains America's reputation as a defender and protector of human rights, and I hope this administration will renounce it at long last," Senator Leahy said. Mr. Gonzales has agreed to brief Mr. Leahy and Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the top Republican on the committee, on the case.

Spokesmen for Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Chertoff declined on Monday to discuss the case, noting that a federal lawsuit filed by Mr. Arar against the United States government and dismissed last year is still on appeal.

An attorney for Mr. Arar, Maria C. LaHood, said the recent exchange provided more support for a statement last month by the Canadian prime minister, Stephen Harper, that "we simply have a U.S. government that won't admit it's wrong."

U.S. Officials: Canadian Should Stay On Terror List (CNN)

CNN.com, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- American officials said Monday that a Canadian should remain on a U.S. terrorist watch list despite the Canadian government's conclusion otherwise and its apology after the designation led to his detention in Syria.

In a joint letter, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff informed Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of public safety, that they had again looked at intelligence in their possession concerning Maher Arar.

"Based on this re-examination, we remain of the view that the continued watch listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate," the U.S. officials said.

"Our conclusion in this regard is supported by information developed by U.S. law enforcement agencies that is independent of that provided to us by Canada regarding Mr. Arar."

In 2002, U.S. officials detained Arar at a New York airport as he was trying to return home to Canada from a vacation in Tunisia. Canada had placed Arar, a Syrian native, on a terrorism watch list. He said the United States arrested him and eventually sent him to Syria, where he allegedly was tortured and held for 10 months.

In September, a Canadian report concluded that Arar wasn't a terrorism suspect. Gonzales has said the U.S. legally deported Arar and didn't send him to Syria to be tortured. Syria defends its handling of the case, saying a Canadian diplomat visited Arar twice and found he was treated well. Human rights groups widely criticize the Damascus government for torturing prisoners

The Arar case has been politically charged. Last week, Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, sharply criticized Gonzales about the case during the attorney general's appearance before the panel.

On Monday, Leahy complained the letter does not address what he called "the larger issues surrounding this case."

"The reason the Arar case is such a sore point and such an offense to American values is that he was sent to Syria on the Bush administration's orders, where he was tortured," Leahy said in a written statement.

He said he was puzzled by the decision to keep Arar on the watch list, but said he would await a promised briefing by Gonzales.

Justice Department officials said Monday that the attorney general will inform the lawmaker why the Bush administration believes Arar should remain on the watch list.

In their letter to the Canadian minister, the U.S. officials said they would like to brief the Canadians "in a confidential meeting with appropriate Canadian officials at their earliest convenience."

US Still Considers Mistreated Canadian Arar Suspicious (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

The United States still considers a Canadian it detained in 2002 as an "Islamic extremist" and sent to Syria, where he says he was tortured, a suspicious person, despite Canada finding him free of suspicion, a US officials said in a letter.

The letter, written last week by the US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff, said that the US still maintains Maher Aher, who was cleared last year of terror ties by Ottawa, on a watch list based on US intelligence.

"Our departments, in conjunction with the intelligence community, have reexamined the materials in the possession of the United States regarding Mr. Arar. Based on that reexamination, we remain of the view that the continued watch-listing of Mr. Arar is appropriate," it said.

The letter said the basis for this conclusion is based on US information "independent of that provided to us by Canada regarding Mr. Arar."

Arar, who holds dual Canadian-Syrian citizenship, was detained by US authorities in New York while in transit from Tunisia to his home in Canada in September 2002 and deported to Syria where he was jailed for nearly a year.

DOJ_NMG_0120406

After his return to Canada, Arar said he had been tortured and that both his arrest by the United States and interrogations in Syria were based on Canadian intelligence.

He has filed multimillion-dollar lawsuits against the governments of Canada and the United States.

Last September Canadian Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said he had advised Chertoff that a public inquiry had found "no evidence against Mr. Arar" and that Canada had stripped Arar's name from security lists.

"We want the government of the United States to do the same thing," he said.

On Monday, the US Center for Constitutional Rights, which is supporting Arar in his legal efforts, denounced the US keeping Arar on its watch list.

"It is now crystal clear that the US has shown everything it has on Mr. Arar to Canada, and that there is no reason for him to be on a watch-list," said center attorney Maria LaHood.

US Senator Patrick Leahy criticized the stance of the administration of President George W. Bush on Arar Monday.

"The reason the Arar case is such a sore point and such an offense to American values is that he was sent to Syria, on the Bush administrations orders, where he was tortured.

"Yet the Bush administration has yet to renounce the practice of sending detainees to countries that torture prisoners, and it has yet to offer even the hint of an apology to Mr. Arar for what he endured with our governments complicity."

Deputy Assistant Secretary For The Indefensible (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

"On the cold moonlit evening of March 5, 1770," writes David McCullough in his magisterial "John Adams," "the streets of Boston were covered by nearly a foot of snow." A crowd set upon a lone British sentry at Boston's Province House, taunting him. Quickly, reinforcements arrived, and so did a larger crowd. Soon the crowd hurled snowballs, chunks of ice, oyster shells and stones. The soldiers, now nine, opened fire, killing five Bostonians -- "bloody butchery," Samuel Adams called it. Only one lawyer would defend the British soldiers. He was a different Adams -- John Adams, a good man on the path to being great.

I resurrect this tale about Adams because it is sorely needed. Just this month, an official in the Bush administration, a deputy assistant secretary of defense named Charles D. Stimson, suggested that lawyers who defend terrorism suspects being held at Guantanamo not only should not do so but that their firms ought to be blackballed as a result.

"I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," he said in a radio interview. You may want to read that again.

It's hard to know where to begin. Shall it be with the notion that the Sept. 11 terrorists did not so much murder about 3,000 people as hit the "bottom line" of American corporations? This is a stunningly original take on that awful day, an auditor's reading of history that Stimson, in the spare time he deserves to have in abundance, might want to apply to the bombing of Pearl Harbor or the burning of Atlanta. I doubt that any CEO looks at Sept. 11 as a bad day at the office.

More to the point, what sort of lawyer -- and Stimson is one -- not only thinks that a terrorism suspect does not deserve counsel but that the counsel ought to be punished as a result? It's hard to fathom a lawyer saying such a thing -- even hard to fathom it from a mere citizen.

It would be just a waste of my time, I suppose, to point out that the Guantanamo suspects are just suspects, convicted so far of nothing. In fact, some of them have been released and others, arrested and held elsewhere, turned out to not be the mass murderers and master criminals the government, in a fit of hype, originally accused them of being. Anyone who thinks all prosecutors speak nothing but the truth need only familiarize themselves with the case of the lacrosse players at Duke. There's a sad lesson in American jurisprudence for you.

Naturally enough, Stimson's repudiation of everything John Adams stood for produced some protest, condemnation and outrage. Following the well-established Washington rule, Stimson apologized, doing so in a letter to The Post. He said his remarks did not reflect his "core beliefs." He did not blame his utterance on drugs, booze, Twinkies or a deep depression; he merely said that his words had left the wrong "impression." With that, he has returned to the obscurity from whence he came, his job presumably secure.

I, for one, do not accept Stimson's apology. I think it is insincerely offered and beside the point. What matters most is that he retains his job, which means he retains the confidence of his superiors in the government. How anyone can have confidence in such a man is beyond me. There are only two explanations, one inexcusable, the other chilling. The first is that his bosses don't care. The second is that they agree with him.

I would guess that Stimson strongly felt it was No. 2 -- agreement. From the get-go, the Bush administration has taken the position that anyone it detained on terrorism charges was guilty. Throw away the key. No need for lawyers. No need for judges.

No need for anything except, of course, the word of the authorities. In recent months, a more assertive Congress and the courts have unaccountably challenged this view, and the Bush administration has beaten a tactical retreat on unchecked eavesdropping and the legality of trying alleged terrorists before military commissions. Still, we all know where its heart is on these matters. Justice is what the administration says it is.

By now, any other administration would have fired Stimson, apology or not. His words show that he is unfit for government service, not to mention membership in the bar. Fortunately for him, if and when someone does drop the ax, some misguided lawyer, infused with the spirit of John Adams, will defend him. I hope Stimson will forgive him.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bomb Threat Delays Plane (HC/AP)

The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 23, 2007

HOUSTON — A Continental Airlines Inc. commuter flight was delayed without incident for about an hour Monday after its scheduled landing at George Bush Intercontinental Airport because of a bomb threat, authorities said.

The flight from Tyler, about 200 miles north of Houston, landed about 10:50 a.m. and was diverted to a taxiway, where local, state and federal authorities took about an hour to determine the plane and its passengers were safe, said Marlene McClinton, spokeswoman for the Houston Airport System.

The airport continued to operate normally during the investigation, McClinton said.

The twin-turboprop, operated by Colgan Air Inc., holds 34 passengers, though it wasn't immediately known how many were onboard, a Continental spokeswoman said.

FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap described the incident as a "nonspecified bomb threat" that apparently started in Tyler. A call to the airport in the East Texas city, which is located between Dallas and Shreveport, La., was not immediately returned.

United Passenger Charged For Alleged Drunken Behavior On Flight (SLOT)

San Luis Obispo Tribune, January 23, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - A United Airlines passenger faces federal charges for allegedly making statements about a hijacking, trying to open a cabin door and fighting with flight attendants while aboard a flight from Boston to San Francisco.

Erin Callahan Lambert, 28, who apparently was intoxicated during Flight 179 on Sunday, was taken into custody after the plane landed at San Francisco International Airport, authorities said. She was charged Monday with assaulting a flight attendant and interfering with the performance of duties of flight crew members.

About halfway through the six-hour, non-stop flight, Lambert got up, walked to the back of the plane and began talking on her cell phone, FBI Special Agent Brian Gilhooly wrote in an affidavit filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

When two flight attendants told Lambert to turn off the phone and return to her seat, she "refused and became combative," Gilhooly wrote. Asked who she was talking to, she said "I'm calling 911 because the plane is being hijacked," the affidavit said.

Lambert eventually returned to her seat, but later she tried to take her luggage, including her pet dog in a carrier, to the restroom, according to the affidavit. When told to leave her belongings at her seat, she said, "No, you are going to have to kill me and my dog," then locked herself in the restroom, Gilhooly wrote.

Lambert exited moments later and "started walking rapidly toward the front of the airplane," saying, "I'm getting off the aircraft," he wrote.

Flight attendants and passengers stopped her as she headed for a cabin door and forced her into a seat, where the plane's purser handcuffed her, according to the affidavit. She managed to wriggle free from those handcuffs, so plastic ties were placed on her wrists, it said.

"During the entire assault, Ms. Lambert was yelling profanities, cursing and spitting on the flight attendants and other passengers," Gilhooly wrote.

Lambert, a Bay Area resident, was turned over to San Francisco airport police upon arrival at SFO, where she refused to be interviewed by the FBI and requested an attorney, the affidavit said.

Chemical Insecurity (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

The new Democratic leadership in Congress has a chance to finally do what the Republican Congress and the Bush administration failed to do after Sept. 11: to protect the nation's chemical plants from an attack. Lawmakers should stop the Homeland Security Department from adopting new regulations that would block state and local governments from doing more to protect their residents and should finally pass a federal law with teeth.

An attack on a single plant could release deadly chemicals that could put hundreds of thousands of people at risk of death or serious injury. But since Sept. 11, the chemical industry — a major campaign contributor — has managed to ward off any significant new federal rules that might require it to spend money to increase security.

Now it is going a step further by trying to get the federal government to "pre-empt," or invalidate, state and local efforts to impose safety standards. Supporters of pre-emption always claim that they just want a uniform standard. But in situations like this one — where the federal law is absurdly weak — it is obvious that the real agenda is to block serious safety measures at every level of government.

Congress wisely refused to include a pre-emption provision in legislation it adopted last year. Now, however, the Homeland Security Department has proposed regulations that would give itself the authority to pre-empt state and local laws. If the proposed regulations were adopted, they could wipe away the serious chemical plant security law that New Jersey has passed, and prevent other states and cities from requiring the chemical industry to do more to protect their residents.

It is up to Congress to act. It should block these deeply flawed regulations and move quickly to pass a comprehensive law that imposes tough requirements on chemical plants to harden their facilities.

Last year Congress passed a bad rider, backed by the industry, that gives the chemical industry far too much leeway to decide on its own how its plants are vulnerable and how to protect them. The new law should contain specific requirements for plant safety. It should also require companies to switch to safer chemicals when the cost is not prohibitive, a key safety measure that the industry has resisted. And it should clearly state that federal chemical-plant laws do not pre-empt state and local laws. Congress should finally put the public's safety ahead of the chemical industry's bottom line.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Buildup Draws New Challenge (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

GOP's Sen. Warner is an author of the latest resolution opposing Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops.

WASHINGTON — Three Senate Republicans, including one of the White House's most powerful supporters of the Iraq war, introduced a resolution Monday to oppose any troop buildup — a serious setback for President Bush.

The latest challenge is led by Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, a widely respected onetime Navy secretary and former Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, who had been largely restrained in his criticism of the president's plan until Monday.

"I feel ever so strongly that the American GI was not trained, not sent over … to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shia and the wanton, incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Warner said at a news conference. The resolution is the second that aims to put Congress on the record against Bush's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 21,500, an issue the full Senate could start to debate next week. It expresses the sense that the Senate disagrees with the buildup and is largely similar to the earlier resolution, but is more deferential to presidential authority.

Warner's decision to introduce a nonbinding resolution — co-sponsored by Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, along with Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska — deals a blow to a White House that has been struggling to contain a revolt on Capitol Hill.

It was greeted warmly Monday by congressional war opponents, who are pushing to rein in the president and force him to begin bringing home the roughly 132,000 troops in Iraq.

"If you look at what has happened to this debate in the last 10 days … not only from Democrats, but Republicans, this has been a major kind of escalation of expression of opposition," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who has introduced legislation that would require the president to get congressional authorization for the additional troop deployments.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who last week introduced the other anti-buildup resolution with Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), said Biden was open to amending his resolution. Biden and other Democrats are working to round up the Republican votes that any resolution would need to overcome a possible filibuster. Sixty votes are required to cut off debate.

"What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war," said Elizabeth Alexander, Biden's spokeswoman.

The Biden resolution, unlike Warner's, calls Bush's proposal an "escalation," a word criticized by some Republicans as politically loaded because of its association with Vietnam. It also does not include wording that acknowledges the president's constitutional authority to direct the war.

On Monday, several Republican leaders rallied to the president's side.

"We should all want this strategy to work. We should do everything in our power to help make it work. And that begins by giving it a chance and not criticizing it before the strategy even has a few days to work out," Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an emphatic speech on the Senate floor. "That's why the possibility of a resolution, which is highly critical of the president's strategy and suggests a different course of action and a timeline for leaving, is the wrong strategy," said Kyl, the No. 3 GOP Senate leader.

In the House, Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who has expressed strong support for the White House, challenged Democrats to cooperate with Republicans to make the president's strategy work.

Also potentially complicating the congressional debate over the war is that a growing number of senators — including several presidential candidates — are promoting their own proposals to challenge the president's Iraq plans.

But Warner's stature as a longtime supporter of the military and onetime White House ally helped drive the sense Monday that Congress was moving closer to a powerful, if symbolic, repudiation of Bush's position.

The courtly five-term senator, whose bleak October assessment of the situation in Iraq helped unleash other GOP criticism of the White House in the run-up to the midterm election, was careful Monday not to directly challenge the president's role as the nation's commander in chief.

His resolution accepts the White House argument that "a failed state in Iraq would present a threat to regional and world peace" and explicitly rejects the calls of many Bush opponents for a withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"Those are matters that must be left to the president," Warner said on the floor of the Senate on Monday evening. "We do not mean to be confrontational with our president."

The resolution also accepts that additional troops may be needed in Al Anbar province to fight the insurgency there.

Bush has proposed deploying 4,000 of the 21,500 additional troops in the Sunni-dominated region.

But Warner and the resolution's other authors embraced many arguments made by the war's fiercest Democratic opponents.

The lawmakers also included the advice against an escalation by Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the outgoing Middle East commander. They quote Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's statement that "the crisis is political." They note the track record of unfulfilled promises by the Iraqi government. And they observe the growing public opposition to continued U.S. military presence in Iraq.

"The responsibility for Iraq's internal security and halting sectarian violence must rest primarily with the government of Iraq and Iraqi security forces," the resolution reads.

Warner said Monday that he envisions bringing up his resolution on the Senate floor as a substitute for Biden's.

But with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which Biden heads, set to begin consideration of the issue Wednesday, some senatorial aides say Democrats are likely to seek a compromise resolution.

More From GOP Oppose Hike In U.S. Troop Levels (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congressional Republicans pushed back Monday against President Bush's decision to increase troop strength in Iraq, some voicing opposition while others urged holding the administration and Iraqi government more accountable.

In the Senate, John Warner of Virginia, former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, joined fellow Republicans Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota in producing non-binding legislation expressing disagreement with Bush's plan. Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., joined them.

In the House of Representatives, members of the Republican leadership drafted a series of what they called "strategic benchmarks," and said the White House should submit monthly reports to Congress measuring progress.

The action taken by Collins, Coleman and Warner raised the number of Senate GOP publicly against Bush's plan to five. Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine have said they back the Democrats' resolution.

More Republicans Join Critics Of Bush Troop-Surge Strategy (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Weighing into the Iraq debate, the Republican past chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee broke ranks with the White House over sending 21,500 more U.S. troops to the war zone, especially for the purpose of quelling sectarian violence in Baghdad.

"The American GI was not trained, not sent over there, certainly not by resolution of this institution, to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and Shia and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," said Sen. John Warner (R., Va.) "That's a mission that's important...but it should be performed by the Iraqi forces and not the coalition forces."

Mr. Warner's remarks came as he and a handful of senators from both parties joined in offering a nonbinding Senate resolution intended to give voice to concerns about President Bush's policy. The tone is softer than a companion proposal offered last week by leading Democrats and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R., Neb.), but showed promise last night of sparking negotiations on a compromise able to maximize support from both parties.

"This resolution is aimed at broadening the support for the resolution dealing with the president's plan," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D., Neb.), who joined with Mr. Warner and Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine) in drafting the resolution. In an interview last evening, Mr. Hagel said that Sen. Warner had allowed him to preview the language on Friday and found it to be, in some instances, more detailed than his own in specifying what course the administration should follow.

"The bottom line is this is a pretty significant piece of legislation," Mr. Hagel said. "In no way is this good news for the administration."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joe Biden (D., Del.), a chief sponsor of the earlier resolution with Sen. Hagel, has called a meeting tomorrow on the matter and signaled a willingness to accept changes to broaden support.

"What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war," said a Biden aide. "We're open to working with anybody and working on language to get a broad majority behind our resolution."

Nonetheless, the situation is complicated by the growing rivalry among would-be Democratic presidential candidates, including Mr. Biden himself. The Delaware Democrat has to navigate through this thicket, and if the various camps aren't careful, the whole debate could degenerate into the sort of political word games and posturing that so often bring ridicule on the Senate.

Mr. Bush, who delivers his State of the Union address before a joint session of Congress this evening, has shown no sign of backing away from the planned deployment of four infantry combat brigades over the coming months. But the nervousness among Republicans is palpable, especially among those up for re-election in 2008.

House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio surprised some of his own colleagues by proposing the creation of a bipartisan House select committee to oversee the president's strategy in Iraq and hold the White House accountable for achieving prescribed "benchmarks." And among the Republican senators speaking out most forcefully now are several facing re-election in two years.

"We're all struggling as to what the right thing to do is. On issues like this you are going to make some people happy and some people unhappy," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R., Minn.).

Mr. Warner, who will be 80 next month, is weighing his own future and whether to seek another term in 2008. Virginia just elected a Democrat, Sen. Jim Webb, a Vietnam veteran who ran strongly against the president on the war issue and will deliver the Democratic response to the State of the Union. But apart from any political considerations, Mr. Warner's unhappiness with the direction of the war has been growing for some time, and if he should break fully with the president, it would be a major blow.

"It's clear that the United States' strategy and operations in Iraq can only be sustained and achieved with the support of the American people," Mr. Warner said "I'm a veteran of the Vietnam period when I was secretary of the Navy, and while I suggest that that conflict does not have any direct parallels to this, I did witness the decline of the public support."

Key Republican Senator Offers Bipartisan Call To Reject Bush Plan For More Troops In Iraq (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120411

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, one of Congress's leading authorities on the military, presented a bipartisan proposal on Monday that soundly rejected President Bush's plan to send more American troops to Baghdad and urged the administration to find a new course in Iraq.

"Mr. President," Mr. Warner declared, "go back and look at all the options."

On the eve of the State of the Union address, the proposal by Mr. Warner and two fellow Republican senators, Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, along with Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, was offered as an alternative to an Iraq resolution backed by Democratic leaders and is to be debated this week by the Foreign Relations Committee.

While details of the competing Iraq plans varied, one point could not be mistaken: a growing number of senators in both parties find the president's strategy flawed. While some Republicans still vow to back the White House, the tough language from Mr. Warner, a former chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a onetime Navy secretary, dealt a blow to administration officials trying to salvage the Iraq plan.

"The American G.I. was not trained, not sent over there — certainly not by resolution of this institution — to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shia and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Mr. Warner said. "We don't lessen importance of that mission, but it should be performed by the Iraqi forces and not the coalition forces."

The new resolution reflected Mr. Warner's typical style — in their public comments, he and his allies took a diplomatic tone and sought to play down friction with the administration. Yet the language of the proposal itself was clear in declaring opposition to the troop buildup and urging the Iraqi leaders to seek a political solution to the sectarian violence.

"We've had four other surges since we first went into Iraq," Ms. Collins said. "None of them produced a long-lasting change in the situation on the ground. So I am very skeptical that this surge would produce the desired outcome."

The new Warner proposal and the resolution introduced last week by Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, and Carl Levin of Michigan, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, are similar in many respects. Both are nonbinding but declare that United States involvement in Iraq cannot be sustained without strong public support and that the main military mission in Iraq should be ensuring the nation's territorial integrity.

"There is no misunderstanding, if anyone votes for this, you disagree with the president here," Mr. Hagel said, adding that he and other supporters of his resolution were open to negotiations.

But Mr. Warner's proposal says the Senate "disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces," while the other resolution states that it is "not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence."

Mr. Warner engineered a similar resolution demanding a change in Iraq policy in 2005. Building on a Democratic bill, Mr. Warner, then chairman of the Armed Services Committee, maneuvered a resolution through Congress that called for Iraqis to take the lead in securing their country and required reports to Congress on progress there.

That proposal also required 2006 to be a year of transition to full sovereignty in Iraq, and Mr. Warner's new plan cites that requirement as part of the basis for resisting the troop buildup.

As early as next week, the full Senate could open the most extensive Iraq debate to be conducted in more than four years. The proposal unveiled Monday, sponsors said, was fashioned to be more palatable to moderate Democrats and Republicans because it seeks to employ recommendations from the Iraq Study Group and offers guidelines to establish a military strategy.

"It's important to send a strong message to the White House," Mr. Nelson said. "And it's a stronger message when it has significant bipartisan support."

As Mr. Warner and his coalition acted, House Republicans advanced their own plan on Monday, hoping to find some middle ground between unqualified support for Mr. Bush's plan and mounting resistance among the rank and file, who are moving away from the administration.

Under a plan announced Monday by Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader, and other senior Republicans, Mr. Bush would be required to provide monthly reports on progress in meeting goals in Iraq beginning this month.

Among the new "benchmarks" proposed by Republicans would be the level of cooperation by the Iraqi government in military efforts as well as Iraqi troop deployments and spending on military equipment. Republicans said they have also asked the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, to establish a bipartisan committee to monitor Mr. Bush's new strategy.

"The new majority has two choices," Mr. Boehner said. "They can either try to stop the president's new strategy and block funding for our troops, or they can join us in aggressively holding the Bush administration and the Iraqi government accountable for achieving success."

That comment hit a nerve with Democrats, who said Republicans failed consistently in their duty to scrutinize the administration's conduct of the war when they held majorities in the House and Senate.

"Where were the Republicans the last four years?" said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Ms. Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0120412

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who has proposed a resolution to block spending for any increase in troops, said the terminology in a final resolution may be less important than gaining Republican support for it.

“If you look at what has happened to this debate in the last 10 days here in the United States, where not only from the Democrats but from the Republicans, this has been a major escalation of expression of opposition, reservation, exasperation, frustration, by members of the president’s own party,” he said. “It’s going to be reflected in the votes here.”

Warner Bill Hits Bush's Troop Surge (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia and other Republicans publicly offered a resolution yesterday condemning President Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq.

The "Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges instead to consider all options and alternatives for achieving the strategic goals set forth below with reduced force levels than proposed," wrote Mr. Warner, joined by Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota.

Sen. Ben Nelson, Nebraska Democrat, also helped draft the nonbinding resolution.

The six-page proposal was less critical than one offered last week by Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, but still included strict instructions for how Mr. Bush should better wage the war in Iraq.

It also contained a harsh assessment of the current situation, indicating that a broad bipartisan coalition on Capitol Hill will desert the commander in chief if he presses forward with his plan to add troops.

"I feel ever so strongly that the American GI was not trained, not sent over there, certainly not by resolution of this institution, to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shi'a and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Mr. Warner told reporters yesterday.

"That's a mission that's important; we don't lessen importance of that mission. But it should be performed by the Iraqi forces and not the coalition forces," he said.

The resolution has not been formally introduced as a bill. It will be offered as an alternative to Mr. Biden's resolution when it reaches the Senate floor in the coming weeks.

The three lawmakers who were in the Senate at the time voted for the October 2002 resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq. Mr. Coleman did not join the Senate until 2003.

All four took pains at yesterday's press conference in the Capitol to include conciliatory words for the administration.

"The purpose of this resolution is not to cut our forces at the current level or to set any timetables for withdrawal, but rather to express the genuine -- and I repeat -- the genuine concerns of a number of senators from both parties about the president's plan," Mr. Warner said. "It is not meant to be confrontational but instead to provide a sense of bipartisan resolve that I hope we can achieve with regard to our new strategy in Iraq."

And, possibly more important, they embraced Mr. Bush's continued hopes for a victory there.

"We agree with the president -- a failed state of Iraq will threaten world peace for a long time to come," Mr. Warner said.

Mr. Coleman said the resolution "does recognize the consequences of failure. I want to succeed. I want to force us to succeed."

Among their directions is to increase troop levels in the volatile Anbar province, "specifically for the purpose of combating an insurgency, including elements associated with the Al Qaeda movement, and denying terrorists a safe haven."

Mr. Nelson said he expects the proposal to draw support from plenty of colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

"We've now just recently in the last hour or two circulated drafts. I've been talking to a number of my colleagues, many of whom have an interest in being supportive," he said. "This resolution will really, I think, be a very strong message to the White House."

He also said it avoids "any partisan rhetoric," a reference to the harsher Biden resolution, which has support from Mr. Nelson's Republican seatmate, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

Although some Democrats who want to see troops withdrawn weren't signing onto the resolution yesterday, they hailed it as continued erosion of support for Mr. Bush's war policies.

"The opposition to the President's misguided escalation of the Iraq war is growing louder and louder," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat. "How much louder -- and how much clearer -- does the opposition to his plan need to be before the President will begin to listen and respond to the voices of the American people, the generals, and a bipartisan majority of Congress? The last thing America needs is to send more troops into a civil war that never would have been authorized by Congress, and will do nothing to end the war in Iraq."

Warner Backs Resolution Opposing Troop Increase (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, yesterday endorsed a new resolution opposing President Bush's buildup of troops in Baghdad, as even some of the most loyal Republicans scrambled to register their concerns and distance themselves from an unpopular policy.

The resolution, unveiled the day before the president's State of the Union address, is expected to garner the support of many Senate Republicans -- especially those facing reelection next year. The measure appeals to many rank-and-file Republicans because it allows them to voice their differences with the administration without embracing the highly critical language of another bipartisan resolution co-sponsored by Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), one of the sharpest critics of the administration's Iraq policy.

By last night, Warner had already met with Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), and the two camps were negotiating a single resolution likely to be approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday.

Even House Republicans, once the president's firmest bulwark, made their skepticism clear yesterday, calling for firm benchmarks for success in the war that House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said would "hold the Bush administration and the Iraqi government accountable and require the administration to report to Congress every 30 days."

"I support the president's plan," Boehner said. "But we have a duty to candidly and honestly assess whether the new strategy will be effective and ultimately successful."

That statement marked an important shift within a Republican leadership that has rarely made demands on the administration's foreign policy team. With public support for the war at record lows, the Democrats back in control of Congress and many Republicans facing tough reelection campaigns in two years, party leaders feel they have little choice but to voice their disapproval with plans for a troop buildup.

With the introduction of the Warner resolution, five Republican senators are now on record opposing Bush's decision. The resolution's co-sponsors, Warner, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), are all up for reelection next year, as is Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who was included in the resolution's drafting over the weekend.

Another group of senior Republican senators, including Sens. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), are searching for their own avenue to express their concerns.

"The American people on November 7 changed management in the United States Congress. The overriding issue was Iraq," Hagel said. "What you're seeing is representative democracy in action. What you're seeing is the clear attitudes of the American people playing out among their elective representatives."

The Warner-Coleman-Collins resolution tones down some of the language in the competing resolution drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), Hagel and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and couches its recommendations in wording deferential to the constitutional authority of the president.

But it states that "the Senate disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces by 21,500."

"Our overall military, diplomatic and economic strategy should not be regarded as an 'open-ended' or unconditional commitment, but rather as a new strategy that hereafter should be conditioned upon the Iraqi government's meeting benchmarks that must be specified by the Administration," it concludes.

The House Republican benchmarks also represented a clear break from administration policy. Under the proposal, every 30 days the White House would have to present Congress clear measurements showing the Iraqi government's progress in purging insurgents and terrorists from its security forces, identifying the level of combat experience for Iraqi army battalions, tracking expenditures on Iraqi army equipment and measuring the effectiveness of the police force in Baghdad. The administration would also have to measure Iraqi government efforts to breed tolerance among its country's warring sects.

House Republicans also called on the administration to measure its efforts to cooperate with neighboring countries to stabilize Iraq, a push for regional diplomacy that the White House has resisted.

"We have a responsibility to reach across the aisle and to work with our Democrat counterparts to perform our obligation under the Constitution," Boehner said. "We're a separate branch of the government. We were sent here by the American people, and we believe that proper oversight of this plan and implementation of this plan can help make it successful."

Some Republican aides saw both the Senate and House developments as positive for Bush, because they give Republicans eager to voice their opposition to the president's Iraq policy ways to go on record without siding with the more forthright statements of opposition drafted with more Democratic support.

But Democrats characterized the development as strong evidence of Bush's eroding support. The Foreign Relations Committee will take up the Biden-Hagel language tomorrow and send a modified version for debate in the full Senate next week.

DOJ_NMG_0120414

The Warner group has largely reached the same conclusion as Biden, Hagel and Levin: U.S. troops should focus on protecting Iraq's border, combating terrorism and training Iraqi forces, and the administration should step up diplomatic efforts to start a regional peace process.

Committee aides said they will study the Warner resolution and are almost certain to make changes to win support from his coalition.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) took to the Senate floor yesterday to implore his colleagues not to go through with a vote on any resolution of opposition, calling the effort "pernicious" and "very, very dangerous."

GOP Delivers New Blow On Troop Surge (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

George W. Bush's efforts to shore up support for his military surge in Iraq suffered another blow on Monday when a senior Republican senator came out against the controversial plan.

John Warner, the former navy secretary and until last month chairman of the armed services committee, said he would introduce a resolution opposing the sending of 21,500 more US troops to Iraq. The resolution was also backed by two Republican senators, Susan Collins and Norm Coleman, and by Ben Nelson, a conservative Democrat.

Ayman al-Zawahiri, the deputy to Osama bin Laden, taunted Mr Bush on Monday over his decision to send more troops to Iraq.

"Why send 20,000 only – why not send 50,000 or 100,000? Aren't you aware that the dogs of Iraq are pining for your troops' dead bodies?" he said in a video released the day before Mr Bush was to address the nation with his annual State of the Union speech.

The intensified opposition to the surge came the day before General David Petraeus, the incoming US commander in Iraq, was to face tough questions on Capitol Hill on whether Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, would live up to his promise to crack down on sectarian militias.

Senators are unlikely to challenge the nomination of the respected soldier but they will grill Gen Petraeus on the plan to pacify Baghdad. The problem facing US and Iraqi forces was underscored on Monday by bombings across Iraq that claimed more than 100 lives.

Gen Petraeus will run a military operation that has run into resistance on Capitol Hill. In addition to Mr Warner, whose move could sway wavering Republicans, a number of Democrats are pushing symbolic resolutions intended to press Mr Bush to abandon the surge, while others are introducing measures that would cap the number of troops or block funding for an increase.

Mr Bush has argued that the surge will differ from previous failed operations in Baghdad because of the streng-thened commitment of Mr Maliki that there will be no political interference in operations aimed at clamping down on Shia militia loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr. The Shia cleric's political support has been crucial to the Maliki government.

Although US and Iraqi troops have raided safe houses used by the Mahdi army, Mr Sadr's militia, and detained commanders for months, US officers have accused the prime minister of offering political protection to the movement. In the past two weeks, however, that protection appears to have been withdrawn. In addition to raids on the Mahdi army over the past 10 days, US and Iraqi forces on Friday arrested Abdel al-Darraji, a senior aide to Mr Sadr.

But the continuation of insurgent attacks on civilian Shia targets such as the one on a busy Baghdad market on Monday that killed at least 88 people will test the authority of the government as it moves to dismantle a force that many Shia believe to be their first line of defence against Sunni extremists.

Also, the lack of benchmarks makes it difficult to gauge whether Mr Maliki genuinely wants to neutralise militias.

Congressional Republicans Voice Concerns Over Bush's Iraq Policy (LEXHL)

By Renee Schoof And Margaret Talev

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sen. John Warner, an influential Republican on military affairs, introduced a bipartisan resolution Monday that opposes President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more American troops to Iraq and urges shifting U.S. soldiers out of the middle of the sectarian killings that are raging in Baghdad.

On the eve of Bush's State of the Union address, Warner's resolution was one of two strong signals that Republicans in Congress sent Monday showing their doubts about the war. The other came from Republicans in the House of Representatives, who said they wanted Bush to certify on a monthly basis whatever progress was being made in Iraq on military, political and social benchmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0120415

Combined with near-unanimous Democratic opposition to Bush's war policy, the Republican stands show a broad bipartisan lack of confidence in the president's course.

Warner said the United States already had "made a tremendous sacrifice in our nation of life and limb and largess" to establish Iraq's sovereignty, and that now Iraqi forces should stop the violence.

Under the president's plan, U.S. troops would be asked to help stop the death squads and bombings now racking Baghdad.

"I feel ever so strongly that the American GI was not trained, not sent over there, certainly not by resolution of this institution, to be placed in the middle of a fight between the Sunni and the Shi'a and the wanton and just incomprehensible killing that's going on at this time," Warner said.

House Republican leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who supports Bush's troop increase, made the recommendation for a monthly benchmark report in a letter to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and proposed that Pelosi create a bipartisan select committee to oversee the reports.

"Congress cannot and must not dictate the strategies or methods used in war," Boehner's letter said, "but we have a duty to the American people to candidly and honestly assess whether our efforts have been successful."

While Warner's resolution could pull support from a more strongly worded resolution of no confidence in Bush's Iraq policy that Democratic Senate leaders are promoting, it also could be the starting point for negotiations toward a compromise resolution opposing the troop increase that would win broad bipartisan support.

The resolution drafted by Warner and Sens. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., and supported by Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., is nonconfrontational in tone. It stresses that the Senate doesn't question the president's power as commander in chief and notes that Bush himself, when he announced his new plan Jan. 10, invited members of Congress to suggest ways to improve it.

It's similar in key ways to a resolution proposed last week by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Carl Levin, D-Mich., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, and favored by Senate Democratic leaders.

Both resolutions oppose Bush's plan to increase the number of American troops in Iraq. Both stress that the job of quelling the fighting in Baghdad should belong to the Iraqi government, while U.S. troops should help protect Iraq's territory from outside assault, fight terrorists and train Iraqi troops.

But Warner's resolution avoids one politically loaded term: escalation. It uses the word "augment" to describe the president's increase in forces; the Biden resolution calls it "escalating" the U.S. military presence.

Warner said he'd vote against Biden's resolution as drafted but that he might support it if it were revised. The task of polishing the wording now goes to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which Biden chairs.

"What's striking is that the bottom line of both resolutions is the same: bipartisan opposition to the president's plan to send more American troops to Iraq to fight a civil war. We're open to working with anybody and look forward to a bipartisan discussion on the Biden-Hagel-Levin-Snowe resolution in the Foreign Relations Committee on Wednesday," Biden spokeswoman Elizabeth Alexander said.

Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said in an e-mail response to McClatchy Newspapers that "the president and Congress are in agreement on most elements of Iraq policy, including the Iraqis taking the lead in political reconciliation as well as security. ... The various resolutions show there are a lot of different ideas and disagreements on the way forward in Iraq."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Warner's proposal appeared to help more than hinder Democrats' efforts. "It appears to me that the president's going to have bipartisan opposition to the escalation, or augmentation, or whatever you want to call it," he said.

Rockefeller: Iraq Drains Security Funds (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, January 23, 2007

The new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee said he fears the government will not have enough money for homeland security and other domestic priorities because of President Bush's "Iraq adventure."

In an interview on Monday, Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., criticized almost every major facet of the Bush administration's national security course since Sept. 11, 2001. "The president has in a sense walked away from the war on terror," Rockefeller said.

Because of what he termed a misplaced fascination with Iraq based on faulty intelligence, Rockefeller said al-Qaida and Afghanistan have been neglected. He said he worries that U.S. intelligence on Iran is lacking, and what the nation knows about North Korea is even worse.

DOJ_NMG_0120416

And he recently told Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson that domestic programs — such as education, health care, the environment and homeland security — are suffering. "That is one of my great, great worries about this Iraq adventure: the shortage of money for homeland security," he said.

Economically, "everything is going to close up and get tougher, and it's all because of the budget and the result of something called Iraq," Rockefeller later added. "I am furious about that."

In the State of the Union address Tuesday night, Bush is expected to reiterate that U.S. involvement in Iraq is part of a unified fight against terror, despite criticism from those who say the Iraqis themselves must do more to fight what now amounts to a civil war. Yet Bush has long said that if the United States doesn't stop the terrorists in Iraq, they will attack at home.

Disagreeing with Rockefeller, Missouri Sen. Kit Bond, the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said statements from al-Qaida's leaders prove Iraq is central to the fight against extremism. "Both Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri say that Iraq is the center piece in the war on terror. That is why they want to win it," he said in a separate interview.

Rockefeller plans two hearings this week on the course of intelligence reform. He said the FBI has made progress at protecting the country, but he still worries about the bureau's lack of technology and its ability to transition from an agency whose investigations are aimed at prosecuting criminals in court, to one that investigates to head off acts such as terrorism.

He said there are still missteps akin to those made on al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, in which the FBI pounces too quickly on a visa violation, rather than tracking a suspected terrorist to learn more about his activities.

Despite improvements at the FBI, he said, "I am not satisfied."

Rockefeller said he's also concerned that the Bush administration could be marching toward a military confrontation with Iran.

"Do I think it's possible that the president could get us involved marginally or even more fully in Iran as a way of distracting us from the war on terror, and from Iraq, as a way of getting past the elections in 2008?" Rockefeller asked. "I don't want to believe that. But after what I have been through with him ... yes, I worry about it enormously."

Rockefeller has formed working groups within his committee to focus on difficult national security issues, including Iran, and the 16 U.S. spy agencies are also working on a high-level National Intelligence Estimate on Iran.

Even as he and Bond have agreed on a forward-looking agenda, Rockefeller intends to finish the second phase of the committee's lingering investigation into the spy agencies' faulty prewar assessments of Iraq.

Rockefeller, who voted to authorize the Iraq invasion, said he was "a victim" of bad intelligence.

He said the intelligence analysis is better now, and he believes intelligence analysts are more willing to say when they don't know certain information. Yet he still sees many gaps in understanding — at the spy agencies and the White House.

The administration, he said, doesn't understand the insurgency because officials have never been in a war like this one. He's also concerned that the turmoil in Iraq will spill over into the region.

Rockefeller said he hasn't met Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but he does "not have a great deal" of faith in him. He said the United States must tell the Iraqis that American troops will leave — and they must believe it.

Then, the work will be up to the Sunnis and Shiites. "They have to face each other, and they really do have to decide for the first time since 1916 whether they can get along," he said, referring to the origins of the country that is now Iraq.

Lawmakers Have Loved Ones In Combat Zone (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., lost his nephew, Philip, in Iraq. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., says his son, Alan, had two close calls: one from an improvised explosive device, the other from a sniper.

Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo., credits his nightly prayers with his son Perry's narrow escape from a mortar attack in Fallujah.

Almost four years into the war, the conflict in Iraq has begun to touch some of the lawmakers who authorized it in a very personal way.

That reality — which stands in stark contrast to the popular stereotype of Congress — will be embodied tonight by Sen. Jim Webb, the Virginia Democrat delivering the response to President Bush's State of the Union address.

Webb's eldest son, Jimmy, is a Marine in the combat zone. He can't bring himself to talk about his son — not even to the president — but others speak eloquently of their loved ones' sacrifices.

"I understand and sympathize with the Americans who continue to support this war because they do not want their family and friends to have died in vain," Baucus said of his nephew's death in a Senate speech Feb. 10. "I know what it is like to pray for a reason and to become determined not to lose."

Perceptions of Congress

DOJ_NMG_0120417

In his 2004 documentary Fahrenheit 9/11, filmmaker Michael Moore showed members of Congress sputtering as he put a camera in their faces and asked whether they'd send their children to Iraq. In arguing for a reinstatement of the military draft, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., suggested his colleagues were out of touch when they authorized the war. "I continue to believe that decision-makers would never have supported the invasion if more of them had family members in line for deployment," he wrote in a column last fall.

At least nine members of Congress have sons or daughters who have served in Iraq, according to the U.S. Senate Library. A tenth, Sen. John McCain, faces the possibility that his youngest son, Jimmy, will go there this year.

Like other Americans in similar situations, the lawmakers are torn by powerful emotions. "We worried every day, but that did not take away from our pride," said Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., whose stepson, Douglas Lehtinen and his wife, Lindsey, are Marine fighter pilots. They ended an eight-month tour of duty in Iraq last year; Lindsey Lehtinen may be headed back there this year, Ros-Lehtinen said.

It's difficult to determine exactly how many lawmakers have had relatives in Iraq because some don't want to talk about it. In part it's because they don't want to appear to be seeking special treatment; in part it's out of security concerns. "When Perry was actually in Fallujah, I didn't want to mention the location to make him some sort of higher-value target," Akin said.

The number of lawmakers with relatives involved in the war is probably lower than in past conflicts, congressional historians say, in part because there are fewer soldiers involved. Compared with Vietnam, Korea and World War II, "this is a fairly limited conflict," said Ray Smock, director of the Robert C. Byrd legislative resource center at Shepherd University.

Members of Congress with Iraq veterans in the family are as divided as the rest of the country over the war. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., cited his niece and nephew, who both enlisted in the Marines, in a speech where he expressed misgivings about the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Baucus and Webb are also against it.

Others say they will support the Bush plan — with varying degrees of enthusiasm. "I'm a reluctant supporter," said Rep. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo. The congressman's brother-in-law, Ryan Howell, is an Army major. Howell is back in the USA, and Hulshof said their talks over the family dinner table helped persuade him to back the Bush plan as a "last-ditch effort" to stabilize Iraq.

Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., whose son Sam is scheduled to return to Iraq for his second tour of duty this spring as the head of a Marine scout sniper platoon, is less equivocal. Bond said his son has convinced him that "pulling out early downgrades and denigrates the sacrifices that we've made."

Messages from the war

Members of Congress sometimes get bulletins from their relatives on the front lines. Rep. Joe Wilson, R-S.C., passed his Blackberry down the dais during House Armed Services Committee hearings, so his colleagues could read the latest message from his son, Alan, an Army reservist who spent a year in Iraq.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., who chaired the panel last year, said he was in a hearing when his son, also named Duncan, called him on a satellite phone during a battle in Fallujah.

The younger Hunter was "very unhappy," his father said, because the Marines were being ordered to stop attacking. "So I called up the Pentagon," the congressman said.

Lawmakers say having loved ones in Iraq makes them more sensitive to the war's implications. "When the early morning news comes on and says 'Marines killed in Iraq,' your stomach tightens," Bond said. Members of Congress insist, however, that their personal ties don't affect their decisions.

Baucus said he decided to oppose the president's proposal to increase troop levels because "our plan's not working," not because of his nephew's death. Hulshof said he voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of military force in Iraq even though his brother-in-law was on maneuvers in Kuwait and "I knew my vote was going to put him in the middle of things."

Webb, a Vietnam War combat veteran, said members of Congress should weigh their decisions with equal care whether it is their flesh and blood on the line or their constituents'. "Every single person up here should act like they have somebody over there," he said.

In New Tape, Al Qaeda Deputy Taunts Bush (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

CAIRO, Jan. 22 (AP) — Al Qaeda's deputy leader on Monday mocked President Bush's plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, challenging him to send the "entire army" and vowing that insurgents would defeat them, according to a new videotape released by an American group that tracks messages from Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0120418

The group, the Washington-based SITE Institute, said it had intercepted the video from Ayman al-Zawahri, which had not yet been posted on militant Islamist Web sites, where his messages usually appear. SITE, which assesses and analyzes intelligence related to terrorism, did not elaborate on how it had received the message.

In the tape, Mr. Zawahri said the United States strategy for Iraq, outlined by Mr. Bush in a speech on Jan. 9, was doomed to fail.

"I ask him, why send 20,000 only — why not send 50,000 or 100,000?" Mr. Zawahri says on the video released by SITE. "Aren't you aware that the dogs of Iraq are pining for your troops' dead bodies?

"So send your entire army to be annihilated at the hands of the holy warriors to free the world from your evil," he continues, "because Iraq, land of the caliphate and jihad, is able to bury 10 armies like yours, with God's help and power."

The video showed Mr. Zawahri in a full gray beard, wearing a white turban, in front of a black backdrop.

The message was the first reaction from Al Qaeda's leadership to the new Iraq strategy.

The United States has said the extra troops will try to crack down on fighters from Al Qaeda and other Sunni Arab insurgents in Iraq, as well as Shiite militiamen who take part in sectarian violence.

General May See Early Success In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The battle for Baghdad will start in mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods chosen by military strategists as being the least likely to offer stiff resistance, raising the odds of early success, according to military planners and officials familiar with the thinking of the incoming Iraq commander, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus.

But that could be followed by a sharp increase in violence as insurgents learn U.S. and Iraqi tactics, military officials said.

The general, whose Senate confirmation hearing is scheduled for this morning, plans to send all 17,500 additional U.S. troops ordered by President Bush into Baghdad, regardless of whether Iraqi army units join the fight as planned, according to officials familiar with his thinking. Anticipating an uneven performance by the Iraqi army, military planners are advocating using American force and funding quickly to establish early victories, both in improving security and showing economic progress.

Petraeus's appointment as the top U.S. commander comes at a key point in the war, when public support is lower than ever and the congressional debate is coming to a head. The general offered a harsh critique of U.S. mistakes in Iraq in written testimony submitted to the Senate yesterday, noting a range of ills that included poorly managed elections and inadequate reconstruction plans. Now, as military and political leaders tout Petraeus as the best man to salvage the Iraq effort, he is in the delicate position of wanting to show progress quickly without raising expectations too high.

"This will be a difficult mission and time is not on our side," he states in the written testimony to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Petraeus will require his troops to operate and live among the population, hoping to safeguard security and economic gains for neighborhoods cleared of violence. Military experts say that violence could decrease through April and May but that once insurgents get a feel for U.S. and Iraqi army tactics, a new "fighting season" could begin in late spring -- triggering potential political problems for U.S. public support of the operation.

Perhaps most important, Army insiders say they expect Petraeus to show a very different style from his reserved predecessor, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. "You are going to see a much more active command style than Casey," said one officer who has worked with both men. "Petraeus will be out walking the streets, visiting units and firing up both his Iraqi and coalition forces with his personal attention."

Like every active-duty officer and Pentagon official interviewed for this article, he asked not to be identified by name, noting the sensitivity of the situation as Petraeus awaits confirmation. Also, this officer noted, Petraeus has shown that he can use sticks as well as carrots: "He is also willing to fire people."

Petraeus aims to fly to Iraq as soon as possible, partly because, as one officer put it, he sees signs that "everyone's going on hold" there now as they await his arrival.

The plan to bring security to Baghdad will begin with the deployment of U.S. and Iraqi troops into nine sectors across the city. For years, most U.S. troops have lived on big "Forward Operating Bases." Petraeus plans to instead establish battalion command posts across the city. "I plan to ensure that some of our forces locate in the neighborhoods they protect," he said in his written statement.

People who have spoken with Petraeus recently said he believes that politicians and journalists have put too much emphasis on the increase in troop numbers and too little on his intention to use them differently. Their top priority will be protecting the Iraqi population, following counterinsurgency doctrine laid out in a new Army manual, which he oversaw, that says "the people are the prize."

The plan calls for large numbers of Iraqi and U.S. forces to flow into a targeted area like an ocean tide, temporarily overwhelming militia and insurgent fighters. But unlike in the past, when the tide goes out, it will leave behind a substantial residual force of Iraq army and police units, backed up by mobile U.S. troops. In this way, planners hope to "hold" neighborhoods rather than just "clear" them of the enemy.

The first big question will be whether Iraqi forces show up as promised. Early indications are good, said one person familiar with Iraqi troop movements over the past several days. But they will have to be monitored constantly. The next question will be whether the Iraqi forces actually do anything, or just pretend to comply with American requests. The third will be whether they remain to finish the job, or pull out before the campaign is really completed.

The next big question is how the militia of Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric who is anti-American and a major power in the Iraqi government, will respond to the new U.S. troop presence on the streets of Baghdad. Sadr's Mahdi Army, the single most powerful Shiite militia, has been implicated in death squad activities. "Actions taken in Sadr City will have to be carefully considered," Petraeus says in his statement, referring to Sadr's stronghold in eastern Baghdad.

U.S. military intelligence officers believe that Sadr initially won't confront the new U.S. troops. "I think the Mahdi Army will lay low where we are in present in strength," one intelligence officer predicted yesterday.

The combination of factors -- a militia response of waiting out the U.S. campaign, combined with initial operations in easier areas -- should cause a reduction in violence early in the campaign, said one Army insider. But he predicted that any drop would be short-lived.

By about March, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said recently, U.S. commanders should have a good assessment of whether the Iraqi government is able to deliver on its promises. He said that deployment of all five extra U.S. brigades in the pipeline will depend on Iraqi performance.

But people familiar with Petraeus's thinking say that he is likely to take a different course, ignoring any Iraqi shortcomings and asking for all five brigades of planned U.S. reinforcements, figuring out that a true test of the strategy of clearing and holding, and of protecting the citizenry of Baghdad, will require all those 17,500 troops. "To do what has to be done, they all have to go," said a senior defense official who met last week with Petraeus.

During the first months of the campaign, Petraeus is likely to be wary of declarations of success or calls from Capitol Hill to begin curtailing the troop increase. "Gaining the trust of the populace is going to take more than 30 to 90 days, which means the timeline for obtaining real results are out of sync with what the Hill and the U.S. populace is looking for in the way of results," a strategist for the Joint Staff said.

By April or early May, American planners hope that the levels of violence will begin to go down. But they also fear that this is the point at which the campaign could begin to go quietly sour. Insurgents and militias will have had time to study the new U.S. approaches and determine where the points of vulnerability exist.

By June, all the troops in the planned increase should be operating in Baghdad, with U.S. forces in the city having increased from 24,000 to about 41,000, and Iraqi troop levels rising from 42,000 to about 50,000.

By mid-summer, officers involved in planning said, Petraeus hopes to be able to point to a sustained decrease in violence.

Yet summer may bring the most dangerous point of the entire campaign, especially if U.S. forces begin to withdraw, warned retired Marine Col. Gary Anderson, who has advised top U.S. officials on insurgencies. He predicted that Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias will "wait out the surge, falling upon the Iraqi security forces when the Americans start leaving, causing a Tet-like effect where the light at the end of the tunnel is an oncoming train."

Petraeus Cites Errors In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is poised to become the top commander in Iraq, believes that the U.S. government has made a host of serious mistakes there, according to written testimony he submitted yesterday to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Among the errors he cites are inadequate planning for the occupation, failing to recognize the emergence of the insurgency, not having enough troops in certain areas and holding elections in such a way that they deepened Iraq's sectarian divisions.

Here are some excerpts (the entire document is available at washingtonpost.com):

-- "[T]here were a number of assumptions and assessments that did not bear out. Prominent among them was the assumption that Iraqis would remain in their barracks and ministry facilities and resume their functions as soon as interim governmental structures were in place."

DOJ_NMG_0120420

-- "There was the feeling that elections would enhance the Iraqi sense of nationalism. Instead, the elections hardened sectarian positions as Iraqis voted largely based on ethnic and sectarian group identity."

-- "There was an underestimation of the security challenges in Iraq. . . . It repeatedly took us time to recognize changes in the security environment and to react to them. "

-- "Disbanding the Iraqi army . . . without simultaneously announcing a stipend and pension program for those in the Army. . . ."

-- "We took too long to recognize the growing insurgency and to take steps to counter it, though we did eventually come to grips with it."

137 Killed Or Found Dead Across Iraq (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, January 23, 2007

A suicide bomber crashed his car into a central Baghdad market crowded with Shiites just seconds after another car bomb tore through the stalls where vendors were hawking DVDs and used clothing, leaving 88 dead Monday in the bloodiest attack in two months.

The bombings, along with a double bombing that killed 12 people in the town of Khalis, battered Shiites during one of their holiest festivals. The attacks were the latest in a renewed campaign of insurgent violence in advance of a U.S.-Iraqi security operation.

In all, 137 people were killed or found dead across Iraq, including a teacher who was gunned down as she was on her way to work at a girls' school in a mainly Sunni area of Baghdad. The toll also included the bullet-riddled bodies of at least 30 people, apparent victims of death squads largely run by Shiite militias.

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed its fighters shot down an American military helicopter in a Saturday crash that killed 12 U.S. soldiers. The U.S. military has said the cause of the crash has not been determined.

In Washington, a senior military official said investigators found debris near the scene of the helicopter crash that could be part of a shoulder-fired weapon. The official requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Monday's explosions, which could be heard a mile away from the banks of the Tigris River, tore through the Bab al-Sharqi market shortly after noon in a clear attempt to kill as many people as possible at a time of day when commuters and shoppers tend to gather there in large numbers.

Witnesses said the force of the blasts sent jagged pieces of the sales stalls hurtling through the crowd. Body parts were strewn on the pavement, and heavy gunfire erupted. Black smoke billowed above the center of the capital.

Rescue workers could be seen hauling away a bloodied man on a wooden cart that vendors use to bring goods to market. His pants had been blown off.

Nearby al-Kindi Hospital and its morgue were filled to capacity. Many of the dead were laid out in the courtyard, covered with white and blue cloths, as loved ones crouched beside them shrieking in grief and shouting oaths against the attackers.

Hours later, a bomb struck a market in the predominantly Shiite town of Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, and a mortar shell slammed into the market. At least 12 people were killed and 29 wounded, police said.

Khalis is in the volatile Diyala province, where fighting has raged for weeks among Sunni insurgents, Shiite militiamen and U.S. and Iraqi troops.

In the provincial capital of Baqouba, state television reported that gunmen attacked the mayor's office, ransacking the building and setting off explosives that damaged the structure. Police said the mayor was kidnapped, a report that U.S. officials said they could not immediately confirm.

The twin bombing in Baghdad was the single deadliest attack against civilians in Iraq since Nov. 23, when suspected al-Qaida in Iraq fighters attacked the capital's Sadr City Shiite slum with a series of car bombs and mortars that struck in quick succession, killing at least 215 people.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, denounced Monday's attack and blamed Sunnis. "The alliance of the terrorists and the remnants of Saddam have committed an ugly crime," he said in a statement.

Brig. Jihad al-Jabiri, director of the explosives experts department in the Interior Ministry, told state television that each car apparently carried more than 190 pounds of explosives.

Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili said at least 78 people were killed and 156 were wounded, but police and hospital officials put the death toll at 88.

The attack occurred two days after the start of the 10-day festival leading up to Ashoura, which marks the death of Imam Hussein, grandson of the Prophet Muhammad and one of the most revered Shiite saints.

DOJ_NMG_0120421

Imam Hussein died in the battle of Karbala in A.D. 680. The battle cemented a schism in Islam between Shiites and Sunnis, a division that has grown in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The festival culminates next week with processions and ceremonies, including self flagellation, in a show of grief to mark Hussein's death in battle.

Late Monday, the U.S. military announced it had launched a joint drive with Iraqi forces into a dangerous Sunni neighborhood in north Baghdad, a region that has seen significant violence in the sectarian warfare shaking the capital.

It was unclear if the operation marked the beginning of the security drive that al-Maliki and President Bush announced this month.

Bush has committed an additional 21,500 troops to the effort to secure Iraq, but congressional Democrats, mindful of a rising U.S. military death toll, oppose this move.

A U.S. soldier was killed Monday by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq, raising to 28 the number of American troops killed in the past three days; the U.S. military also reported that two Marines were killed Sunday in Anbar province.

Al-Qaida's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, mocked Bush's plan to send more troops, challenging him to send "the entire army" and vowing in a new videotape that insurgents will defeat them. The Washington-based SITE Institute, which tracks al-Qaida messages, said Monday it had intercepted the video, which had not been posted on Islamic militant Web sites.

The success of the new security plan is strongly linked to the Iraqi government's willingness and ability to take on Shiite militias and death squads. Past operations to end violence in the capital failed when al-Maliki intervened on behalf of his fellow Shiites.

In a rare statement that singled out the feared Mahdi Army of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the American military announced that U.S. and Iraqi forces captured 16 Shiite militia leaders and 33 key Sunni insurgents in the past 45 days. The military said 52 operations since Dec. 8 targeted the Mahdi Army, which has been blamed for much of the sectarian violence in the capital, while 42 focused on Sunni extremists.

U.S. and Iraqi military officials also detailed a recent operation near Baqouba in which they said 100 Sunni insurgents were killed and 50 captured.

88 Killed As Car Bombs Devastate Busy Baghdad Market (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 — Two powerful car bombs ripped through a market in central Baghdad on Monday, turning an area crowded with shoppers and commuters into one of the worst scenes of carnage since the war began.

The bombs killed at least 88 people and wounded 160 others even as the first of some 21,000 extra American troops ordered by President Bush began arriving in Baghdad, and as other troops took up positions on SunniShiite fault lines as part of a new strategy to secure the city.

After a weekend in which 27 American soldiers were killed in Iraq, the attacks underscored the challenges that even an augmented American force faces in trying to quell the sectarian attacks. Military officials privately expressed concerns that a renewed period of intense sectarian fighting could easily overwhelm their efforts.

In addition to the market attacks, a bombing in a Shiite town north of Baghdad killed 15 people on Monday. Elsewhere, Iraqi government officials and members of security forces continued to be shot, blown up and kidnapped.

The blasts at the Baghdad market were in a Shiite area and seemed to have been timed to inflict maximum damage, occurring at noon, one of the busiest times of day. The explosions left so many bodies that they had to be loaded one on top of another on wooden carts, according to witnesses. Other victims were simply blown to pieces.

Ali Hussein 47, a biologist who was on his way home, said he had been knocked off his feet. The force of the blasts, which went off just seconds apart, turned everyday items like lotions and DVDs into deadly projectiles.

“Bottles of perfumes and deodorants were flying in the air like small rockets,” Mr. Hussein said outside Kindi Hospital, which was quickly overwhelmed with victims. “I was wounded in my right leg.”

Police officials said the blasts had been so large that each of the cars used must have carried a huge amount of explosives. From the eastern banks of the Tigris nearby, the two explosions could be heard in quick succession.

Massive clouds of smoke billowed high into the sky, and as the fires caused by the explosion engulfed at least a dozen cars, the cloud drifted over the heavily fortified Green Zone, about a half-mile away.

In the past such Sunni aggression has been met by swift reprisals by Shiites, a cycle of violence that left some 34,000 Iraqis dead last year. Monday’s bombings, directed so specifically at civilians, seemed intended to elicit a reprisal, much like the bombings in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City one day last fall, which killed 144 people.

DOJ_NMG_0120422

Late Monday, a Sunni mosque in the Dora section of Baghdad was blown up. There were no reports of casualties. Residents said the attack was likely to have been retribution for the bombing of a Shiite mosque in the same neighborhood last week.

Elsewhere, the Sunni mayor of Baquba, Khalid al-Sanjari, was abducted Monday, and after armed gunmen took him way from his office they burned it to the ground, according to a local police official.

Residents in Baquba, about 25 miles northeast of Baghdad, said Mr. Sanjari had close ties with armed groups formerly affiliated with the Saddam Hussein government.

"It is strange that this man was kidnapped," one resident said. "The Iraqi police and army have arrested him more than once, and he was released because of lack of evidence."

Although it is far from clear who abducted the mayor, another resident said, "This is a punishment for him, because armed groups tend to get rid of the person who is no longer useful for them."

Late Monday evening, just north of Baquba, at least 15 people were killed and 39 wounded in coordinated bomb and mortar attacks in the Shiite town of Khalis, according to a local police official.

In Tal Afar, the police were attacked in a bombing that left three dead and nine wounded. The town is considered to be one of the few success stories of the American occupation, a place where violence was largely quelled after intensive intervention. It is being used as the model for the new strategy to secure Baghdad.

Meanwhile, a group claiming to represent Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia took responsibility for shooting down an American Black Hawk helicopter northeast of Baghdad on Saturday. Local Iraqi officials at the site of the crash, which killed all 12 people on board, said the helicopter had been attacked, but American officials here said there an investigation was in progress and did not confirm those accounts.

Monday's bombing in Baghdad was followed by prolonged gun battles. The fighting could be heard across the city, although officials did not release any casualty figures from the ensuing skirmishes.

At the site of the car bombings, the popular market in Bab al Sharji, next to the Museum of Modern Art, Iraqi Army troops spotted someone on a nearby rooftop shortly afterward filming the carnage.

They went after him as he tried to escape by jumping from rooftop to rooftop before he was shot dead, according to an Iraqi Army official. The official said the man was Egyptian and was filming the attack to use as propaganda for the Sunni insurgents.

The scene after the fact was all too familiar: charred human remains, pools of blood, unrecognizable body parts strewn among the used electronic equipment, CDs and vegetables.

Many of the shops on the square sell used goods at discount prices and are popular among working-class residents. Although the area is mainly Shiite, Sunnis often shop at the market, residents said.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki condemned the attack. "The violent terrorists who committed this crime have illusions that their bloody ideology to kill large numbers of civilians will break the will of the Iraqis and tear their unity and to raise sectarianism," he said in a statement.

But on the streets of Baghdad, people said they had little hope for their country at the moment.

Outside the morgue, families lined up looking for loved ones. Bodies were lined up on the street, some covered in blue blankets. Near the dead there was a grim pile of arms and legs and other body parts.

Baghdad Market Bombings Kill At Least 79 (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 -- The near-simultaneous explosions of two powerful car bombs devastated a crowded street bazaar in central Baghdad on Monday, killing at least 79 people, wounding more than 140 and showering the pavement with shards of metal, tattered vending carts and bloodied human remains.

The midday attack at the Bab al-Sherji market was the second mass-casualty bombing attack in Baghdad in a week and the deadliest of the year. The T-shirt vendors, DVD dealers and fruit peddlers it targeted were primarily working-class Shiite Muslims, a sign that the Sunni Muslim insurgency remains capable of inflicting heavy losses even as Iraqi and U.S. forces prepare to intensify a security crackdown.

The attack came as Shiites were marking Ashura, the 10-day religious holiday commemorating the death of the prophet Muhammad's grandson in the 7th century.

The bombs exploded within seconds of each other around noon, a peak shopping time, and sent a dark mushroom of smoke high into the blue sky over Baghdad. Witnesses said a suicide attacker drove in with one of the bombs, veering his vehicle into a cluster of stands before blowing it up. A second car exploded about 150 yards to the northeast along the same street.

DOJ_NMG_0120423

At the Baghdad market, a woman had just asked fruit vendor Ali Khadhim for oranges, so he turned from his wooden trolley to fill her order when the bomb went off. The force of the blast launched him about 10 yards, he said, and by the time he recovered his bearings, the oranges lay scattered on the ground and the woman was gone.

"I couldn't hear for a while," said Khadhim, 42, as he stood on the fringes of the bombing scene, his neck wrapped in a white bandage, his shirt collar darkened by bloodstains. "I was looking at my body, my neck was bleeding. For a moment I asked myself, am I still alive?"

He found a human arm on the ground not far from him. "I looked at it. I looked at my arm. Thank God it was not my arm," he said.

The bombing produced the worst carnage since a Nov. 23 attack in the Shiite slum of Sadr City that killed more than 200 people. A bombing at a university in Baghdad last Tuesday killed at least 65. Iraqi officials saw a connection with the earlier attacks and blamed Sunni insurgents and supporters of the former government of Saddam Hussein.

"One can say there is a pattern emerging. They are attacking the infrastructure of our society: One is the university, one is the marketplace. It is really very, very, worrying. And the government must take this very seriously," said Haider al-Ebadi, a Shiite member of parliament. He also worried about reprisals. "I hope this time is different, but this has happened before: Whenever there is indiscriminate killing, the Shiite militias react by killing Sunnis in similar numbers."

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki issued a statement condemning the attack and promising that "the security forces will pursue all those involved in this crime and bring them to justice."

The body count rose steadily throughout the day, but officials did not settle on a specific number. An official at the Health Ministry who spoke on condition of anonymity said that 87 people were killed and 207 wounded in the market bombings. Brig. Gen. Kasim Salim of the Interior Ministry said 79 people died and 168 were injured.

The bullet-riddled bodies of at least 30 people were found Monday, according to the Associated Press, which reported that a total of 137 Iraqis were killed or found dead across the country.

The timing of the attacks -- a day after the arrival in Baghdad of 3,200 additional U.S. troops intended to bolster the latest security crackdown -- prompted some Iraqi officials to speculate that the insurgents intended to provoke the Iraqi government into a hasty response.

The bombers "want to make the government start with their security plan before finishing all the preparations," said Hasan Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker, who promised that the government's security plan "will not allow things like this to happen."

In the shops and cloth-covered stalls near Tahrir Square, where vendors sell myriad discount goods, from camouflage military uniforms to CDs, secondhand clothes, electronics, tools and video-game consoles, residents expressed less optimism about the government's ability to respond.

An Iraqi police officer who wore a black ski mask over his face and would not give his name cursed Maliki. "Only the poor people are dying, and the killers on both sides are still alive," the officer said.

After the attack, shopkeepers picked through their scattered belongings. A bulldozer cleared the street while firefighters sprayed down the bloodied streets. Ahmed Hossein, 17, worked alongside them, using his wooden pushcart to ferry human body parts to waiting ambulances.

"I was putting in the heads and arms and legs that we found," he said. "But we couldn't match them. The pieces don't belong to one person."

"What did we do wrong?" he asked. "We voted for Maliki and this government; they have not given us anything, and now they're taking our lives."

Hossam Hadi gripped a broom and swept the broken glass from the floor of his clothing shop. Above him, dislodged wires and cables swung down into the room. "People don't care if they are watching this from outside. They are not losing their people. We are paying the price," he said. "Americans are stupid and slow, they see Maliki make mistakes and Bush says: 'Give him a chance.' He wants to try him out. Of course the Bush family is not paying the price. He has time to try people out, we don't."

Elsewhere Monday, a U.S. soldier was killed and four others were wounded by a roadside bomb in Nineveh province northwest of Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a statement. The soldiers belonged to Task Force Lightning assigned to the 4th Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division. The killings brought the three-day death toll for U.S. service members to at least 28. Twelve of those occurred when a Black Hawk helicopter crashed Saturday in Diyala province north of Baghdad.

A Sunni insurgent group, the Islamic State of Iraq, said it shot down the Black Hawk, according to a statement posted on the Internet. The U.S. military has not confirmed that the helicopter was shot down and a spokesman said Monday that the incident was still under investigation.

In Khalis, a town north of Baqubah, a bomb exploded in a market, followed by three mortar explosions, in an attack that killed 12 people and wounded 29, according to Ali al-Khayam, a spokesman for the Diyala provincial police.

100 Killed In Market Bombings, Attacks (WT/AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Twin bombings yesterday tore through stalls of vendors selling secondhand clothes and DVDs in a busy Baghdad market catering to Shi'ite Muslims during a religious festival.

A market also was attacked north of the capital, and police said about 100 people died in the renewed campaign blamed on Sunni Muslim insurgents.

The U.S. military also reported the deaths Sunday of two Marines, raising the two-day death toll to 27 in a particularly bloody weekend for U.S. forces in Iraq. A roadside bomb killed a U.S. soldier and wounded four others yesterday in northern Iraq, it said.

The two U.S. Marines were killed Sunday in separate attacks in the Anbar province, an insurgent stronghold west of Baghdad, the military said. The deaths came a day after 25 U.S. troops were killed Saturday in the third-deadliest day since the war started in March 2003 -- eclipsed only by the one-day toll of 37 U.S. fatalities on Jan. 26, 2005, and 28 on the third day of the U.S. invasion.

The heaviest tolls Saturday came from a Black Hawk helicopter crash in which 12 U.S. soldiers were killed northeast of Baghdad and in an attack on a provincial government building in the Shi'ite holy city of Karbala that left five U.S. troops dead.

Investigators probing the scene found a tube that may have been part of a shoulder-fired weapon used to shoot down the aircraft, officials said.

Yesterday's first blast, a parked-car bomb, detonated shortly after noon in the Bab al-Sharqi market between Tayaran and Tahrir squares -- one of the busiest parts of Baghdad. Seconds later, a suicide car bomber drove into the crowd.

Police estimated that each car was loaded with 220 pounds of explosives.

Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili said at least 78 persons were killed and 156 were wounded, making it the deadliest attack in two months. Figures provided by police and hospital officials showed that as many as 88 people were killed.

Hours later, a bomb followed by a mortar attack rocked a market in the predominantly Shi'ite town of Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, killing at least 12 persons and wounding 29, police said.

The twin bombing in Baghdad was the single deadliest attack against civilians in Iraq since Nov. 23, when suspected al Qaeda in Iraq fighters attacked Baghdad's Sadr City Shi'ite slum with a series of car bombs and mortars that struck in quick succession, killing at least 215 persons.

In other violence, gunmen killed a teacher as she was on her way to work at a girls' school in the mainly Sunni area of Khadra in western Baghdad, police said, adding that the teacher's driver was wounded in the drive-by shooting.

Two mortar shells also landed on a primary school in the Sunni stronghold neighborhood of Dora in southern Baghdad, killing a woman waiting for her child and wounding eight students, police said.

88 Iraqis Killed In Blasts (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The Baghdad bombings are seen as a Sunni insurgent challenge to the U.S. troop buildup.

BAGHDAD — Insurgents set off a pair of car bombs in a crowded Baghdad market Monday, killing at least 88 Iraqis in what may be a warning sign that Sunni Arab militants will challenge the proposed U.S. playbook for calming the country's sectarian violence.

The explosions left gruesome scenes of chaos in the capital's Tayaran Square, often a frenzied crossroad of commerce and traffic. The wounded dragged themselves into taxis past mangled vendor carts, blackened debris and piles of soot.

Dazed survivors prodded bodies for signs of life and bandaged wounds with secondhand clothes from the market's thrift stores. The smell of burned flesh hung in the air for hours.

At least 168 Iraqis were wounded in the attack, which had sectarian overtones and was similar to blasts carried out by Sunni insurgents, particularly those with ties to foreign extremist groups. The majority of businesspeople and workers in Baghdad's downtown marketplaces are Shiite Muslims.

Analysts said the increase in Sunni violence had exposed a weakness in the U.S.-Iraqi effort to stabilize the capital. The Bush administration, which is boosting the number of troops in Iraq by 21,500, has promised to pacify Shiite militias thought to be targeting Sunnis. But Sunni attacks on Shiites have continued unabated, threatening to strengthen the Shiite population's support of its militias and jeopardizing efforts for talks between the two sects.

President Bush is expected to outline and promote his plan for securing Baghdad in his State of the Union address tonight.

DOJ_NMG_0120425

Victims of the bombings cursed the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki as they hauled away bodies and debris.

"Where is Maliki now?" cried one man, whose brother died in the blasts. "We are being killed and they are sitting on their fancy chairs."

One more car bomb was detonated near fruit and vegetable stalls in the mostly Shiite town of Khalis, 30 miles north of Baghdad, killing at least 12 Iraqis and injuring 40.

Authorities discovered the bodies of 29 men, apparent victims of Shiite death squads, scattered across Baghdad.

At least one U.S. soldier was killed and four wounded in a roadside bombing in Nineveh province, which is predominantly Sunni.

At least 30 American troops have died since Friday in apparent Sunni attacks, including a well-coordinated assault in Karbala on Saturday in which uniformed men stormed a security compound and killed five troops.

Frederick W. Kagan, a military analyst at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the attacks on U.S. forces could be a reaction to new American operations in Baghdad or a retaliation for a recent battle on the capital's Haifa Street, where U.S. forces killed Sunni insurgents.

But he said militants also could be launching an all-out effort to discourage the U.S. from sending more troops.

"Some insurgent groups could be trying to mass against us to inflict casualties as a way of turning the surge off," he said.

Monday's bombings occurred about a mile across the Tigris River from the U.S.-protected Green Zone. As pedestrians and shopkeepers rushed to aid the victims of the first explosion, another powerful blast shook the ground.

"I saw scores of injured people covered with blood being evacuated, and smoke and fire at two locations," said Raed abu Ahmad, a businessman who was shopping for a cellphone. "I saw bodies covered with blankets and burning cars."

Sirens erupted throughout the capital as ambulances raced to and from the bombing sites. Jittery police at the square screamed at passersby and fired into the air, attempting to clear the area of pedestrians.

A group of police officers briefly detained a pair of Los Angeles Times reporters, seizing their cellphones, identification cards and a tape recorder for several minutes before returning them.

Soldiers attached to the Army's 2nd Infantry Division arrived soon after the blasts, the military said. The area was sealed off as dump trucks hauled away debris.

The bombings flooded five hospitals with the dead and wounded.

"Most of the victims were burned and injured to the head and upper body," said Imad Abdul-Hadi, a medical assistant at a neurology hospital that took in more than 65 bombing victims. "Our hospital is suffering, as we are working at full capacity in a most abnormal way."

Witnesses were baffled by the attack's target, which appeared to be a group of stalls selling cigarettes and produce. Some said the first blast was caused by a suicide bomber driving a beat-up Volkswagen into a cafe.

The owners, vendors and laborers in the market tend to be Shiites, a result of longtime Sunni domination of government and civil service jobs that forced Shiites, Jews and Kurds to turn to the private sector for employment, especially in Baghdad.

"There weren't any Americans or Iraqi security forces," one witness said. "I don't know why they would target these people."

By early afternoon, several shopkeepers had reopened in an attempt to salvage some of the day's lost business and help pay for repairs after the blasts, which shattered windows and sent shrapnel hurtling through doors.

"This isn't the first time this has happened," said an employee of an appliance repair shop. "They're targeting innocent people. We could understand if they were targeting American or even Iraqi forces. Those are their ultimate enemies. But doing it this way is meaningless."

Gunmen killed a Sunni tribal leader in west Baghdad and a police academy trainer in east Baghdad. Mortar rounds struck a Shiite enclave in south Baghdad and a Sunni section of west Baghdad, killing four people and injuring 11.

Northeast of the capital, gunmen kidnapped Khalid Fenjari, the mayor of the provincial capital of Baqubah, which in recent weeks has been riven by sectarian warfare. The gunmen blew up the mayor's headquarters.

An investigation continued on the weekend crash of a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter, which killed 12 troops.

Fragments found at the crash site northeast of Baghdad have led investigators to think the helicopter may have been shot down by militants, said a defense official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Associated Press said investigators had found a tube that might be part of a shoulder-fired weapon. U.S. officials were not able to confirm the report.

Al-Qaida Group Claims Copter Shoot Down (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, January 23, 2007

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed Monday that its fighters shot down an American military helicopter in a crash that killed 12 U.S. soldiers. The U.S. military has said the cause of the crash has not been determined.

The insurgent coalition, the Islamic State in Iraq, posted the claim on an Islamic Web site, saying that "the lions of Iraq's Islamic state managed to down a Black Hawk on Saturday, which was followed by a clash with the Crusaders, and that led to the destruction of two Humvees and the annihilation of those inside, thanks be to God."

The posting's authenticity could not be independently verified, but it appeared on a Web site used as a clearing house for militant statements. The Islamic State in Iraq is believed to be the political wing of al-Qaida in Iraq.

The Army Black Hawk crashed in good weather in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. U.S. and Iraqi forces have been battling Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias for months in the province.

A U.S. military spokeswoman, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, said the cause had not been determined. Navy Capt. Frank Pascual, a member of a U.S. media relations team in the United Arab Emirates, told Al-Arabiya television that the helicopter was believed to have suffered technical troubles before going down.

In Washington, a senior U.S. military official said Monday that investigators had found debris near the crash scene that could belong to a shoulder-fired weapon which may have been used to shoot down the helicopter. The official, who requested anonymity because the investigation is ongoing, said there was some belief that the piece of debris was a tube.

Officials were still combing through the debris to make a final determination about the cause of the crash.

The helicopter crash was the fourth deadliest since the start of the war in March 2003.

In The Vortex Of Baghdad, Staying Put This Time (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 — Two blocks from the new American outpost in Ghazaliya, one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, a fight was raging. Shiites were battling Sunnis, the latest skirmish in a sectarian war that has left this area a wasteland.

On Friday morning, it became an American fight, too, after a few rounds whizzed by Sgt. Sergej Michaud's head, and he and three other soldiers returned fire.

The battle would rage for nearly an hour, with mortar shells and rocket-propelled grenades exploding near the soldiers, who in turn laid down heavy fire, eventually driving the attackers away.

Previously, that would have been the end of it, with the soldiers moving on to their next patrol area and eventually returning to their base. But this time, the Americans were staying, defending their new home in a neighborhood where the rule of law had been driven out by the reign of the gun.

Their outpost here, a cluster of fortified houses officially designated a joint security station and unofficially called the Alamo by some of the soldiers, is a test case for President Bush's new Baghdad security plan. The strategy envisions at least 20 more facilities like it in other troubled neighborhoods, all jointly staffed by Iraqi and American forces.

Even after the stations are set up, American commanders say, it will be many months, at best, before they can even hope to prevent bombings like the one that killed at least 88 people in a central Baghdad market area on Monday.

In the week since the Americans arrived, however, the troops have seen the truth of what their commanders warned in announcing the plan: it leaves Americans more exposed than ever, stationary targets for warring militias.

The outpost sits on the fault line between Sunni and Shiite enclaves: Ghazaliya to the south, where fighters with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have moved in among the Sunni population, and Shula to the north, a base for Shiite militias that have been raiding this neighborhood for months.

Over the course of three days spent with the 105 soldiers here — Company C of the Second Battalion, 12th Cavalry — four American vehicles were hit by roadside bombs near the outpost. No soldiers from Company C were wounded, but they know the fighting will intensify.

"I'm a juicy target they are just trying to figure out," said Capt. Erik Peterson, 29, the commander at the outpost.

During the week, the soldiers also received their first glimpse of the green Iraqi forces who will share the mission and eventually, they hoped, take it over. The soldiers talked about them with a mixture of bemusement, disdain and mistrust.

"You could talk about partnership, but you would be lying," said one soldier who asked that his name not be used, for fear of punishment by his superiors.

DOJ_NMG_0120427

It was also a week to start getting to know the desperate residents of Ghazaliya, where almost every remaining family has lost someone to kidnappings and executions, and where government services have long been cut off.

In their new role, the Americans find themselves acting as jailers and doctors, construction workers and garbage men, guardians and detectives — all in an effort to restore lasting order despite the threats on every side.

Wednesday: First Test

After three days of grueling work on muddy and filthy ground, including installing blast walls around the perimeter, filling 5,000 sandbags and hauling away trash, the soldiers had the beginnings of a functioning base on Wednesday.

That night, they had their first real test. It was nearing midnight, the generator had failed, there was no heat, the radio was malfunctioning — and an Iraqi girl no more than 4 was dying in the bitter cold on an Army cot.

At the same time, a loud firefight erupted outside, apparently an attack on an Iraqi Army checkpoint nearby.

Captain Peterson had brought the sick child to the base because her family was afraid to travel after curfew and no Iraqi government ambulance would dare visit the neighborhood after dark, if at all.

One of the company's medics, Cpl. Peter Callahan, 23, worked by flashlight, trying to soothe the girl, whose body was rejecting the medication her parents had given her.

"She needs to go to the hospital right now," he told Captain Peterson. With no time to call in support, Captain Peterson quickly arranged a convoy to the nearest hospital — a risky proposition even in daylight and with more soldiers to provide security.

But the girl's Sunni family resisted, fearing they would be killed at the hospital, which was in Shula, the Shiite district, if the Americans left them there.

Frustrated, Captain Peterson said over the radio, "I think they are pretty much willing to let this kid die instead of all dying together."

The Americans decided to head to a safer hospital farther away. But time was running out; the girl's pulse was dropping fast, dipping below 25.

Corporal Callahan gave her a small shot of atropine, which was all he had, to increase her heart rate. She stabilized, and when he emerged with the girl alive and breathing, he and her parents could barely contain their joy. He had saved her life.

Thursday: The Neighbors

After fortifying the outpost, the soldiers of Company C were ready for their first foray into the neighborhood. Most of them were familiar with the area, having conducted patrols here in armored Humvees for months, from a base near Baghdad's airport.

The platoon leader, First Lt. Samuel Cartee, 25, reminded his men that this would be different. "They know where we are coming from," he said.

It would be a short trip on foot, just two blocks north, circling back and checking out a local market area. The biggest threat was snipers.

"If we get shot at, and we know what house it is coming from, we are authorized to raid that house," he said.

A few minutes after setting out, the soldiers passed a school that, like the other two in the area, was closed. Two months ago, American officers say, a teacher was raped, mutilated and strung up by her feet outside the building, left to hang for days.

It was unclear whether the killing was conducted by Shiites or Sunnis. But American officers said women were increasingly being attacked, especially by elements of Al Qaeda in the southern part of the neighborhood.

The soldiers soon came to an open area, and a shot rang out. A sniper.

They ran across the trash-strewn lot and took up battle positions, backs against a concrete wall, sun in their eyes. The shot came from about two blocks away — too far to pursue the shooter, who would be gone by the time they got there.

Later, two more snipers took shots, both far off the mark.

The Americans continued on, trudging through streets where rainwater had collected in pools and mixed with the open sewers.

Lieutenant Cartee passed out a flier announcing the presence of the station and inviting residents to call with information or problems. In this Sunni part of town, all the tips would point north, toward Shiite Shula. That fact was clearly painted in English on one wall the soldiers passed.

"Hey Americans, we want you to destroy the J.A.M." It was a reference to the largest Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army. In smaller letters, someone had written an equally clear message: "Bush is appalling and dreadful."

The soldiers made it to the market, and a crowd formed around them. But the soldiers were mostly unable to talk: interpreters are favored targets of snipers, so theirs had to stay in the armored Humvee that trailed behind.

The entire patrol lasted less than an hour. They had been shot at three times, handed out their new phone number to a few dozen people, seen several newly opened stores and made it back alive.

"Nice neighborhood," Lieutenant Cartee said, deadpan.

DOJ_NMG_0120428

That evening, a firefight began outside, close enough that tracer fire whizzed over the station. But the Americans did not seem to be the target, this night at least.

Friday: Troubling Thoughts

The first big fight for the Americans came the next morning — the battle that found Sergeant Michaud. When it was over, the Americans had killed two suspected militia members and taken two prisoner.

The suspects were young men, wearing black — the uniform of the Mahdi militia. The Americans blindfolded them and put them in separate rooms, where they were tested for residue from explosives and held for questioning.

As residents began arriving to offer information, a man who lived next to the new station, a Sunni and former police commander, loaded his family's possessions into a pickup truck.

He was happy that the Americans were there, he said, but he was afraid that they would attract constant attacks, so he was moving to a different part of the neighborhood. As he packed up his family, he noticed a young boy loitering. The man became enraged, pointing two fingers at his eyes, then pointing at the boy, yelling, "Mahdi! Mahdi!"

The man explained that both the Mahdi Army and Al Qaeda were sending spies to see who was feeding the Americans information. The boy slipped away.

At the same time, Iraqi Army soldiers were starting to move into the outpost. They arrived in the late afternoon, one truck with a flat tire towing another truck that was not working.

Maj. Chasib Kattab, a boisterous Shiite who commands the Iraqi unit of two companies, about 200 men, started to provide information. But, in a likely hint of things to come, all his tips involved Sunni fighters. He had nothing to say about the Shiite militias.

He also seemed eager to fight. When he told the Americans about a car that was likely to be used as a bomb, he asked whether American helicopters would be able to destroy it. Told that, at night, they could make out the shape but not the color, Major Chasib seemed to think that was good enough. "They should just shoot it," he said.

Captain Peterson had to explain that was not how things worked, aware that his partner's decisions would affect how the Americans would be perceived.

Captain Peterson was under no illusions that establishing security and training the Iraqis to maintain it would be a difficult operation that could take time. He said he was initially skeptical about the plan, thinking the risks might be too great. But looking back over his experiences this fall patrolling the neighborhood, he said he had changed his mind.

One recent event in particular swayed him. When the Americans canceled their usual patrol on Jan. 3, Sunni extremists used the opportunity to bait militiamen by waging war on the small Shiite civilian population in Ghazaliya.

"They just went into the streets and started killing as many people as they could," he said. Captain Peterson was at the main American base for western Baghdad, three miles away near the airport, and it took him nearly an hour to respond to pleas for help.

"It was such a helpless feeling for me," he said.

Corporal Callahan, for his part, said that he was not sure he agrees with the war, and that he knew his wife, Stacie, thought it was terrible. But to get through it, he focuses on the people he can help, like the little Iraqi girl he saved.

"As long as I am here, I am going to try and make it worthwhile as far as the kids are concerned," he said. "The adults, they are going to do what they are going to do."

Sunni Sheik Declares War On The Insurgency (LAT)

By Tony Perry,

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

A business-minded tribal leader in Al Anbar forges an alliance with U.S. forces.

RAMADI, IRAQ — At 35, he is younger than many sheiks. And his Sunni Arab tribe is not one of the largest in Al Anbar province. But Sheik Sattar Bazeaa Fatikhan projects the aura of power and seriousness that comes to a man who has taken a stand.

After Sunni insurgents killed his father and four of his brothers last year, Fatikhan declared war against the insurgency.

He convened a summit of about a dozen prominent sheiks. From that meeting came a document called "The Awakening," in which Fatikhan persuaded all but one sheik to join him in opposition to the insurgency.

The sheiks pledged to encourage young men to join the police force and even the Shiite-led army. The document states that killing an American is the same as killing a member of their tribes. Since the gathering, Fatikhan said, the sheiks have "eliminated" a number of insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0120429

U.S. officials regularly visit Fatikhan, seeking his counsel, showing him the kind of deference one might expect for a leading government official. When a British general visited recently, Fatikhan, the sheik of the Abo Resha tribe, noted that his great-grandfather had fought against the British in the early 1940s.

Still, he said, "The British respected the sheiks."

In a two-hour interview in his large, carpeted meeting hall, a stream of underlings whispered to Fatikhan or handed him messages. He nodded or spoke a few words, and they hurried off. Later, he allowed himself to joke about the duties of being a sheik.

"They give me a headache," he said through an interpreter.

Drinking tea and smoking Marlboros, Fatikhan listened to questions and then gave an unvarying response: The U.S. military and Iraqi tribes must unite to rid Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province of men who would "try to engineer our future with mortars and roadside bombs."

For U.S. forces, Fatikhan's stand is a significant boost in a bitter fight with insurgents who, until recently, controlled large segments of Ramadi, the provincial capital.

Army Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade Combat Team, 1st Armored Division, credits Fatikhan and other sheiks for an increase in police enrollment, a decrease in insurgent recruitment and new courage among Iraqi forces.

A year ago, insurgents blew up every police station in Ramadi, and officers were afraid to return to duty. The U.S. military rebuilt many of the stations. During a recent attack, Iraqi police officers stood their ground.

"They would not be intimidated," MacFarland said. "Why? Because their sheik, whom they respect, told them, 'You must do this.' "

Fatikhan ordered his followers to "adopt" the U.S. Army's liaison to the tribes and give him an Arabic name, Wissam, which means warrior. After the officer, Capt. Travis Patriquin, was killed by a roadside bomb, the sheik ordered that one of the new police stations be named in his honor.

This month, Fatikhan was host of the first Ramadi reconstruction conference, held behind the high walls of his family compound. Contractors, sheiks and others met with U.S. officials to discuss projects to pave roads, rebuild schools and improve electrical, sewer, phone and water systems.

Fatikhan, who wears tailored suits when not in traditional clothing, understands U.S. politics. He told a visiting journalist, "Please take a message to the Democrats: Let the American forces stay until we can hold Iraq together. Then we will have a party when American forces go."

Outside Fatikhan's meeting room, other sheiks, some much older, waited to talk to him. So did Iraqi police officials. The sheik's bodyguards were nearby.

He offered his American and British visitors sweet tea and insisted that they stay for a lunch of goat, rice and sauces.

"The terrorists are not here for the interests of Iraq," Fatikhan said. "We don't need them here to say they're here to defend us. If Iraq was in danger, the real people of Iraq would stand up and defend Iraq."

He referred to the U.S. and Britain as "the two great nations."

British Lt. Gen. G.C.M. Lamb was quick to return the compliment.

"Baghdad was once considered the center of the civilized world, so I believe we have three great nations engaged in a great purpose," Lamb said.

"The British had an empire and lost it," he added, "and so we have learned that we do not know everything, that there is wisdom in many places."

Fatikhan is not above criticizing the U.S.-led forces.

"The coalition forces made many mistakes," he said. "That led a lot of people to accept [Al Qaeda's] offer: 'We will get rid of the coalition forces.' That was a mistake the people made."

Fatikhan said he didn't fear being killed. He has many bodyguards, and a U.S. tank is parked outside his compound.

"They killed my father and brothers," he said. "I have a different spirit."

His surviving brother lives in the family compound with him and his wife and five children.

The sheik has not traveled outside the Middle East but said he would like to visit Germany, Britain and the U.S.

He joked, without smiling, "When there is peace, I will learn English."

The alliance between U.S. forces and the sheiks is a marriage of convenience. The sheiks are rivals of the elected government in Al Anbar that the U.S. supports, but there is no functioning government in Ramadi.

"Their interests align with us — none of the tribes is making any money during the war," MacFarland said. "Many, like the mafia, own construction companies. There are limits on how far down their path we can walk together, but today it's a very good relationship."

Fatikhan is looking beyond the present toward posterity.

"Let history mention a hero, a man who brought the tribes together to fight," he said. "Let history show that a sheik stood up."

Residents: Baqouba Is Deadly Ghost City (AP)

By Bassem Mroue

AP, January 23, 2007

Two tales of one city.

Many residents of Baqouba say they live hunkered down in cold, dark houses afraid to go out, that the once mixed Shiite-Sunni neighborhoods are riven by sectarian cleansing, that the police force has virtually collapsed, and that longtime rituals — like the annual orange festival — have become unthinkable.

U.S. and Iraqi military officials, in response to questions, paint a different portrait. They insist the city is not nearly as dangerous as "rumors" put it. According to them, Baqouba is improving and violence is down.

Events Monday seemed to contradict those assertions. A car bomb and mortar bombardment in nearby Khalis killed at least 12 people, and state television reported that gunmen in Baqouba proper attacked the mayor's office, ransacking the building and setting off explosive charges that damaged the structure. Police said the Sunni mayor was kidnapped, a report U.S. officials said they could not immediately confirm.

In a video news conference just prior to the attack and in an e-mail response two days earlier to The Associated Press, a senior U.S. military officer emphasized that progress is being made in Baqouba.

"The slow improvement of services is an example of the effects terrorism has on a community," said Col. David W. Sutherland, 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, said in his e-mail response. "The terrorists would have you believe there is no electricity, when in reality, most of the province has about 12 hours a day, which is better than the national average of 11 hours."

Terrorists "would have you believe schools and markets are closed and people are afraid to go out of their homes. Again, in reality, markets are open with fruits, meat, and produce readily available," Sutherland said.

Baqouba is a market center set amid lush orange and date groves about 35 miles north of Baghdad. It is also the capital of Diyala province, abutting Iran. In past years, Shiites and Sunnis abided here in relative peace, until a few months after the ouster of Saddam Hussein, when Sunni insurgents from rural areas began pushing into the city, then about equally divided between Shiites and Sunnis.

In a series of interviews conducted with residents by two Associated Press employees who live in the city but cannot move around freely because of security concerns, and also by telephone from Baghdad, townspeople from both sects gave a bleak assessment of life in Baqouba today.

They describe it as a place where Sunni insurgents signal one another by firing into the air and where in moments a quiet street can be turned into a sectarian hunting ground.

It begins with a pistol shot. Twenty minutes later, masked gunmen carrying automatic rifles march by the dozens through the streets, then set up checkpoints and demand identity cards from anyone who ventures outside. Before Iraqi soldiers or U.S. troops respond, the gunmen usually vanish like ghosts. But not always.

There have been major battles in Baqouba between the Iraqi forces and insurgents, raging firefights that have driven residents inside, where they say they stay home from work and away from schools and universities.

In the highly unusual teleconference, U.S. and Iraqi military leaders in Diyala province detailed a major operation last week in which about 100 insurgents were killed near Balad Ruz, a town 20 miles east of Baqouba. More than 1,300 rockets and 1,100 rocket-propelled grenades and launchers were seized, he said.

"The situation in Baqouba is reassuring and under control — but there are some rumors circulated by bad people," said provincial police commander Gen. Ghanem al-Qureishi.

Maj. Gen. Shaker Hulayel, commander of the 5th Division of the Iraqi army, added that "residents are going as usual with their work. ... Markets are open and trade continues. This is in addition to recruitment for police forces that are going on."

Residents interviewed by AP reporters on the basis that their names not be used because of security fears acknowledge markets are open, but, they say, only for a few hours a day. They say they are able to duck out for supplies, mostly food, for brief periods.

They also said they feel isolated, because roads in and out are too dangerous to use, phones work only sporadically. Electricity is rare. Water, they contend, flows through city mains about an hour a day.

DOJ_NMG_0120431

"You rarely see anyone in the streets after midday," said one resident reached on a satellite telephone late last week. Gunfire crackled in the background. "People are fed up because all they hear is gunfire and explosions."

"We have no social life. We stay at home all day and the road is too dangerous to go to Baghdad," the resident said.

Another resident complained about a lack of services, blamed the government and said she yearned for the days of Saddam Hussein.

"We thought our life was going to get better. Had we stayed like before it would have been better," the woman said in a videotaped interview as she made tea over a kerosene heater.

Residents claim Sunni and Shiite gunmen have cleared some formerly mixed neighborhoods of sect members who were in the minority.

The al-Mualimeen district in the southwest of the city and the western Tahrir neighborhood are now mostly Sunni while the Huwaider neighborhood, also in the southwestern district, now is nearly all Shiite.

In June, al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike on his hideout near Baqouba, and his death was followed by a series of raids that the military said revealed a "treasure trove" of intelligence.

But the situation in Baqouba began to worsen in October when the predominantly Shiite Iraqi army launched a major detention campaign against suspected Sunni insurgents in the city. Angry Sunnis have fought back.

Days after the start of the campaign, leaflets of a little-known group called the "Mujahedeen of Diyala" were found in the streets. They demanded the resignation of the army and police commanders as well as the governor of the province — all Shiites — within 30 days.

None of the three resigned by the deadline. The insurgents attacked police, leaving scores of people dead. The police force nearly collapsed in late November, and the city has been under the authority of the Iraqi army since then.

And despite the success of the operation against insurgents in nearby Balad Ruz and the military assertions to the contrary, a Shiite resident of Baqouba spoke despairingly in front of his crumbling home last week.

"The only thing in the streets is killing. Some of us here are starting to wonder if death might be better than this life," the man said in a videotaped interview.

Col. Sutherland said the problems, where they do exist, can be laid at the feet of the insurgents.

"I don't want to paint a rosy picture," he said in his e-mail response. "There is violence in Baqouba. Terrorists target not only government workers, but also the Iraqi army soldiers, Iraqi police, and the citizens of Iraq."

North Of Capital, A Tale Of Two Iraqs (WP)

By Ernesto Londono And Hasan Shammari

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 22 -- U.S. Army officers described Monday how they disbanded what they called a terrorist network whose members killed tribesmen and otherwise sowed fear across large pockets of Diyala province north of Baghdad.

"There are shopkeepers who had closed their doors out of fear, that are now beginning to open their doors," said Maj. Brett G. Sylvia, speaking from Diyala through a satellite video link to reporters in Baghdad. "Families are starting to move back into the area. A sense of normalcy is attempting to be reestablished in this area."

Minutes before the news conference began, armed men kidnapped the mayor of the provincial capital, Baqubah, blew up his office and stole six government cars, including three new Chevrolet police pickup trucks, officials in the province said.

The near-simultaneous scenarios played out like a tale of two Iraqs, one inching toward stability, the other engulfed in chaos.

After seizing Mayor Khalid al-Sanjari, one of the armed men grabbed a loudspeaker from a police car and taunted the chief of police, the officials said.

" 'We are Ansar al-Sunna battalions,' the man blurted out," according to Abu Sajjad, a member of the Baqubah municipal council. " 'If you dare, come and take us.' " Ansar al-Sunna is a Sunni insurgent group active in the city.

The 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the U.S. Army's 1st Cavalry Division, made up of roughly 4,000 soldiers, is responsible for Diyala and some surrounding areas -- roughly the size of Vermont and New Hampshire -- in tandem with the Iraqi army's 5th Division.

In the video conference, the brigade commander, Col. David W. Sutherland, spoke proudly of his soldiers and commended his Iraqi counterparts for their role in the operation.

"There is no doubt that the cycle of violence is on the downturn," he said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces in Diyala first fought the insurgent network -- known as the Council, which officials said was an offshoot of the Sunni group al-Qaeda in Iraq -- in November. Then they spent several weeks analyzing the group's techniques and weaknesses, the colonel said.

On Jan. 4, U.S. and Iraqi forces began a concerted attack, which lasted nearly 10 days and resulted in the killing of nearly 100 members of the Council and the detention of 50, Sutherland said. The commanders also said they seized large caches of weapons, including nearly 1,200 Katyusha rockets and 1,300 rocket-propelled grenades. The enemy, military officials said, used spider holes and irrigation canals to store weapons and ammunition.

Sutherland was flanked by two Iraqi commanders, who were wearing slightly darker uniforms. They weren't there to paint "a rosy picture," Sutherland told reporters. But they wanted to highlight what he and Iraqi officials described as progress in the province.

"The situation in Baqubah is controlled," said Maj. Gen. Ghassan Adnan Awad al-Bawi, the provincial police chief, adding that rumors to the contrary should be ignored. "The purpose of these rumors is to hit the will of our citizens."

In Baqubah, meanwhile, the armed men arrived at the municipal building waving guns, said Abu Sajjad, the council member, who declined to give his full name for security reasons. The attackers targeted only the mayor, who runs the city of roughly 280,000 people.

"They did not take any one of his guards," Abu Sajjad said. "They didn't kill or wound anyone."

He wondered whether the mayor had been set up. Some high-ranking city officials who should have been at work had left unexpectedly, he said, adding that the parking lot behind the building was unusually deserted. The mayor's one-story building was destroyed.

"We don't know yet why he was targeted," said Hussein al-Zubaydi, a member of the provincial council and head of its security committee. "We don't know whether it was personal."

As the news conference ended, reporters who had assembled in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone were handed press kits with photographs, maps and biographical information about the American commanders. They also were given a DVD with raw footage of parts of the operation, called Turki Bowl because it happened close to the village of Turki.

About 30 minutes after the kidnapping, U.S. military and Iraqi security forces arrived at the scene, cordoned it off and inspected the damage as military helicopters hovered overhead, officials said.

Suicide Bomber Kills 10 In Afghanistan (AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan on Tuesday, killing 10 people and wounding 14 others, an Afghan official said.

The bomber approached a group of Afghan men who were waiting outside the base in the city of Khost, in Khost province, before triggering an explosive strapped to his chest, said Jamal Arsalah, the province's governor.

Maj. Matt Hackathorn, a U.S. military spokesman, confirmed the blast, but said that there were no U.S. military casualties known so far.

Jamal said the men were daily workers, lining up to get into the base at the time of the blast.

Suicide attacks have increased as Taliban militants intensify their insurgency against Afghan government forces and foreign troops. According to U.S. military figures, there were 139 suicide attacks during 2006, up from 27 in 2005.

In 2006, Taliban carried out a record number of attacks — suicide and otherwise — and some 4,000 people died in the insurgency-related violence, according to a tally by The Associated Press based on reports from Afghan, NATO and coalition officials.

Khost, where Tuesday's attack was carried out, is a former al-Qaida stronghold on the mountainous Pakistani border that has been a focus of militant activity.

Afghan and Western officials say insurgents use the tribal areas of neighboring Pakistan as sanctuaries from where they organize and launch operations in Afghanistan.

Pakistan argues that only remnants of the Taliban and al-Qaida remain on its side of the border and complain that it gets too little recognition for deploying thousands of troops to the region.

On Monday, a suicide car bomber killed four Pakistani soldiers in North Waziristan, across the frontier from Khost.

Senior U.S. officials have warned that fighting in Afghanistan is likely to surge again this spring, as warmer weather clears snow from mountain passes and militants try to weaken the grip of President Hamid Karzai's U.S.-backed government.

Suicide Blast Kills 10 Afghans Outside NATO Base (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

A suicide attacker blew himself up among a crowd of Afghan labourers queuing to enter a NATO base in eastern Afghanistan, killing 10 and wounding 14, an official said.

DOJ_NMG_0120433

The attacker, who appeared to have been on foot, detonated his load of explosives outside a gate of an International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) base near the eastern city of Khost.

"Ten civilians were killed and 14 injured," Qasim Jan, an aide to the provincial governor, told AFP on Tuesday.

The crowd was waiting to pass security checks to enter the base, where most of them worked, Jan said. The attack took place at about 7:10 am (0240 GMT).

ISAF confirmed there had been an explosion at the Salerno base.

"There was an explosion in the vicinity of Salerno early this morning in Khost province. There were no ISAF casualties. However we are aware of a number of other casualties," said an ISAF spokeswoman in the capital Kabul.

Police could also not confirm the toll.

"The suicide bombing was in front of a base of the coalition forces," police spokesman Zemarai Bashary told AFP in Kabul.

On casualties, he said: "We cannot say -- the area was blocked by the coalition forces and no one was allowed in."

Provincial police were also not able to immediately give details.

Foreign troops cordoned off the area about a kilometre (mile) from the blast site and did not allow anyone to enter, an AFP reporter at the scene said.

No one immediately claimed responsibility for the blast but suicide attacks are a hallmark of the Taliban-led insurgency that kicked off when the hardline Islamic movement was driven from power in 2001.

There were nearly 140 such attacks in the country last year, according to US officials. They were mostly aimed at foreign and Afghan forces, but killed more civilians.

Suicide Bomber Kills 4 And Wounds 23 In Pakistan (NYT)

By Ismail Khan

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 22 — A suicide bomber rammed his explosive-laden car into a military convoy near Mirali in the restive North Waziristan tribal region on Monday, killing 4 people and wounding 23, witnesses said.

The dead included two paramilitary officers, a member of the military and a woman civilian, the witnesses said, and 20 of those wounded were soldiers.

The attack occurred at a checkpoint about a mile east of the town of Mirali when a joint convoy of the army and paramilitary was heading from a garrison in Bannu to Miramshah, the restive region's administrative headquarters.

Witnesses said that three army vehicles and a passenger car were damaged in the attack, the first to cause fatalities since the government and Taliban-backed tribal insurgents signed a peace agreement on Sept. 5, 2006.

Army and paramilitary troops had vacated the checkpoint as a condition of the peace agreement, and it is now managed by a tribal force.

Militants in Miramshah who had signed the peace agreement promptly denounced the episode and said that they were not involved in the attack.

A statement that said it was issued from the "security office of the Taliban North Waziristan" said: "We (Taliban) do not have a hand in the bomb attack. We want to maintain the peace agreement and the government should also do so."

Taliban leaders in the region had called a meeting in Miramshah to discuss the situation, the statement said.

A militant commander in the neighboring South Waziristan tribal region, Baitullah Mehsud, had vowed to avenge an airstrike last week on what the government said was a militant training center in which, government officials said, more than 20 people were killed and 8 wounded.

A government official familiar with events in the region said Monday that the signers of the peace agreement had little influence over militants beyond Miramshah.

"This brings into question the efficacy of the whole agreement," he said, adding that the bombings could be expected to increase tensions in the region after a lull in hostilities since the agreement.

"There had been warnings to security forces to avoid traveling in the tribal region after Baitullah's warning unless absolutely necessary," the official said.

A spokesman for the North Waziristan governor told reporters that the government was making efforts to maintain the peace agreement and attributed the attack to criminal elements trying to derail the peace efforts.

Pakistan officials said that a paramilitary soldier was killed and two others were wounded on Monday when an American helicopter from across the border fired rockets at a border post in the Shawal region on Monday.

A military spokesman in Islamabad said that Pakistan would lodge a strong protest with the United States and demand an investigation. A NATO spokeswoman said that aircraft had attacked insurgents who fired on a NATO base near the border and there may have been casualties, [a news agency] reported.

Taliban Chief Said Likely In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

Taliban leader Mullah Omar is likely based in southern Afghanistan and leading the resurgent Islamic militia from there, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry said Monday. A spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry said that Omar's exact whereabouts remain unknown.

"But generally the likely scenario is that he is in Kandahar, from where he is marshaling his troops," spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam said at a news conference, referring to a city in southern Afghanistan.

Aslam's comments follow claims by Afghan officials that a captured spokesman for the Taliban militia told interrogators that Omar was living in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta and that he was protected by Pakistan's ISI intelligence service. The purported Taliban spokesman, Mohammad Hanif, was arrested last week in eastern Afghanistan.

Afghan and Western military officials have repeatedly complained that Taliban leaders find refuge in Pakistan and use it as a base for attacks against Afghanistan's U.S.-backed government.

Taliban fighters launched a record number of attacks against Afghan and international coalition forces last year. Some 4,000 people died in the insurgency-related violence, according to a count by The Associated Press.

Pakistan vehemently denies backing the militants.

"To say that the Afghan insurgency is being sustained by a few people who cross from here is very simplistic and naive, if not done with some other agenda of shifting the blame on Pakistan for failures inside Afghanistan," Aslam said.

Pakistan was a key supporter of the Taliban militia until it switched sides to become a U.S. anti-terrorism ally following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Fire From Afghanistan Kills Pakistani (AP)

By Sadaqat Jan

AP, January 23, 2007

U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan mistakenly fired at a Pakistani border post and killed a soldier, Pakistan's military said Monday after lodging a protest over the death.

A U.S. military spokesman said four precision-guided bombs were dropped on four suspected militants who were firing rockets at a U.S. military outpost at Bermel in Afghanistan's Paktika province, near the Pakistani border.

"I cannot confirm or deny loss or injury of Pakistani military," said Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, the spokesman. "This all happened inside Afghanistan."

He also said the coalition was investigating.

But the Pakistani military said in a statement the post that was hit is located near Shawal, a mountainous area close to the Afghan border in Pakistan's North Waziristan tribal region.

Pakistan, a key U.S. ally, has a long border with Afghanistan that straddles rugged mountain regions and is not clearly demarcated in places. It is under growing pressure to help contain Taliban and al-Qaida militants suspected to operate from its soil.

Pakistan strongly protested to the coalition authorities, asking them to investigate and take "necessary steps to ensure that such incidents are not repeated in future," its statement said.

Fire by U.S.-led coalition forces has landed in Pakistan in the past. In January 2006, Pakistan protested to the U.S. military in Afghanistan over firing at a village in North Waziristan in which eight people were killed.

From Pakistan, With Jihad (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

To learn why a resurgent Taliban is fighting American and NATO troops to a military draw in Afghanistan, you have to go to the frontier region on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.

Our colleague, Carlotta Gall, did just that last month and what she learned led to a physical assault on her by Pakistani intelligence officials and five hours in custody for her photographer, Akhtar Soomro. The Pakistani agents broke into her hotel room and copied her notes and computer files. They then tracked down and questioned everyone she had interviewed in Quetta, a border city.

We now know why. Ms. Gall's reporting has determined that Quetta is an important rear base for the Taliban, and that Pakistani authorities are encouraging and perhaps sponsoring the cross-border insurgency. That is a role that Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, denies. But residents of the border area, opposition figures and Western diplomats point to specific cases of Pakistani involvement. Americans need to know more about this collusion and to demand better answers from General Musharraf.

There are many reasons that things are now going badly for the American-backed Afghan government. America shortchanged Afghanistan's security in its rush to invade Iraq. European allies have inexcusably failed to provide NATO with enough soldiers to carry out the expanded Afghan security mission it took on last year and have imposed hobbling restrictions on the activities of those they did send. The government of the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, is rife with corruption, and the regional warlord allies it depends on to control outlying areas are even more thieving as well as shockingly brutal.

These problems all need to be addressed. But the positive results will be limited as long as Afghanistan's much more populous and powerful neighbor, Pakistan, provides rear support and sanctuary for the Taliban insurgency.

It is simply impossible to believe that this support takes place without the approval of the Pakistani military, the country's dominant institution for a half-century.

Pakistan is now the third-largest recipient of American foreign aid. Yet more than five years after 9/11, the Bush administration has still not been able to secure Pakistan's active and consistent support against the Taliban. The very least Washington should be demanding of President Musharraf is that he enforce an immediate halt on Pakistani military support for the Taliban insurgents who are crossing the border and killing American troops.

Signals Foil IEDs But Also Radios (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has launched an urgent effort to develop radio systems immune to the jamming signals that troops use to foil homemade bombs planted by insurgents in Iraq.

The jammers, which block signals that detonate improvised explosive devices (IEDs), have become so powerful they can "cause the loss of all communications" for U.S. troops, a Pentagon solicitation to contractors says. It calls for information on devices that will allow troops to use jammers and radios at the same time. The Pentagon said the information is needed "to support urgent, ongoing initiatives" for jammers.

Jammers have been a lifesaver by disabling IEDs, the leading cause of death of U.S. troops in Iraq.

Bombs have killed at least 1,168 U.S. troops, according to an analysis of Pentagon data by iCasualties.org. The total is probably higher, the website says, because the Pentagon does not include details of each death. The site noted that the highest monthly death toll for IEDs occurred in December, when bombs killed 71 U.S. troops. All told, more than 3,000 U.S. servicemembers have died in Iraq.

Communication has been a historic advantage for the U.S. military, allowing it to send troops where they're needed most and to avoid "friendly fire" casualties. The jammers that protect troops from roadside bombs can keep them from knowing the location of enemies and allies. In close-quarters urban warfare, ensuring communication can be a life-or-death matter.

"It is a nightmare," said John Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org, a military think tank. "Any part of the spectrum we can use to communicate is part of spectrum that the enemy can use to detonate an IED."

IEDs have killed 20 U.S. troops in Iraq this month, according to iCasualities. Adding 21,500 U.S. troops — as President Bush has announced — would be complicated by poor communication.

"Twice as many combat troops means twice as big a problem," Pike said.

The Pentagon posted the urgent notice on Jan 4. Jammers are a large portion of Pentagon efforts to fight IEDs. In 2006, the Pentagon spent $3.5 billion to counter IEDs, $1.4 billion of that on jammers.

The military has dealt with the communication problem for years. Troops initially kept power to jammers low enough to avoid interfering with communication, Marine Lt. Gen. James Mattis told Congress in 2005. But detonators for the bombs have grown more sophisticated, requiring more powerful jammers.

Christine DeVries, a spokeswoman for the Pentagon's Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization — the military's lead agency in fighting IEDs — said she could not provide details on the urgency of the request.

The Army has ramped up efforts to deal with electronic communication and warfare. Since Jan. 1, each Army battalion headed to combat has been required to have an electronic warfare operator, said Col. Laurie Moe Buckhout, chief of Army electronic warfare. Rendering IEDs harmless by an electronic signal will be one of the operator's responsibilities, Buckhout said.

The Army has put electronic warfare on par with learning to fire a weapon or administer first aid.

Army electronic warfare operators disrupt enemy communication, ensure U.S and coalition troops can talk to one another and prevent the enemy from knowing what friendly forces are doing, Buckhout said. A large portion of their responsibilities will be dealing with IEDs.

Ensign, Others Won't Say Why Top Federal Prosecutors Getting The Ax (LVS)

By Sam Skolnik And Lisa Mascaro, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, January 23, 2007

The Justice Department briefed Nevada Republican Sen. John Ensign last month on plans to replace Nevada's top federal prosecutor, but Ensign has decided that whatever the reasons, the public need not know them.

U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden of Las Vegas is one of at least seven top federal prosecutors being removed by the Bush administration, five from other Western states. All were appointed by Bush.

As is true with Bogden, the reasons for the departures remain mysterious.

Absent explanations, Democratic lawmakers and lawyers across the West are speculating. They wonder if the prosecutors pursued cases that displeased Washington, or if the Justice Department wants to choose replacements under a new Patriot Act provision that allows the appointments without the customary review by the U.S. Senate.

"If you ask me if my suspicions are aroused, they are," said Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif. Her state lost two U.S. attorneys.

During his five-year reign as the highest-ranking federal prosecutor in Nevada, Bogden has scored some notable successes. His office boosted firearms prosecutions, secured the convictions of dozens of violent gang members and oversaw the cases against four former Clark County commissioners convicted of taking bribes.

Even defense lawyers, Bogden's frequent courtroom opponents, speak highly of his straightforward style and fair play.

So why did Bogden suddenly announce his resignation Wednesday, after days of speculation that he was forced out of office by the Justice Department?

Officials in Nevada and Washington, D.C., are only providing hints as to why he and the other prosecutors are leaving.

Bogden has declined comment, other than to make a brief statement in a Wednesday news release.

The sudden bloodletting involved U.S. attorneys up and down the West Coast, as well as New Mexico, and one in Arkansas. The new interim U.S. attorney in Arkansas had been a political operative who worked for powerful White House aide Karl Rove.

No potential replacements have yet been named for Bogden, although a Justice Department source confirmed that officials have talked to both Ensign and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid in recent days regarding a replacement.

Feinstein said she's concerned Bush and his attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, are eager to use a newly added provision of the Patriot Act that would allow Bush to appoint new, interim U.S. attorneys, and to keep them in office until a new president takes charge, without having to get them confirmed by the Senate. This is just one of many speculations.

One theory suggests that Bogden got in political trouble by using the Patriot Act in his prosecution of former Clark County commissioners. The theory goes that the White House wanted to distance itself from what could be perceived as an example of an abuse of the controversial law. Reid and others had argued in 2003 that the prosecutor overreached by using the anti-terrorism law to fight domestic crime.

Reid's office could provide little information as to why Bogden was apparently forced out.

Ensign, a Republican who has known about Bogden's departure since Justice Department officials told him about it during a briefing last month, would not offer any explanation.

Other theories being posed in legal circles include Bush and Gonzales wanting to install a team of new prosecutors more receptive to carrying out the administration's law enforcement priorities; or more eager to investigate Democrats - and less eager to investigate Republicans - in public corruption cases.

The White House may also want to use the U.S. attorneys offices to develop a bench of potential Republican candidates for Congress.

Gonzales insisted at Thursday's hearing that the Justice Department plans to continue bringing all nominees before the Senate for confirmation. And as for the resignations, Gonzales testified: "I think I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it."

Feinstein, backed by Reid, is skeptical. She called any attempt by the administration to skirt the Senate confirmation process unacceptable and introduced legislation to reverse the law.

After Thursday's hearing, Feinstein said she still does not know why two U.S. attorneys in her state were stepping down. One had prosecuted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., for bribery in a case that had been expected to include defense contractors and possibly other Republican lawmakers.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse declined to comment on any of the theories swirling about Bogden or the other U.S. attorneys.

"It is erroneous to believe that anyone would be encouraged to resign in an effort to retaliate against them or interfere with or inappropriately influence a particular investigation, criminal prosecution or civil case," he said. CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple's Jobs Questioned In Options Probe, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, January 23, 2007

Jan. 22 (Bloomberg) -- Apple Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs was questioned by U.S. government investigators about backdating of employee stock options grants at the company, lawyers familiar with the matter said.

Jobs met with officials from the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department last week in San Francisco, said the people, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the interviews are confidential. The company said last month that it found ``no misconduct'' by Jobs or current management after an internal investigation of the stock-option backdating.

The meeting, which took place the same week Apple announced record sales of its best-selling iPod music player, shows the U.S. government is still seeking information about Jobs's role in the backdating even after the company's report clearing him and others, said Nell Minow, editor at the Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm in Portland, Maine.

``It is after all the SEC's view on his culpability that matters, not the internal investigation at Apple,'' Minow said.

The people wouldn't disclose specifics about what Jobs was asked, what he told investigators and whether there would be additional meetings.

Mark Pomerantz, an attorney for Jobs, declined to comment. Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, whose office is investigating Cupertino, California-based Apple, declined to comment. SEC spokesman John Nester in Washington declined to comment.

Apple shares fell $1.71 to $86.79 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

6,500 Grants

Almost 6,500 grants to Apple employees were backdated between 1997 and 2002, including one grant to Jobs marked as approved at a special board meeting that never occurred, Apple said Dec. 29. Jobs chose dates for some options other than his own, the company said.

Apple hasn't publicly disclosed which options Jobs backdated, which other executives received backdated options or why it faked a board meeting. The company said no member of current management was aware of the ``irregularity'' concerning the fictitious meeting.

Apple continues to ``voluntarily and proactively'' inform government investigators of its findings and continues to answer their questions, Chief Financial Officer Peter Oppenheimer told analysts on a conference call on Jan. 17.

The interview with Jobs was first reported Jan. 19 by The Recorder, a legal newspaper in San Francisco.

Jobs's Options

At least 200 companies are being investigated for changing the dates of options grants to inflate their value. Companies have taken over $8.1 billion in charges or restatements to account for backdated options grants.

Stock options allow holders to buy shares at a later date, usually at the market price the day they were granted. Backdating options to days with low prices inflates their value. If not properly disclosed, the practice may break laws because it hides costs from shareholders and regulators.

In 2001, Jobs, 51, received options on 7.5 million shares. The terms of the grant were completed Dec. 18 of that year, when Apple's shares were trading at $21.01, Apple said. Oct. 19 was chosen as the grant's date, giving Jobs a lower exercise price of $18.30.

The company told shareholders in a March 2002 regulatory filing that the grant was approved at a special board meeting in October 2001. Apple disclosed last month that the meeting never took place.

Apple said it recorded $84 million in charges to correct its accounting for the backdated options, including $20 million for Jobs' 7.5 million share award. Jobs voluntarily canceled that grant and other outstanding options in March 2003. He chose to do so to make more stock available for employees, Apple said in an SEC filing at the time.

Instead, the board gave Jobs 5 million shares of restricted stock, which vested in March 2006. At the time, the shares were worth $646.6 million.

The Options Paper Trail (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

With federal prosecutors investigating the granting of stock options by Apple, the actions of its iconic chief executive, Steve Jobs, are being more closely examined.

A review of how Jobs handled his stock options from 2001 shows that he waited about two-thirds of a year to report the receipt of 7.5 million options that the company admitted last month were improperly backdated. The board meeting at which they were reportedly approved never took place.

The timing of Jobs's filing was not illegal and beat the deadline. But it broke with the practice common among other Apple officers and directors of submitting the report, in this case a Form 4, within weeks, not months.

"That's clearly an anomaly worth pursuing," said Michael Levy, a former federal prosecutor who heads the white-collar group at the McKee Nelson law firm in the District. "The fact that it was this grant in particular that was subject to such a delayed filing of Form 4 seems very interesting."

Jobs filed his statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission in August 2002, reporting that he had received the stock options on Oct. 19, 2001. Apple now says the options were actually finalized in December 2001, when the value of the options was significantly less because of changes in the stock price. Jobs filed his personal disclosure about eight months later.

In contrast, three other directors who filed within days of Jobs had waited only four weeks to disclose their options. In fact, the filings of 53 other Form 4s by Apple officers and directors between the start of 1999 and late August 2002 -- when new disclosure requirements came into force -- took just under four weeks, on average. When Jobs received a previous grant of 10 million stock options in January 2000, he filed his Form 4 in just under three weeks.

Steve Dowling, Apple's director of corporate communications, declined to comment yesterday on Jobs's filing and repeated that the company's "exhaustive investigation" had found no evidence that the chief executive, board directors or other current members of management had been involved in backdating irregularities. He said Apple had voluntarily provided all details of its investigation to the U.S. attorney's office for Northern California and to the SEC.

The U.S. attorney's office confirmed this month that it was investigating options "irregularities" at Apple. Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the office, declined to give more detail but added, "We've said repeatedly and publicly that something comes into the U.S. attorney's realm and the criminal realm when there's an intent to defraud."

The SEC is also reviewing the backdating of options at Apple. The Recorder, a legal newspaper in San Francisco, reported Friday that Jobs was interviewed last week by federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers.

Sources familiar with the investigation said Wendy Howell, who worked as a lawyer in the office of Apple's general counsel, played a part in creating the paperwork for Jobs's options. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing criminal investigation.

Her attorney, Thomas Carlucci, said in statement: "While an Apple employee, Ms. Howell acted as instructed by Apple management and with the company's best interest being paramount."

Howell's boss at the time, former general counsel Nancy Heinen, has sought to distance herself from the scandal. "Each of the grants involving Ms. Heinen was authorized and approved by her superiors," her lawyer, Cristina Arguedas, said in a statement.

Apple has said Jobs never benefited from his options because he gave them up before they were exercised. But when he relinquished them, he received restricted stock estimated to be of about the same value. Last year, he used nearly half this stock, worth about $296 million, to meet tax obligations.

In Jobs's Form 4 filing in 2002, he cited the false October date four times. Adding to the confusion, he reported on the cover page that the statement covers November 2001.

Under SEC rules at the time, officers and directors of companies were instructed to report the acquisition of stock options not on Form 4 but on Form 5, which is an annual statement of transactions involving stocks and options. Nine Apple insiders filed this from 1999 to 2002.

Jobs chose the alternative, filing a Form 4. SEC rules said that an insider could disclose the receipt of stock options on a Form 4 as long as it was submitted before the deadline for the annual Form 5. Ten Apple insiders took this route from 1999 through 2002, though none of the others waited nearly as long as Jobs did in disclosing his 2001 options. Jobs filed before the legal deadline.

DOJ_NMG_0120439

Congress adopted stricter disclosure standards in 2002 as the result of corporate and accounting scandals involving Enron, WorldCom and other firms. Under the rules, company officers and directors were required to disclose their transactions, including the acquisition of options, within two business days.

Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Direction Of Apple Probe Clouded By Shakeups In U.S. Attorney's Office (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 23, 2007

Two things set the investigation of Apple Inc. apart from the hundreds of other stock option backdating probes: the indispensability of the company's CEO, and the fact that while both in-house lawyers and HR staff were involved with options grants, it's the lawyers who are getting the most scrutiny.

With Apple's fortunes tightly linked to its leader, Silicon Valley titan Steve Jobs, anything seen as jeopardizing his role at the company strikes intense fear into stockholders. That helps explain why Jobs took the risky step last week of talking to federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers to convince them of his innocence.

But with turmoil in the U.S. Attorney's Office, and no joint defense agreement among potential targets of the investigation, the probe looks more uncertain now than at any time since it launched last fall.

Lead prosecutor Christopher Steskal announced Friday that he's leaving government for Fenwick & West. Earlier that week, his boss, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan was sacked, and has hired legal placement company MLegal to find him his next job.

Ryan's No. 2, Eumi Choi -- the other prosecutor on the Apple case -- has had her resume floating around Silicon Valley for weeks.

That means that every aspect of the probe -- including whether it even turns into a criminal case -- will remain uncertain until at least two key prosecutors are replaced.

PROTECT THE HEAD

Apple is in the unenviable situation of having had to publicly admit improperly dating thousands of grants, including a massive one to Jobs in 2002. Indeed, the company said that Jobs himself helped pick some of the dates.

But all along, the company and its CEO have insisted that he had no knowledge that when such grants aren't recorded as an expense, the practice is illegal.

In simple terms, Jobs has mounted a typical defense against accusations of fraud: He says that he didn't intend to commit a crime.

And to convince prosecutors of that, Jobs, according to people familiar with the probe, took the risky step of sitting down with them.

Agreeing to such a grilling -- which few potential targets of a criminal probe would submit to -- is one way for defendants to convince prosecutors that have nothing to hide.

"You're giving them free discovery, and you don't want to give them free discovery unless it's to your advantage," said Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law and a former federal prosecutor.

"It's a great show of openness," he said, adding that it can backfire if a person doesn't come across as completely forthright.

People familiar with the Apple probe, speaking on condition of anonymity because of their involvement, said that such a meeting was almost a requirement for Jobs after the company's insistence that he has no criminal exposure. By refusing to do the interview, they said, he could have undermined the assertion that he wasn't concealing anything.

LAWYERS ON THE GRILL

While there is great uncertainty in the staffing of the Apple probe -- and in the fate of Jobs -- the strides made so far by prosecutors have laid a solid foundation for whomever ends up taking over.

Apple's public statements and the actions of prosecutors so far indicate that Apple's legal department is the most highly scrutinized part of the company -- and that human resources officials, who have landed themselves in trouble in several other companies' backdating probes, seem likely to get a pass at Apple.

After completing an internal investigation of options issues, Apple last year blamed two former company officials. Though Apple didn't identify them, sources close to the case say they are former General Counsel Nancy Heinen and former CFO Fred Anderson.

"Usually, in most companies, HR people are involved in the award process," said Jordan Eth, a partner at Morrison & Foerster who is conducting internal options investigations for several companies.

Apple is no exception: According to people with close knowledge of the company's options infrastructure throughout the late 1990s and early part of this decade, one lawyer in the general counsel's office and various human resources personnel were responsible for processing grants.

But the company's internal investigation turned away from HR -- a department that was under the purview of CFO Anderson -- and resulted in the firing of a low-level in-house lawyer, Wendy Howell.

It was her job to fill out options paperwork, and, according to people familiar with the probe, she is the one who faked meeting minutes for the 2002 Jobs grant.

It's not clear yet whether Howell will end up cooperating with the probe. People familiar with the case say no joint defense agreement has been signed, leaving open the possibility Howell, her supervisor, Heinen, and other officials could blame one another for the improprieties.

But one former official seemed sanguine when reached last week.

Dan Walker, Apple's former HR chief, wouldn't say whether he's been contacted by government investigators. But he did indicate that he's not expecting any legal problems.

"I don't have a lawyer," said Walker, who now runs a consulting firm in San Clemente. "I don't need a lawyer."

Foundry Networks CEO Keeps Job Despite Role In Backdating Options (MERCN)

By Mark Schwanhausser

The San Jose Mercury News, January 23, 2007

Foundry Networks said Monday that Chairman and Chief Executive Bobby Johnson Jr. will surrender his role as chairman -- but will stay on the board and continue to run the company -- even though he personally picked the dates for a ``substantial'' number of tainted stock options.

The Santa Clara company said Johnson was not advised that such practices could violate accounting rules and cause the company to overstate its profits. Foundry said Monday it faces a pretax accounting charge that could mount to as much as $205 million because of misdated options it gave directors, officers and rank-and-file employees from 2000 to 2003.

Johnson received no misdated options, the company said.

Foundry, which makes computer networking hardware, also stripped Timothy D. Heffner of his title as chief financial officer. But it shifted him into a new executive job that has no accounting or financial responsibilities.

Foundry's case is noteworthy because of the similarities to the high-profile case involving Apple CEO Steve Jobs. Though Apple acknowledges that Jobs recommended favorable grant dates, the company said he did not understand the accounting implications. Unlike Johnson, Jobs received tainted options. But Apple said he did not benefit from the options, which he later exchanged for restricted stock.

Foundry's decision to keep two central players despite acknowledging their roles in the options abuses is both rare and risky, said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues. Most companies have fired or forced out implicated executives and directors, he said.

``The board is taking a risk here,'' Fernandez said. ``The board is saying, `These guys were immersed in something highly questionable and fumbled accounting 101, yet let's give them another shot because they just didn't know what they were doing.' ''

Among the key findings of the investigation by the company, which also faces investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department:

· The company doled out backdated options to people at all levels of the company, including the board, top executives, new recruits and other employees. The company will take a pretax accounting charge of $185 million to $205 million in fiscal years 1999 through 2005. After accounting for tax deductions the company could have claimed, the after-tax charge will total $120 million to $135 million.

· Johnson ``selected'' the grant dates and backdated option awards for a ``substantial number of cases'' at the company. The company said Johnson did not receive any misdated options and ``found no evidence'' that he had been advised about the accounting fallout of issuing misdated options.

· Heffner, who resigned as CFO but will serve as vice president of corporate development, did not pick the dates for option grants but relayed the decisions to stock option administrators and human resources. Heffner received tainted grants and has agreed to repay tainted gains on options he has exercised and reprice options he still holds. The estimated cost: $162,000.

· The company will reprice one grant of discounted options awarded to directors. Non-management directors who exercised any of those options have agreed to repay a total of about $86,000.

13 Charged In Foodservice Alleged Fraud (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

SEC Accuses 13 More People of Aiding Alleged U.S. Foodservice Fraud

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal regulators have accused an additional 13 people of aiding an alleged massive accounting fraud at U.S. Foodservice Inc., a subsidiary of Dutch grocery retailer Ahold NV, in a scandal that brought the resignation of top executives and criminal probes in the United States and the Netherlands.

The Ahold affair was one of Europe's biggest accounting scandals, and the Dutch company skirted bankruptcy in 2003. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission in 2004 accused Ahold of fraudulently overstating sales by billions of dollars and fabricating hundreds of millions of dollars of earnings.

The civil charges filed last Thursday by the SEC bring to 30 the number of people the agency has accused of aiding the alleged fraud by signing false audit statements that enabled a $1 billion overstatement of Ahold's earnings in 2001-02. The SEC announced the new charges on Monday.

All 13 of those charged most recently in federal court in Washington were employees of or agents for vendor companies that supplied Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice, which sells food in bulk to restaurants and cafeterias.

Nine of the 13 have each agreed to pay a $25,000 civil fine to settle the SEC's allegations, which they neither admitted nor denied, the agency said. They are: Carl Allen, Donald Childers, John Crowder, Chris Jakubek, John King, Steve LeBarron, Patrick Penderghast, Frank Riggio and Richard Vecchia.

The cases remain pending against the other four, whose titles at the time were: Gary Bell, vice president for business development at Hunt-Wesson Foodservice; Joseph Grendys, the owner of Koch Poultry; Anthony Holohan, sales representative for C.F. Sauer Foods Inc., and Michael Smith, corporate accounts manager for Citrus World.

Attorneys for Bell and Holohan disputed the SEC's allegations. Lawyers for Grendys and Smith couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Ahold, which also operates the Giant and Stop & Shop supermarket chains in the United States, was not fined in an October 2004 settlement of related charges with the SEC; it did agree to a permanent injunction against violations of U.S. securities laws.

"The annual audit-confirmation process at U.S. Foodservice was systematically corrupted to help keep the fraud from being discovered," the SEC said in the civil lawsuits filed last week. The agency alleged that the 13 people signed and returned to U.S. Foodservice's outside auditors letters that they knew overstated the amounts of promotional fees paid or owed by the vendors to the company -- often by millions of dollars.

The scheme enabled U.S. Foodservice to inflate its income from promotional payments by at least $700 million for fiscal years 2001 and 2002, according to the SEC.

The former chief executive and chief financial officer of U.S. Foodservice were convicted of fraud and fined in 2005.

Ahold's former chief executive, Cees van der Hoeven, resigned in 2003 -- the year its stock lost 60 percent of its value after the accounting lapses came to light. The company's accounting was investigated by the U.S. Justice Department and Dutch authorities.

Last September, the company signed an agreement with the Justice Department under which it will not be prosecuted in connection with the alleged U.S. Foodservice fraud so long as it avoids further alleged violations.

Take-Two Let Ex-CEO Get Away With Backdating (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of Grand Theft Auto and other popular video games, failed to monitor stock-option grants, including a significant number that were backdated over a six-year period, according to an internal report released Monday by the company.

The report found that Take-Two's compensation committee abandoned its responsibilities and allowed former CEO Ryan Brant "to control and dominate the granting process" and engage in "a pattern and practice of backdating options" from 1997 to 2003.

Brant resigned as CEO five years ago and as chairman last October.

The investigation, by the BDO Seidman accounting firm and the law firm Kasowitz Benson Torres & Friedman, found no evidence that Take-Two's current executives engaged in misconduct, or that the company's former or current directors "engaged in willful misconduct or other dishonest acts."

DOJ_NMG_0120442

However, the report found that three former Take-Two executives — a former controller and two former chief financial officers that the report did not name — "appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process" and declined to appear for interviews with investigators.

Also Monday, Take-Two said that the Nasdaq Stock Market warned the firm that its failure to file its Form 10-K with the Securities and Exchange Commission for the company's fiscal year ended Oct. 31 was another reason to delist the firm from Nasdaq.

Nasdaq already had warned Take-Two last year that it faced possible delisting for failing to hold its 2006 shareholders meeting and for not filing its quarterly earnings report with the SEC for the company's third quarter.

Take-Two said Monday it will file its required SEC forms "as soon as practicable," and will combine its 2005 and 2006 shareholders meetings. Take-Two said in December that it will restate its finances for the fiscal years from 1997 to 2006.

The company disclosed last August that it had received grand jury subpoenas on its stock options from Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau.

Two years ago, the SEC alleged that Brant, former chief operating officer Larry Muller, former chief financial officer James David Jr. and vice president of sales Robert Blau fraudulently inflated the company's revenue by $60 million for 2000 and 2001.

Without admitting or denying the charges, the men and Take-Two agreed to pay penalties totaling $9 million and to disgorge more than $5 million in bonuses and interest.

Take-Two Accuses Ex-CEO Of Options Backdating (WSJ)

By Kevin Kingsbury

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. said former Chairman and Chief Executive Ryan Brant backdated stock options over a six-year period and said the company's failures allowed him "to control and dominate the granting process."

The New York-based videogame maker disclosed in July the Securities and Exchange Commission was investigating its options-granting process, and Take-Two said last month that independent investigators found improprieties in the company's granting processes. Take-Two's review began with the company's April 15, 1997 initial public offering.

The company noted the outside law firm which conducted the options review said three former executives who "appear to have had significant involvement in the company's stock-option granting process, declined to appear for interviews" and limited to some extend the information collected. The trio was Take-Two's former controller, who was fired last month, and the two chief financial officers Larry Muller and James David Jr. The pair served in that post from 1999 through 2001. Take Two's filing with the SEC on Monday didn't disclose the officials' names.

The law firm's report found that Take-Two's option-granting process usually didn't follow the company's rules and didn't have adequate control. In addition, the firm's compensation committee "abdicated its option granting responsibilities and permitted" Mr. Brant to "control and dominate the granting process."

Mr. Brant, who founded the company in 1993, was CEO until February 2001, chairman until March 2004 and resigned his remaining position with the maker of the "Grand Theft Auto" series of video games three months ago.

The probe's report also charged that between April 1997 and August 2003, Mr. Brant "engaged in a pattern and practice of backdating options," with many options during that period appearing to have been backdated. No backdating has been found since then.

Current management, including CEO Paul Eibeler and CFO Karl Winters, were cleared last month, at which time Take-Two said it would have to take charges regarding its past option practices. The amount of the charges has yet to be disclosed.

"Between April 1997 and August 2003, Mr. Brant engaged in a pattern and practice of backdating options, and during such period, a significant number of option grants appear to have been backdated."

Take-Two, Messrs. Brant, Muller, David and another executive agreed to pay about $14 million to settle SEC civil charges they schemed to inflate revenue by $60 million in fiscal 2000 and 2001. Messrs. Brant and Muller each paid a $500,000 penalty. Mr. Brant also returned $3.1 million made up of bonus money and stock options he earned after the accounting scheme enabled Take-Two to meet financial targets, while Mr. Muller returned $1.2 million.

DOJ_NMG_0120443

Mr. Brant agreed to be banned from serving as an officer or director of a public company for at least five years, while Mr. Muller -- called the scheme's "principal architect" -- accepted a permanent ban.

Mr. David succeeded Mr. Muller in July 2000 when Mr. Muller was promoted to chief operating officer. Mr. David, who was demoted in December 2001 when Take-Two announced it had to restate its 2000 and 2001 results, agreed to a $200,000 civil penalty and the return of almost $800,000.

Restatement By Take-Two Over Problems With Options (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Take-Two Interactive Software, maker of the Grand Theft Auto video games, said yesterday that it let its former chief executive, Ryan A. Brant, "control and dominate" improper options backdating that began when the company went public in 1997.

The compensation committee abdicated its responsibilities for the grants and failed to maintain proper controls, the company said in a regulatory filing. Take-Two will restate results from 1997 to 2003 to reflect options costs.

The restatement will be the second time Take-Two has revised earnings to fix accounting irregularities. In 2005, the company paid a $7.5 million fine in settling a Securities and Exchange Commission suit over how it booked sales. Take-Two is among at least 200 companies that are being investigated on suspicion of changing the date of options grants to inflate their value.

"They're very familiar with the S.E.C.," said Paul-Jon McNealy, an analyst with American Technology Research in Boston who rates the shares neutral. "It's not finished yet."

A significant number of grants were backdated from 1997 to August 2003, the company said, but it also said that it had not found any backdating since then.

Shares of Take-Two gained 5 cents, to $17.54, on Nasdaq. They had declined 5.7 percent this year before yesterday. The billionaire Carl C. Icahn owned 2.89 million shares, or 4 percent, as of September.

Three former executives declined to be interviewed for the option investigation, which was led by Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman and was completed last Wednesday, Take-Two said in yesterday's S.E.C. filing. They included a former controller who was fired in December and two chief financial officers, one of whom served from late January 1999 to early 2000 and the other from early April 2000 through 2001.

Mr. Brant founded the company in 1993 at age 21 and served as chief until 2001. In March 2004, as the company's sales accounting was under investigation, he gave up the title of chairman and became director of software publishing. He was a nonexecutive vice president until his departure in October.

Take-Two faces possible delisting from the Nasdaq after failing to report results on time. It said yesterday that it planned to file earnings for the quarter ended July 31 and the year ended Oct. 31 "as soon as practicable."

Take-Two also said that Nasdaq said the company could continue to be listed as long as it reported before March 19 on the quarter that ended July 31 and also held a combined 2005 and 2006 annual shareholders' meeting before March 27.

Suspects In Siemens Probe Point To Finance Chief (WSJ)

By David Crawford In Berlin And Mike Esterl In Frankfurt

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Two key suspects in a fraud investigation roiling Siemens AG have told German prosecutors that Chief Financial Officer Joe Kaeser has known for years about an alleged scheme to pay bribes to win overseas telecommunications contracts, according to witness statements reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

One suspect also told prosecutors that two other senior executives at the German conglomerate knew since at least early 2005 about the alleged bribes-for-business scheme: current management board member Rudi Lamprecht and Lothar Pauly, who headed the telecom division before leaving the company in late 2005.

TELECOM TURMOIL

· The Situation: Siemens is facing a criminal bribery investigation involving hundreds of millions of dollars in suspicious payments.

· Why Investors Should Care: Evidence of wrongdoing could curb Siemens's ability to participate in major infrastructure projects.

· What's Next: Shareholders will vote on senior management's actions at Thursday's annual shareholder meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0120444

The revelations come at a sensitive time for top managers at Siemens, who have been fending off criticism ahead of an annual holders' meeting Thursday that they didn't do enough to stop corruption. Evidence of wrongdoing could cause some countries to ban Siemens from participating in big infrastructure projects that generate much of its revenue.

The investigation also could complicate the conglomerate's efforts to jettison its telecom business, merging much of it into a venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland. The testimony alleges that bribes took place in Siemens's wireless-telecom business, and weren't confined to the fixed-line unit, which was the original focus of the criminal investigation.

German authorities are investigating the allegations, which were made in separate statements provided by long-time Siemens executives Michael Kutschenreuter and Reinhard Siekaczek.

Peik von Bestenbostel, a Siemens spokesman, said: "Mr. Kaeser and Mr. Lamprecht did not know of, and they were not involved in, bribes at any point." He said no current members of Siemens's management board have been approached by authorities.

A spokesman for the prosecutor's office in Munich declined to comment. A lawyer for Mr. Pauly, now a member of the management board at telecommunications titan Deutsche Telekom AG, said any allegation that his client knew of bribes or was involved in bribes is "completely false." He declined to comment on whether Mr. Pauly has been in contact with authorities regarding the fraud probe.

The scandal at Munich-based Siemens widened last month when the company said it had found €420 million ($544.4 million) in suspicious transactions spanning the past seven years -- double the amount German prosecutors flagged in November.

Police arrested half a dozen suspects -- including Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek -- late last year. They were released last month after they agreed to cooperate in a widening, cross-border probe.

Mr. Kutschenreuter's lawyer, Leonard Walischewski, said his client's statements are backed by documents supporting his allegations. "If prosecutors had any doubt about Mr. Kutschenreuter's statements, he would be in jail," Mr. Walischewski said.

Wolfgang Kreuzer, a lawyer for Mr. Siekaczek, said his client is cooperating with prosecutors. "Police have investigated and verified Mr. Siekaczek's statements," Mr. Kreuzer said.

The witness statements were made by two men who were considered loyal Siemens officials for decades. The statements are significant because they were presented as evidence in an arraignment hearing, where prosecutors would have been required to point out any contradictions or inaccuracies in the statements.

The two witnesses said that the alleged involvement of the finance chief, Mr. Kaeser, occurred while he oversaw finances at Siemens's wireless-telecom-equipment unit. He belonged to the executive management board of that unit from April 2001 to October 2004.

Mr. Siekaczek, who left Siemens in late 2004 after four decades, told prosecutors after being arrested in November that Mr. Kaeser "had people that created slush funds" at the wireless unit while Mr. Kaeser was employed there, according to the witness statements.

Mr. Kaeser became financial chief in May 2006 after succeeding Heinz-Joachim Neubürger, who left the company. German prosecutors said earlier this month that Mr. Neubürger is a suspect in the investigation.

Mr. Siekaczek testified that he himself helped carry out bribes at the wireless unit for a brief period around 2000. Mr. Kutschenreuter told prosecutors in December that a compliance manager told him in late 2004 or early 2005 that illegal payments were commonplace at the wireless unit, according to the statements.

Mr. Kutschenreuter became the chief financial officer of an expanded telecom division in October 2004, when the wireless and fixed-line units were merged.

Around that time, Mr. Kutschenreuter testified, he spoke with Mr. Pauly, who then headed the merged telecom division. He said Mr. Pauly told him the wireless unit's former top management -- including Messrs. Kaeser and Lamprecht -- were aware of bribe payments to win wireless contracts.

Mr. Lamprecht headed the mobile unit before being promoted in October 2004 to the management board of Siemens.

Prosecutors suspect Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek helped orchestrate bribe payments at the fixed-line unit through a system of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts. Mr. Kutschenreuter was heading Siemens's real-estate unit at the time of his arrest.

German prosecutors presented the testimony of Messrs. Kutschenreuter and Siekaczek to an arraignment judge last month when seeking the detention of former management-board member Thomas Ganswindt. A lawyer for Mr. Ganswindt, who was released, said his client denies any wrongdoing.

The allegations could harm efforts by Siemens to merge the bulk of its telecom business into a 50-50 joint venture with Nokia. A merger would create the world's No. 3 supplier of equipment to telecom carriers with about €16 billion in annual revenue.

Nokia and Siemens said last month they expect to close the transaction in the first quarter of 2007, not Jan. 1 as originally planned, pending "an appropriate compliance review"' of the German company's telecom business.

The planned merger, which includes both fixed-line and wireless assets, was announced last June.

Top management at Siemens has consistently denied any wrongdoing. The company says it is cooperating fully with authorities. Authorities have said that Chief Executive Officer Klaus Kleinfeld is a witness, not a suspect, in the criminal investigation.

Investors will have a chance to question management further about the fraud investigation Thursday, when Siemens has its annual shareholder meeting. Shareholders also will be asked to vote to approve the actions of individual management and supervisory board members in the most recent fiscal year.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Report Faults FBI In Foley Case (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Margasak

Long Island Newsday, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The FBI should have acted to protect teenage House pages when it initially learned last July that Rep. Mark Foley had sent disturbing e-mails to a former page, a Justice Department report concluded Monday.

The bureau, which at the time declined to investigate, also made inaccurate statements to the news media about its decision, the report said. It said that bureau spokesmen wrongly asserted that the decision was influenced by a congressional watchdog group's failure to provide information missing from the e-mails.

The report, by Inspector General Glenn Fine, said the group was not asked to provide any additional information from the e-mails -- nor did the missing material influence the decision not to investigate.

"We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the Congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley," Fine reported.

Such actions by the FBI could have included interviewing the former page and notifying House officials overseeing the page program about the e-mails.

The inspector general, however, found no misconduct by FBI officials, who at the time were aware only of e-mails to a former Louisiana page that were not sexually explicit and gave no indication of criminal activity.

The FBI said the inspector general acknowledged that its assessment "was conducted after the fact and after explicit instant messages surfaced -- none of which were part of the FBI's initial evaluation."

The bureau promised to carefully examine its policies for disseminating information to see whether changes are warranted.

The group that provided the e-mails, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) said it had been vindicated by the report.

"Not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up it's shocking inaction by blaming CREW. The IG's report vindicates CREW completely."

The bureau did launch an investigation after Foley, R-Fla., resigned last Sept. 29 and the news media revealed he had sent instant electronic messages with sexual overtones to former male pages. The FBI has not commented on the results of that investigation.

"We believe that the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps," the report said.

The action could have included a preliminary inquiry with an interview of a former page. Alternatively, officials should have considered "notifying the House authorities in charge of the page program about the concerns expressed by the former page," Fine's report said.

In fact, some House officials did know about the e-mails, sent in 2005. The chairman of the House Page Board overseeing the program, Republican Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, confronted Foley about them and told him to stop sending the messages.

However, Shimkus has been criticized by members of both parties for failing to convene the page board, and the body was reconstituted last week to ensure that it would better handle future problems.

The substance of the e-mails to the Louisiana page has long been known. Foley asked what the youngster wanted for his birthday and asked for a picture.

The youngster told others the e-mails "freaked me out" and repeated multiple times that they were "sick."

DOJ_NMG_0120446

The internal Justice report said that at the very least the bureau should have notified the organization that provided the e-mails that it had declined to open an investigation.

CREW had been relying on the FBI to pursue the matter and had not notified anyone else about the e-mails while waiting for the bureau to act.

The House voted unanimously last Friday to provide both parties equal membership on the board that oversees the page program and to add a parent and a former page to that body.

FBI Chided For Inaction On Foley Case (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - The FBI -- which warns parents on its website about "individuals who attempt to sexually exploit children" via the Internet -- should have sounded alarms over questionable computer messages sent to a former teenage page by disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, an inspector general's report concluded Monday.

The agency should have interviewed the page or alerted the House page program or, "at the very least," told the whistle-blower agency that provided it with the messages that it was declining to investigate, said the 31-page report by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine.

"We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley," the report states.

The report also found that FBI officials misled reporters about the whistleblower group that provided the messages. The FBI, it said, suggested to reporters that its decision not to investigate the matter was partly because the group gave it messages that were "heavily redacted" and that it refused to cooperate further.

But the report shows that Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington provided messages that had the name of the page and a House employee to whom the message was sent. It chastises the FBI for not telling CREW that it wasn't going to investigate the matter, suggesting that CREW might have pursued it further.

The FBI, in a statement issued late Monday, noted that the inspector general's report concluded that the agency had "acted within the range of its discretion" in not opening a criminal investigation. And it noted that the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia later reviewed the same messages ``and agreed that no further investigation was warranted."

The agency also promised to "carefully examine" the report to see whether policy changes are needed.

CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan welcomed the report, but suggested it mirrored a pattern of agencies turning a blind eye to Foley's behavior. Amid criticism, the House of Representatives last week revised the Page Board in an attempt to avoid future problems.

Foley, a Lake Worth Republican, resigned Sept. 29 after sexually explicit instant messages he exchanged with other pages surfaced.

That action came several months after CREW sent copies of computer messages to the FBI. The e-mails did not contain any sexually explicit material, but the report suggests it was enough for the FBI to act.

The inspector general noted that the language in the messages fell within the type of behavior that the FBI warns against in A Parent's Guide to Internet Safety, which is available on its website.

No Misconduct Found In FBI Decision On Foley (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

The FBI's initial decision not to open a probe into Rep. Mark Foley's e-mail contact with House pages was within bureau guidelines, but the exchanges "provided enough troubling indications" to begin a preliminary inquiry, according to a report released yesterday.

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said that given the position of trust and authority the former Florida congressman held with respect to House pages, a better decision for the FBI in the matter would have been for it to take "at least some follow-up steps."

"Such action could have included a brief preliminary inquiry with an interview of the former page," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. "Alternatively, if the FBI did not think that such an interview was warranted, it should have considered notifying House authorities in charge of the page program.

"At a minimum, we believe the FBI should have notified CREW (Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington), the complainant in this case, that the FBI had declined to open an investigation," Mr. Fine said. "At the time, CREW was relying on the FBI to pursue the matter and as a result had not notified anyone else about the e-mails."

Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, had forwarded three e-mails to the FBI in July that she believed warranted investigation, although the bureau decided they did not warrant any investigative action. The FBI did not inform CREW of its decision or take any additional action.

In September, the sexually charged e-mails and other instant messages from Mr. Foley to other former congressional pages became public. Mr. Foley, a Republican, resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 and three days later, the FBI announced it was opening a "preliminary investigation" into Mr. Foley's e-mails with House pages.

Mr. Fine said five of the e-mails were written by Mr. Foley to a former male page and contained statements that, at a minimum, could be described as unusual between an adult in a position of authority and a juvenile. He said three additional e-mails were exchanged between the former page and a House employee in which the former page expressed concern about the nature of the Foley e-mails.

An investigation by Mr. Fine's office found that e-mails provided to the FBI by CREW had been forwarded promptly to the appropriate FBI supervisory special agent in the Washington field office. Mr. Fine said his investigators were told that while the e-mails were determined to be "odd," there was no evidence of criminal wrongdoing and no further investigation was warranted.

The Inspector General's Office concluded that the decision not to open an investigation did not constitute misconduct, but it said a preliminary inquiry should have been ordered.

The FBI in a statement yesterday noted that the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia later reviewed the same e-mails and agreed no further investigation was warranted.

The statement said the e-mails were reviewed by three separate investigative squads and FBI agents acted "quickly and appropriately in assessing the information" and providing it to the Cyber Crimes Squad, where the decision was made not to pursue a criminal investigation.

FBI Should've Followed Up On Foley's E-mails, Inquiry Finds (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The FBI should have made more inquiries into the "troubling" e-mails written by then-congressman Mark Foley to young congressional pages before the bureau decided against launching a formal investigation, the Justice Department's inspector general concluded Monday.

On Sept. 29 — two months after the FBI received information about the e-mails from the government watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) — Foley, R-Fla., resigned when ABC News confronted him about sexually suggestive e-mails he had sent to male pages.

The inspector general found that the FBI's handling of the matter did not constitute misconduct and that an unidentified FBI supervisory special agent acted within "the range of discretion" when the agent found no apparent evidence of criminal wrongdoing.

"However, the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps with regard to the e-mails," the inspector general's report found.

"If the FBI did not think that such an interview was warranted, it should have considered notifying House authorities in charge of the page program about the concerns expressed" by a former page, the report said.

The inspector general also found that "FBI or Justice Department" officials provided "inaccurate information" to media outlets when they explained that an investigation had not been opened because CREW provided the FBI with "heavily-redacted" material and that CREW refused to provide details about the source of the e-mails.

In a written response, the FBI said it would review its internal policies. But the bureau said Foley's most explicit communications with pages were not part of its initial evaluation of the case. The FBI said internal "misunderstandings" contributed to the release of inaccurate information to reporters.

"The (inspector general) determined that the e-mails were reviewed by three separate investigative squads and that the FBI agents acted quickly and appropriately in assessing the information," the FBI said in its response.

CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan said the government's release of inaccurate information amounted to a "coverup" of the FBI's "shocking inaction."

"By forwarding the e-mails to the FBI … CREW (was) the only party in this sordid affair to have done the right thing from the first instance," she said.

In December, the House ethics committee reported that several members had known about Foley's e-mails and did not do enough to protect pages. However, the panel found that no individual member had violated the chamber's ethics policies.

The Foley scandal, revealed just more than a month before the elections in November, was among a series of ethical issues Republicans faced before losing control of Congress in the elections.

The FBI, which opened an investigation into the Foley case after he resigned, is continuing to examine the case. The attorney general's office in Florida continues to investigate the case, spokeswoman Sandi Copes said.

FBI Faulted For Inaction In Foley Scandal (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The FBI should have acted last summer to protect underage congressional pages after it was given "troubling" electronic messages sent by then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), according to a report released yesterday.

The review by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine also found that FBI and Justice officials misled the news media last fall when they asserted that an activist group that first provided the FBI with Foley's messages had not been cooperative and had withheld vital information from investigators.

In fact, Fine's report found that the group -- Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington, or CREW -- had notified the FBI within days of obtaining the electronic communications in July. But the FBI never asked for additional information from the group and never sought to interview the former page in Louisiana who received the messages from Foley, the report said.

The 31-page report provides additional evidence that government and legislative officials took little action in response to growing complaints about Foley's conduct with underage male pages. It also shows how officials frequently attempted to minimize their roles in the affair after the communications were publicized and Foley resigned.

"We believe that the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps," the report concluded. It added later: "[E]ven if the FBI did not believe any interviews were warranted based upon the e-mails alone, we believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the Congressional page program were not at risk of predatory behavior by Foley."

Follow-up steps could have included interviewing the male page who received the electronic messages or notifying House leaders about the communications, the report said.

Foley resigned from the House in September after ABC News reported on the same communications given to the FBI, in which Foley praises the physical attributes of one page and asks another for his picture. The ensuing scandal was widely seen as a significant factor in the defeat of some Republicans in the November elections.

Both the FBI and the state of Florida have opened criminal investigations of Foley. In December, the House ethics committee concluded that House leaders and staff members knew for months or even years about Foley's inappropriate conduct, but the panel declined to recommend any disciplinary action.

The FBI's criminal probe appears to be ongoing. One 22-year-old former page who allegedly received explicit messages from Foley said in an interview yesterday that the FBI had most recently questioned him the week before Christmas. He said the agent was focused on determining his age at the time of the electronic exchanges with Foley and confirming other details.

Shortly after the Foley scandal broke, CREW publicly disclosed that it had provided the FBI with suspicious messages from Foley in July and criticized the bureau for not moving more aggressively in the case.

Several officials at the FBI and Justice Department -- all of whom requested anonymity at the time -- responded by telling reporters that the messages supplied by CREW had been "heavily redacted" and that the group had refused to provide further information.

Fine's review found, however, that the only thing removed from the messages was the identity of the person to whom the communications had been forwarded, and that the "redactions in the e-mail did not factor into the FBI's decision to decline to investigate the matter." Fine's office also found that a chronology prepared by the FBI's Washington Field Office contained inaccuracies that were likely repeated to the press.

CREW's executive director, Melanie Sloan, said in a statement that "not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming CREW."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse referred questions about the report to the FBI. The FBI, in a prepared statement, attributed the erroneous statements about CREW to "inaccurate information" that led to "misunderstandings on the part of FBI and DOJ spokespersons."

The supervisory special agent who looked into the Foley messages said there was no evidence a crime had occurred and that the messages were "not the job of the FBI" but "a parental job."

"We are not the ethics police," the unidentified agent said later in the report.

DOJ_NMG_0120449

One point of disagreement not answered in the report is whether Sloan was asked by an FBI agent to identify the person who provided the group with the messages. The FBI agent said she "may have" asked Sloan that question, but that she was not sure; Sloan has said since October that she was asked only whether the author of the communications was Foley.

FBI: We Flubbed Foley E-mails (ABC)

By Jason Ryan And Brian Ross

ABC News' The Blotter, January 23, 2007

The FBI should have done more to investigate the Mark Foley e-mails or, alternatively, notified House authorities in charge of the congressional page program, the FBI's inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, said in a report today.

Read the Mark Foley e-mails.

In effect, the report finds the FBI's inaction contributed to the failure of officials to detect Foley's inappropriate behavior, which eventually led to his resignation when ABC News revealed more sexually explicit e-mails and instant messages to current and former pages.

While finding no official misconduct on the part of FBI officials, the inspector general said "the e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face" to have warranted follow-up steps.

Instead, the inspector general found, the supervisory agent decided there was no evidence of criminal wrongdoing and "placed the e-mails in her in box and took no further action" even though she found the e-mails "odd."

The e-mails were provided to the FBI in July 2006 by the non-profit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW).

Click Here for Full Blotter Coverage.

The inspector general said the FBI "at a minimum" should have told CREW it had decided against an investigation because "CREW was relying on the FBI to pursue the matter and as a result had not notified anyone else about the e-mails."

Melanie Sloan, the executive director of CREW, says the FBI's handling of the Foley e-mails was irresponsible. "They should take investigating potential, child sexual predators much more seriously," says Sloan. "Attorney General Gonzales said this is one of their top priorities, but their conduct in this case shows that clearly that is not the case."

The inspector general also concluded that widely reported comments by FBI officials on the e-mails provided by CREW were "not accurate."

Unnamed officials were quoted as saying "the reason that the FBI did nothing further at the time" was because CREW had provided heavily redacted e-mails and refused to provide information about the source of the e-mails.

Sloan says the agency owes her organization an apology. "The FBI didn't fail to take any action on the e-mails because of any of CREW's actions," she said. "What CREW gave the FBI, they failed to investigate all on their own."

The inspector general said it was unable to determine who was responsible for making the inaccurate statements to the media.

Justice Report Faults FBI On Foley, Says Agents Should Have Done More (PALMBEACHP)

By Brian E. Crowley, Palm Beach Post Political Editor

Palm Beach Post (FL), January 23, 2007

The Justice Department on Monday released a report criticizing the FBI for failing to take action to ensure the safety of congressional pages after receiving copies of e-mails sent by former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley.

In the 31-page report, Inspector General Glenn Fine said that although the failure to begin a formal investigation was "not misconduct," agents had enough information to "have raised enough concerns to warrant some action."

Fine also found that the FBI misled reporters by saying the e-mails they received were incomplete, with much of the writing blotted out. That was not true, Fine said.

The messages examined by Fine were not the sexually explicit e-mails that led to Foley's resignation from Congress.

The FBI obtained the messages in question in July from Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a government watchdog group. In one, Foley asks a teen to send a picture, asks how old he is and comments on another congressional page who is "in really great shape."

Sloan's office received copies of the e-mails and forwarded them to the Washington office of the FBI.

Fine's report details how the e-mails were batted from the Public Corruption Squad to the Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity Squad and finally to the Cyber Crimes Squad. None of the agents is named in the report.

The supervisory special agent for the Public Corruption Squad told Fine that after reading the e-mails, he thought, "What a freak," but he decided they did not fall into his jurisdiction. He passed them to Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity.

The agent in charge of that squad told Fine that it "was clear to me that there was no criminal violation," although she called the e-mails "inappropriate." Because of the type of messages, she passed them on to Cyber Crimes.

The agent in charge of Cyber Crimes called the e-mails "odd" but also "did not see any evidence of wrongdoing," Fine said.

She told him she decided not to investigate, in part, because the age of consent in the District of Columbia is 16.

During Fine's investigation, the Cyber Crimes agent said: "We only open a case if there is a reasonable indication that criminal activity has occurred or will occur. There was nothing in this that warranted taking any action."

The agent also was asked whether the e-mails suggested she should notify managers of the congressional page program. She said no.

She told Fine that the e-mails, which were not sexually explicit, were "not the job of the FBI. This is a parental job."

She said the fact that Foley was a congressman did not influence her decision.

Two months later, ABC News posted the same e-mails on its Web site. That prompted others to send copies of e-mails from Foley that were more sexually explicit. Foley, a Fort Pierce Republican, resigned Sept. 29.

Fine said the FBI's decision not to investigate the e-mails it received in July "fell within the range of discretion" of an FBI supervisor.

But Fine went on to say that because of Foley's "position of trust and authority" with House pages, "a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps."

At the very least, agents should have "notified the House authorities who ran the page program," Fine said.

The report also criticizes the FBI for not following up with Sloan and for claiming that the e-mails it received contained little useful information.

In a statement, Sloan said she hoped "the FBI would learn from this incident and, in the future, be quicker to investigate potential crimes against children."

Meanwhile, both the FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are continuing their investigations into Foley and his conduct with congressional pages.

"We still have an active, open investigation, so there is no change on our part at this time," FDLE spokeswoman Kristen Perezluha said. "What we are doing is on the state level. We have been assisting the FBI in their investigation, but the FDLE investigation is separate."

Report Faults FBI Handling Of Foley Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The agency's follow-up was inadequate and it gave "inaccurate" public accounts, inquiry finds.

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department's inspector general admonished the FBI on Monday for its handling of the page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, saying the bureau failed to follow up on suggestive e-mails between the Florida Republican and a former male page and gave "inaccurate" public statements about the case.

The watchdog report was triggered by a complaint filed by a nonprofit advocacy group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which had sent the FBI copies of e-mails between Foley and a former page last summer. The e-mails were sent two months before the scandal became public and forced the lawmaker to resign after a series of sexually explicit messages surfaced.

The FBI dismissed the early e-mails, the inspector general found, because agents did not believe they showed evidence of criminal wrongdoing. The FBI later launched an investigation, which is pending.

In the e-mails, Foley beckons a former page to e-mail him a picture of himself and asks what he might like for his birthday. He also comments about another page being "in really great shape" and seeming "much older than his age."

The e-mails also included complaints about Foley from a former page who told a House employee that Foley's e-mails had "freaked me out" and calling the content of his messages "sick."

The inspector general found that the tip was handled by a senior supervisory agent in the cyber crimes division of the FBI Washington field office who found the messages "odd" but not indicative of any criminal wrongdoing because, the agent said, the law in the District of Columbia permits sexual relations between an adult and a 16-year-old — the minimum age for pages.

The report found that the decision not to investigate "fell within the range of discretion" afforded supervisory agents and "did not constitute misconduct." But it also found the messages "at a minimum" to be "unusual" and that the FBI should have taken some action.

"The e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up," the inspector general found.

The report also noted that, notwithstanding the law in the district, three of the eight states from which the e-mails were sent or received would have made sexual conduct between Foley and a 16-year-old a crime.

The report also criticized the bureau for public comments it made about the advocacy group's complaint.

Justice officials said at the time that the group had provided "heavily redacted" e-mails and refused to provide information about their source, indicating that was the reason the FBI did not pursue an investigation earlier.

The inspector general's office "concluded that such statements were not accurate. The e-mails were not heavily redacted and the evidence showed that the FBI did not seek additional information from" the advocacy group, the report found.

The inspector general "was unable to determine who was responsible for making the inaccurate statements," the report said, and concluded that the inaccuracies were caused by "a misinterpretation of the description of events that was disseminated within the FBI."

Melanie Sloan, the executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics, said: "Not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming" the advocacy group.

The FBI said it would study the report. "The FBI shares the [inspector general's] interest in ensuring that information regarding potential criminal activity is evaluated objectively and in conformance with established policies and practices," the bureau said in a statement. "Accordingly, the FBI will carefully examine the … review for any changes to existing policies or procedures that may be warranted."

Justice: FBI Could Have Handled Foley E-mails Better (CNN)

CNN.com, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- An internal Justice Department report concluded the FBI should have notified the House of Representatives or other officials after learning last summer of inappropriate e-mails former Rep. Mark Foley sent to a House page.

The report, released Monday and authored by the Justice Department inspector general, said the FBI acted within its "range of discretion" when it initially decided not to open a criminal investigation in the case.

But the internal watchdog's investigation concluded that the response was inadequate.

"The e-mails provided enough troubling indications on their face -- particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held with respect to House pages -- that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps with regard to the e-mails," said Inspector General Glenn Fine.

Fine's investigation said that if the FBI determined an interview with the former page was not warranted, the FBI should have at least notified House officials charged with protecting congressional pages.

It also should have notified the complaining organization that sent the material, the report said.

In a written response late Monday, the FBI defended its handling of the case and stressed the inspector general's finding that the FBI acted appropriately in its decision not to launch a criminal investigation after the initial e-mails.

"The OIG [Office of Inspector General] acknowledges that its assessment was conducted after the fact and after explicit instant messages surfaced -- none of which were part of the FBI's initial evaluation," the FBI said.

"The review suggests certain follow-up steps could have been undertaken with regard to the e-mails," the response notes.

The inspector general confirmed the first Foley e-mails came to the FBI in July 2006 from the group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, after which the FBI decided no action was needed.

After eight more e-mails and explicit instant messages from Foley were made public in September, a political firestorm erupted on Capitol Hill.

Foley resigned September 29 and the FBI opened an investigation. To date, no charges have been filed.

The inspector general also criticized the FBI for making inaccurate statements about the reasons it had not opened an investigation after the initial batch of e-mails.

The report rejected the FBI's claims in press reports that the e-mails had been heavily redacted and that CREW had refused to provide information about the source of the e-mails.

In its response, the FBI said the bureau will conduct a review of whether any policies or procedures need to be changed in the interest of disseminating the most accurate information and avoiding internal misunderstandings.

Probe Faults FBI In Foley Investigation (CBS)

Justice Department Report Says Bureau Mishandled Receipt Of Ex-Congressman's Improper E-mails

The Justice Department's Inspector General's internal investigation into how the FBI's Washington field office handled e-mails sent to pages by former Rep. Mark Foley has concluded that the agency handled the events poorly.

The Foley e-mails were sent to the FBI in July 2006 by Citizens for Responsibility in Ethics (CREW); the scandal broke in September 2006.

However, the investigation concludes that the FBI supervisors did not engage in "misconduct."

The report reveals that the e-mails "provided enough troubling indications" that the FBI supervisor who reviewed them should have, at a minimum, interviewed the former page. If the agents didn't think such an interview was warranted, they should have gone to House authorities in charge of the page program about concerns that were expressed. Finally, the FBI should have notified CREW that the FBI decided not to investigate since CREW thought an investigation was already under way.

After Foley resigned from office in September, the Office of the Inspector General also concluded that the FBI made "inaccurate statements to the media" about the e-mails forward by CREW. The FBI claimed the e-mails were heavily redacted, and thus useless to investigators. But in fact, the e-mails were not heavily redacted, "and the evidence showed that the FBI did not seek additional information from CREW."

The Justice Department was faulted for disseminating inaccuracies to the news media as well.

Investigators: FBI Not Wrong To Dismiss Complaint About Foley (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, January 23, 2007

The FBI misled reporters about its decision not to investigate a series of e-mails between former Rep. Mark Foley and a congressional page, but was justified in deciding not to open a case based on information provided in July 2006, Justice Department investigators said Monday.

A Justice inspector general's investigation cleared the FBI of accusations that officials were too quick in declining to open an investigation based on five e-mails from Foley, none of them explicit in nature, to a former page.

The e-mails were shared with the FBI in July, months before Foley resigned from the House, by the Washington advocacy group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics. The group asked the IG to look into the FBI's handling of the matter after the scandal broke in late September. While the e-mails were less damning than the instant messages later uncovered between Foley and a House page, the minor who forwarded the e-mails to a House staff member described them as "sick sick sick sick sick."

Justice IG Glenn Fine's study found that after several hand-offs between FBI units, the e-mails provided by the advocacy group reached the Cyber Crimes Squad, where a supervisory special agent decided not to open an investigation because there was nothing in the messages that constituted a crime. Inspectors concluded that the agent's decision fell into an appropriate "range of discretion," but said the group should have been informed of the decision not to open an investigation.

"At a minimum, we believe the FBI should have notified CREW, the complainant in this case, that the FBI had declined to open an investigation," inspectors wrote, adding that CREW had been relying on the agency to pursue the issue and so had not taken other steps. The IG also noted that Foley's messages followed the lines of behavior that the FBI describes as "gradual seduction" in its Parent's Guide to Internet Safety.

Inspectors described the internal handoff of the case from a federal watchdog liaison agent to the Public Corruption Squad to the Crimes Against Children and Adult Obscenity Squad to the Cyber Crimes Squad, but found no indication that concern over pursuing a case against a congressman had factored into the agency's final decision not to investigate further. The FBI announced on Oct. 1 that an investigation would be opened into Foley's contacts with pages, just after his Sept. 29 resignation.

The advocacy group also asked the inspector general's office to investigate statements that Justice officials made to reporters in September that the agency had failed to act earlier because CREW had submitted only "heavily redacted" versions of the e-mails and had refused to provide further information when asked.

The watchdog group immediately contested those charges, and in its review, the IG office found that public statements attributed to FBI and Justice officials were not true. The only information redacted from the messages was the name and contact information of another person to whom the messages had been forwarded. The message bodies, the page's e-mail address and that of the House staffer to whom he reported the messages were all clear.

The IG office also found that the advocacy group participated in the only follow-up conducted by FBI agents, a telephone call from the liaison officer immediately after the messages were submitted. The group forwarded them to authorities immediately, not after a lag of several months, as media outlets reported an undisclosed official had suggested, the auditors found.

The inspectors attributed the misinformation to "misunderstandings" between FBI and Justice spokespeople, but said none of the three media representatives interviewed recalled giving out the inaccurate information.

"By forwarding the e-mails to the FBI for investigation, CREW stands out as the only party in this sordid affair to have done the right thing from the first instance," CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan said Monday. "In marked contrast, not only did the FBI fail to investigate the possible sexual abuse of minors by a sitting member of Congress, the bureau then tried to cover up its shocking inaction by blaming CREW."

In a statement, Justice officials said Monday that FBI "will carefully examine the OIG review for any changes to existing policies or procedures that may be warranted."

Last week, the House passed legislation intended to ensure Congress would respond better to future incidents involving pages by expanding representation on the board overseeing the page program to include a former page who is not a member of Congress, and a parent of a current or former page.

FBI Should Have Pursued Foley E-Mails, Report Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland

Bloomberg, January 23, 2007

Jan. 22 (Bloomberg) -- The FBI should have followed up on e- mails sent in 2005 by then-U.S. Representative Mark Foley to a former teenage male congressional page instead of deciding not to investigate, a Justice Department report says.

Bureau officials also circulated inaccurate information about the e-mails, leading to false news reports that helped justify inaction by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said the report today by the department's inspector general.

``The FBI's decision to decline to investigate this matter was not misconduct," the 21-page report said. ``Yet we believe that the e-mails should have raised enough concerns to warrant some action."

Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned in September after the e-mails became public. The controversy surrounding his conduct, and whether House Republican leaders ignored his transgressions, helped Democrats regain control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

A House ethics committee report said in December that Republican congressional leaders failed to protect the pages after hearing warnings about Foley's behavior as much as two years earlier.

The FBI got the 2005 e-mails last July from a nonpartisan watchdog group called Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. After reviewing the messages for two days, the bureau decided not to investigate, the report said.

Discipline Required

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the group that forwarded the e-mails to the FBI, said the Justice Department should discipline employees responsible for lapses identified in today's report.

``I think Foley would have resigned a lot sooner if he knew the FBI was looking at him," Sloan said in an interview.

None of the FBI agents who handled the e-mails were identified by name in the report. Sloan said she got the messages from another public-interest group.

The FBI said in a statement it shares the Justice Department inspector general's ``interest in ensuring that information regarding potential criminal activity" is properly evaluated, and it promised to study the report for any warranted ``changes to existing policies or procedures."

Within the FBI, a public-corruption agent who read the e- mails in July thought of Foley, ``What a freak," the Justice Department report said. The agent decided that the material should be examined by colleagues in other units, who found that the messages didn't warrant further investigation in part because they didn't contain sexually explicit language, the report said.

Asking for Photograph

In one e-mail given to the FBI, Foley inquired about a former page's safety in a hurricane and asked him for a photograph. The page passed on the e-mail to a House aide and added the comment: ``sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick."

Today's report said the FBI could have conducted a preliminary inquiry that included an interview of the former page. The bureau also could have notified congressional leaders about concerns expressed by the former page in the e-mail.

When the messages became public, news reports quoted the FBI and the Justice Department as saying -- in what proved to be false -- that the messages were ``heavily redacted," or censored, and that Sloan's group refused to provide more information, the report said.

Editorial: FBI Flubbed Foley Probe (BOSH)

Boston Herald, January 23, 2007

The latest in the sordid saga of former Rep. Mark Foley proves once again that not a single agency - not a single individual - managed to see clearly through the Beltway haze to act in the best interests of vulnerable teens.

The Department of Justice yesterday concluded that the FBI should have investigated Foley and the inappropriate e-mails he had sent to a former House page when the agency was informed of them back in July.

"We believe the FBI should have considered taking some steps to ensure that any minors in the congressional page program were not at risk . . . " wrote DOJ Inspector General Glenn Fine.

The e-mails, while not sexually explicit, "provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Foley held" to warrant an FBI probe, Fine wrote.

An FBI investigation might have included informing House officials who oversee the page program about the "Foley problem." Then again, as another investigation proved, some of those same House officials already knew, but did little to deal with it. It appears that like everyone else tainted by this scandal, the FBI passed the buck until Foley resigned and the sordid details were reported by the media.

Now the new Congress has revamped the board that oversees the page program and has pledged regular meetings. But unless every agency, every individual with an interest in protecting these young people understands their duty, that will be of little comfort.

Libby Jury Is Chosen; Arguments Set To Start (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

A federal judge empaneled a jury yesterday in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, seating a largely apolitical, educated group of D.C. residents to decide whether Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to investigators about his role in divulging the identity of a covert CIA officer.

The nine women and three men selected for the jury -- as well as four alternates -- are scheduled to hear Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald and one of Libby's attorneys, Theodore V. Wells Jr., lay out opposing portrayals of the celebrated case in opening statements today. Over the next four to six weeks, testimony in the case will expose the inner workings of the Bush White House shortly after the Iraq war began and confidential conversations between well-known journalists and their sources in the administration.

Libby faces five felony charges that he lied to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating the leak of CIA officer Valerie Plame's name by aides to President Bush.

In a city where most residents are black, 90 percent are Democrats and the local culture is steeped in politics, the jury is not completely representative. Ten of the 12 jurors -- and two of the alternates -- are white. Most said during questioning that they have no political opinions about the administration's handling of Iraq or do not follow the news.

"I am a master of all things pop culture but nothing about current events," said a woman who books conventions for hotels. Another juror, an art historian with a doctorate, said she glances at newspapers perhaps twice a week and never watches television.

The large proportion of jurors without opinions of the president or the war is a result of the defense's strategy. Libby's attorneys told potential jurors that Cheney and other senior aides to Bush probably would testify and asked careful questions to determine how jurors would regard the credibility of those important defense witnesses.

By yesterday morning, when the two sides had narrowed an initial pool of 60 potential jurors to 37, a dozen in that group had expressed at least mild disagreement with the administration. Virtually all of them were excluded from the 16 who were seated.

The jury includes a retired math teacher who said he does not always agree with Bush's Iraq policy and is "beginning to have less faith in him" as the war continues. But he emphasized his objectivity and said he does "not make any snap judgments."

During four days of jury selection in Courtroom 16 of the federal courthouse a few blocks from the Capitol, a large number of jury candidates said they were personally acquainted with people involved in the case. In the end, knowing those players did not, in itself, keep them off the jury. Among the jurors is a former Washington Post reporter who once worked for now-Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward, a defense witness, and until recently was a neighbor of NBC's Tim Russert, a prosecution witness.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton told the jury members that he would "semi-sequester" them. He said they could go home each night. But to minimize their contact with other people, he said, they would be picked up at a central location every morning and have breakfast and lunch delivered during the day. He ordered them not to discuss the case with anyone or follow the news.

The jurors do not know which of them have been designated as alternates. All 16 will hear the entire case.

Libby Jury Seated; Arguments May Start Today (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The judge in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. seated a jury of nine women and three men on Monday who are expected to spend a month or longer hearing the case against Vice President Dick Cheney's former top aide.

Mr. Libby, widely known by his nickname Scooter, is charged with lying to a grand jury and to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents who were trying to find out who leaked to journalists the identity of a C.I.A. operative and why. Neither Mr. Libby nor anyone else was charged with disclosing the name of the operative, Valerie Wilson.

Instead, he is charged with lying about the fact that he discussed Ms. Wilson with journalists and thus impeded the investigation.

In addition to the 12 jurors, Judge Reggie M. Walton seated four alternates to replace any of the 12 who may fall ill or have other problems.

All 16 jurors will hear the case, unaware who are alternates, to ensure that they pay attention. The lawyers on both sides and reporters covering the case do know which jurors are which.

The jurors include a woman who said she had worked for decades as a curator of prints and drawings at the Metropolitan Museum of Art and a retired postal worker who said in jury selection that Judge Walton sentenced her son to jail on drug charges years ago.

The jury includes a former reporter for The Washington Post who said his editor was Bob Woodward, a Post journalist who is expected to be a witness in the trial. The former Post reporter also said that until recently he was a neighbor of Tim Russert of NBC News, who is also expected to be a witness.

All the jurors had said they would be able to put aside any feelings about the Bush administration and assess the case fairly.

The jury selection spanned four days, an unusually long time, because so many prospective candidates said they might be biased because they were so strongly critical of the administration, especially Mr. Cheney. The vice president is expected to be a major witness for Mr. Libby.

Explaining that he wanted to shield the jurors from the news media and others at the courthouse who might inadvertently influence them, Judge Walton said jurors would be collected at an undisclosed location and brought in to hear the case.

At each day's end, they will be returned to that location to be dismissed to go home.

Each side is expected to make its opening statements on Tuesday, with Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the prosecutor, first.

He will be followed by Mr. Libby's lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr.

The first witnesses against Mr. Libby may begin testifying on Wednesday.

A Trial To Remember (NYT)

By Stacy Schiff

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Who knew that 12 angry Americans could be so easy to come by — and a jury so difficult to assemble? "It took us all day to get six jurors qualified," Judge Reggie M. Walton lamented last Thursday, after a contentious afternoon of voir dire in the Scooter Libby trial. Judge Walton had hoped to have seated his panel by then; selection took twice as long as expected. Opening arguments are scheduled for today, not the sort of trailer you would normally run before a State of the Union address.

To some minds, a jury has not been the only thing missing from United States of America v. I. Lewis Libby. "In the most important sense, this is a case without a crime," The Wall Street Journal reminded us over the weekend. An artful leap followed: "Yes, Mr. Libby is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, which are serious offenses."

It is true that what began as a search for a leak ended — after much collateral damage — with an indictment for a lie. At this juncture it can be difficult to grasp what, precisely, is on trial. Some of us seem viscerally to wish something else were. While the original investigation stemmed from the charge that a public official had provided accurate information to the press, potential jurors appear more eager to charge a public official with having provided false information to a country. It was, after all, Mr. Libby who drafted the 2003 masterpiece that Colin Powell presented to the United Nations, the one about Iraq's fabled chemical and biological weapons.

Juror 0420, an economist, couldn't help but say she thought the Iraq war "a tremendous mistake, a horrendous mistake, and a betrayal." She could not promise to be objective about Dick Cheney, who is slated to testify.

Juror 0244 reported "strong negative feelings about this current administration and its conduct of the war." He was gone in seconds.

Juror 1140 admitted: “I believe the vice president would have had the defendant leak.” Had she any preconceived notions? “Guilty.”

Juror 1298 felt that she could muster the maturity to be open-minded about Mr. Libby. But when pressed by Judge Walton on whether a witness from the administration would carry “a strike against them,” she replied, “Probably.” Home she went.

Juror 1980 made herself crystal clear: “I cannot believe any statement from the Bush administration.” Bye-bye.

These exchanges produced a little rowdiness over in the press room, where stopwatches were set to see how long a potential juror could last. Remember that door-to-door campaign the president has promised for Baghdad? Those good-will ambassadors might be better deployed in our nation’s capital.

On the stand will be the vagaries of human memory. Hence the carefully crafted questions submitted by Libby’s team for prospective jurors: Can you honestly misremember? Is the memory like a tape recorder, or does it make mistakes? Can you falsely believe someone told you something when it was someone else, at a prior date? Can you hold to your memories even after they are found to be inaccurate?

The defense will contend that Mr. Libby’s recollections were honest, even if incorrect. “Confused, forgot or misremembered” are not crimes. Deliberate lying is; to be convicted, Mr. Libby must be shown to have willfully misled.

He claims to have been preoccupied with vital security issues and buried under intelligence information; he paid little heed to the matter of a C.I.A. officer’s employment. Technically this is called the “Honey, I was too busy preparing the family tax return to think clearly when you asked about the lap dancers” defense.

Surely it’s a legitimate one, if perhaps a little tough to swallow after six years of distorted intelligence and Enron-grade responsibility. Also, is it just me, or does that argument sound disconcertingly familiar? Wasn’t it Mr. Libby’s ex-boss who — when asked why he hadn’t served in Vietnam — replied, “I had other priorities in the ’60s than military service”?

Generally, a memory can prove a dangerous thing to have under this administration. Even I can remember W.M.D., Mohamed Atta, African uranium, shock and awe, mission accomplished, and a heckuva job — and I’m lousy when it comes to plot. The prodigious Mr. Libby, on the other hand, remembers all 79 “Star Trek” episodes. And their titles, too.

Lawmakers Want Polygraph Of Berger Over Stolen 9/11 Documents (FOX)

Fox News, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department should administer a polygraph test to former National Security Adviser Sandy Berger to find out what documents he took from the National Archives in 2002 and 2003, Rep. Tom Davis wrote in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dated Monday.

Davis, ranking Republican on the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, is leading a group of 18 lawmakers who say the Justice Department has been "remarkably incurious" about Berger's decision to remove documents relating to the Sept. 11 commission's inquiry into his role in helping prevent terror attacks during the Clinton administration.

"It is extraordinarily important that the Justice Department avail itself of its rights under the plea agreement and administer a polygraph examination to Mr. Berger to question him about the extent of his thievery. This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead up to the terrorist attacks on the United States," Davis wrote.

The letter was signed by all Republican members of Congress.

Berger admitted to taking documents on two of the four occasions he went to the National Archives to bone up on his responses for the Sept. 11 commission on his inquiry into how intelligence and law enforcement communities failed to prevent the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks on the United States. He said he hid some of them at a construction site near the archives building in Washington.

Berger agreed to take a polygraph test as part of a plea deal reached in September 2005. As part of the guilty plea, he was also sentenced to 100 hours of community service, two years probation, three years of lost security clearance and a $50,000 fine plus court costs.

A report issued two weeks ago by Davis said commission members expressed grave concerns about whether they had received all the relevant information on the Clinton administration's anti-terror activities. Archivists said they will never know what Berger took because none of the pages Berger said he took were inventoried.

At the time of the report, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Added Matt Bennett, a spokesman for Berger attorney Lanny Breuer: "I can state unequivocally that no documents were withheld, and that all documents that Mr. Berger took were disclosed to the Justice Department and the inspector general of the archives."

DOJ_NMG_0120457

But Davis and the other lawmakers said the Justice Department's investigation is incomplete and two Justice Department officials confirmed that a polygraph was never administered despite the department being given the authority to do so.

Former State Official Gets 1 Year Over Documents (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

A former high-level State Department official was sentenced to a year in prison yesterday for keeping more than 3,500 classified documents at his Fairfax County home and concealing his relationship with a Taiwanese intelligence agent.

Prosecutors said Donald W. Keyser possessed far more unauthorized classified documents than any government employee ever prosecuted by the Justice Department. Keyser, 63, is one of the nation's leading experts on China and was a top adviser to Colin L. Powell, former secretary of state.

Yesterday, the government that Keyser served for three decades as a Foreign Service officer said his actions endangered national security. Keyser "allowed himself to be seduced by a female intelligence officer for a foreign government," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman said as he urged a sentence of 18 to 24 months. "This case is about abuse of the public trust, reckless disregard for the government's secrets and reckless disregard for the truth."

Keyser's attorney, Robert S. Litt, recommended a sentence of probation, calling the case "the classic Greek tragedy of a great man brought down by his tragic flaws." But U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria sentenced Keyser to a year and a day in prison. "You said you were just careless," the judge told the former diplomat. "I think the government correctly points out that you did this purposefully."

The sentencing did little to resolve the lingering mystery surrounding the downfall of Keyser, which stunned the Washington diplomatic establishment. When he was first charged in September 2004, the FBI said he had passed documents to Taiwanese agents during covert meetings in the Washington area.

But court papers filed with Keyser's guilty plea in December 2005 did not mention passing any documents, and law enforcement and diplomatic sources said at the time that the case did not involve espionage but rather a government employee who became careless. Keyser pleaded guilty to unlawfully removing classified documents and two counts of making false statements. He admitted to having a "personal relationship" with the Taiwanese agent, Isabelle Cheng, and meeting her on a trip to Taiwan in 2003, a trip he concealed from his supervisors.

Prosecutors later tried to void Keyser's plea agreement, saying he wasn't fully cooperating. They withdrew the motion in December.

Keyser said yesterday that he had only been trying to create a channel of information to Taiwanese intelligence to ensure that the message of U.S. policy toward Taiwan was getting through. "What I was doing was to further U.S. interests. It was not to further Taiwan's interests," he told Ellis. "I know that some people believe that I was some kind of agent. I want to stress in the strongest possible terms that I was not."

Laufman questioned Keyser's explanations, saying it was "curious" that Keyser never mentioned his planned outreach to Taiwanese intelligence to his supervisors.

But prosecutors offered no alternative explanation. "Your honor, we may never really know why Donald Keyser committed the acts that bring him before this court," Laufman concluded.

Former U.S. Diplomat Gets Year In Prison For Taiwan Affair (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- A former top State Department official was sentenced to a year in prison Monday for mishandling classified documents and concealing his relationship with a female intelligence officer from Taiwan.

Donald W. Keyser, 63, of Fairfax, had been the second-ranking official in the State Department's Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs before retiring in 2004.

Prosecutors at one point considered bringing espionage-related charges against Keyser but eventually settled on a plea bargain involving lesser counts--making false official statements and unlawful removal of classified documents from the State Department.

At his sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court, Keyser admitted to egregiously bad judgment in striking up a personal relationship with 35-year-old Isabelle Cheng, a known intelligence officer with Taiwan's National Intelligence Bureau whom he first met in 2002.

But Keyser rejected any accusation that he was acting as an agent of Taiwan or that he compromised U.S. interests.

"Ms. Cheng ... never sought from me or received from me any unauthorized information," Keyser said.

Prosecutors never charged Keyser with disclosing classified information to Taiwan, but it was clear from Monday's hearing that they remain suspicious of his activities. Court records indicate that Keyser failed polygraph tests when he was quizzed about a secret trip he took to Taiwan in September 2003 to meet Cheng.

Keyser's refusal to disclose this trip to his superiors, along with his failure to disclose his relationship with Cheng, formed the basis for his conviction on making false statements.

Keyser "exposed himself to compromise and blackmail by hostile intelligence services," prosecutor David Laufman said during the hearing. "We may never know why Donald Keyser committed the acts which bring him here today."

Although much of the evidence in the case is under seal, prosecutors were particularly concerned about e-mails Keyser sent to Cheng suggesting that one U.S. official was "ripe for recruitment" and that another individual was "a rare orchid to be cultivated and nurtured," presumably for recruitment as a spy.

Keyser and his lawyer, Robert Litt, said the government was misconstruing the e-mails.

Prosecutors had sought a sentence of 18 to 24 months, while Litt urged Judge T.S. Ellis III to sentence Keyser to probation.

Jail Sentence For Diplomat In Spy Case (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — A longtime high-ranking official at the State Department was sentenced to just over a year in jail yesterday for keeping thousands of classified documents at his home and for lying about his personal relationship with a younger Taiwanese diplomat.

In late 2005, the former deputy chief of the State Department's East Asian and Pacific Affairs Bureau, Donald Keyser, pleaded guilty to three felony charges stemming from an investigation into his contacts with the Taiwanese agent, Isabelle Cheng.

Judge Thomas Ellis of Alexandria, Va., imposed the sentence after a lengthy hearing yesterday. According to court records, the judge ordered Keyser to spend a year and a day in jail and two years on supervised release, and to pay a fine of $25,000.

Keyser had asked not to be sent to jail. He submitted a sheaf of letters from former colleagues praising him for his selfless devotion to America during more than three decades in the Foreign Service.

" Mr. Keyser had an absolute obligation to safeguard the classified information entrusted to him and utterly failed to do so. His sentence of imprisonment is a warning to others in positions of public trust," the U.S. attorney overseeing the case, Chuck Rosenberg, said in a written statement.

Keyser's sentencing was delayed repeatedly after prosecutors accused him of failing to keep his promise to cooperate in debriefings with the FBI. They also alleged that polygraph tests showed that Keyser was not telling the government the full truth about what transpired.

'Girls Gone Wild' Producer Gets Heavier-than-expected Sentence (LAT)

By Claire Hoffman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

The community service is piling up for "Girls Gone Wild" mogul Joe Francis.

The producer of racy videos featuring young — and often naked — women was sentenced today to 200 hours of community service over two years by a federal judge in Los Angeles and was placed on two years probation for failing to adequately document the ages of his subjects. The amount of time was double what Francis' lawyers had sought.

The heavier-than-expected sentence is the second time that a federal judge has come down hard in sentencing Francis. In December, in Panama City, Fla., a federal judge sentenced Francis' company Mantra Films Inc. to serve 32 hours of monthly community service for 30 months.

The sentencing stems from a plea agreement Francis made with the Department of Justice in September, when he admitted to shooting underage women in his videos and pleaded guilty to two felony counts of violating federal record-keeping laws.

Those laws govern the way in which producers of adult material document the ages of performers in sexually explicit videos and are intended to hinder the sexual exploitation of children.

In addition, Francis has greed to pay $500,000 in fines in California, with his company paying an additional $1.6 million in fines in Florida in a related case.

U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak in Panama City, Fla. said at the time that the financial burden of the agreed upon fines would make little impact on the wealthy 33-year-old entrepreneur. Smoak asked Francis to shoulder the majority of the time served in Florida. Francis attorney Aaron Dyer said he had appealed the community service sentence.

Outside the courthouse, Francis said he was relieved the process was over and that he now felt free to say that he had been unfairly persecuted by the Justice Department.

"Of course I've been unfairly targeted by the government," Francis said. "What better target than Joe Francis?"

Judges Cannot Add Years To Prisoners' Sentences, High Court Rules (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court today struck down a part of California's 30-year-old sentencing law, which allows judges to add several years to a criminal's prison term.

The ruling could mean new sentencing hearings for several thousand state prisoners who were recently given longer terms. If their sentences are still being appealed, they can take advantage of today's ruling.

But the decision does not necessarily mean they will get lighter sentences.

Indeed, the Supreme Court's interest was not in whether prison terms are too long or too short, but rather how they are decided.

In a 6-3 ruling, the justices said California's sentencing law is flawed because it promises defendants a "middle term" prison term when they have been convicted of a crime, but it then allows judges to impose a much longer term based on "facts" decided by the judge alone. This extra prison time violates the defendant's right to a trial by jury, the court said.

Paradoxically, the solution may be to give judges even more authority to decide on a prison sentence, the high court said.

"The ball lies in California's court," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, apparently referring to the state Supreme Court. It could follow the lead of other states and "call upon the jury — either at trial or in a separate sentencing proceeding — to find any fact necessary to the imposition of an elevated sentence," she said.

Or it could do the opposite and "permit judges genuinely to exercise broad discretion with a statutory range" to impose a sentence, she said.

This curious result is the latest in a series of rulings in this decade in which the high court, though badly divided, has sought to readjust the balance between judges and juries when it comes to deciding prison sentences.

An odd coalition of its liberal and conservative blocs, led by Justices John Paul Stevens and Antonin Scalia, has moved to strike down sentences that were imposed based on facts found by the trial judges, not the jury.

In a New Jersey case, a defendant pleaded guilty to firing a shot into his neighbor's house, a crime with a 10-year maximum prison term. However, the judge sentenced the defendant, Charles Apprendi, to 12 years in prison after finding it was a racially motivated hate crime.

In a 5-4 decision in 2000, the court struck down the extra two years of prison time, saying the jury should have decided whether this behavior was a hate crime.

Since then, the court has struggled to decide whether this principle applies to midterm sentences, not just those that exceed the legal maximum for the crime.

The California case split the two new appointees. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. joined the Scalia-Stevens bloc to say California's system is flawed. Also joining the ruling were Justices David H. Souter and Clarence Thomas.

Meanwhile, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. spoke for the dissenters. He noted that the Supreme Court, with Ginsburg in the majority, had upheld the federal sentencing system two years ago by concluding its guidelines were advisory, not mandatory.

California's system is quite similar, he said. "The California sentencing law that the court strikes down today is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect from the advisory guideline scheme (in the federal system) that the court approved" two years ago, Alito said.

Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer voted with Alito.

In a separate dissent, Kennedy explained the difficulty of applying the court's new rule. Juries can decide some facts, such as whether a weapon was used or whether a large quantity of drugs was involved, he said. California's law refers to these facts as "sentence enhancements," and jurors are called upon to decide these facts.

But other facts are subjective. For example, did the defendant show remorse or cooperate with the prosecutors? "These are facts that should be taken into account at sentencing," but it makes sense for them to be "found by the judge," Kennedy wrote.

Prior to 1977, California's law set a maximum prison term for each crime and allowed judges and parole officials to decide how long a criminal would stay behind bars.

The new law replaced those open-ended prison terms with more precisely defined crimes and prison terms. For each crime, the law sets a lower, middle and upper term sentence.

The law also said the judge "shall order imposition of the middle term," unless the judge decides certain "aggravating circumstances" call for the upper term. Ginsburg pointed to this "shall order" mandate as the flaw that makes California's system unconstitutional.

Today's ruling, in Cunningham vs. California, could mean a slightly shorter sentence for a Northern California man who was convicted of sexually abusing his child over several years.

This crime had a middle term of 12 years in prison, but the judge imposed the upper term of 16 years after finding the defendant was violent, a danger to the community and had perpetrated his crime against a vulnerable child.

In another California case, the court today refused to hear appeals from a former Carson official who was sentenced to 41 months in prison for federal corruption charges.

Roderick Keith McDonald, who served three terms on the West Basin Municipal Water District board, argued that federal prosecutors tried him in Orange County instead of Los Angeles County to keep blacks off the jury. McDonald, who is black, is the son of Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Torrance). She was not implicated in the crime.

The court, which has never ruled on whether a trial's venue could violate a defendant's constitutional right to due process, declined to take up the case. McDonald had enlisted former Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr and Eric Holder, who served in the Clinton Justice Department, to argue his case.

McDonald was convicted on 10 counts, including conspiracy to commit extortion, bribery and money laundering. Jurors acquitted McDonald on one count of mail fraud, two counts each of bribery and money laundering and told the judge they were split on eight counts.

Prosecutors said McDonald gave bribes to Carson City Council members for approving contracts. His sentence runs to Dec. 31, 2008.

In court filings, his lawyers argued that prosecutors moved his trial to Orange County, where the jury pool is only 2% African American, and not for the other Carson officials ensnared in the corruption case.

Ruling's Effect On California Inmates Is Probably Limited (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 22 — The Supreme Court decision on Monday that invalidated California's criminal sentencing law would probably affect only a small slice of the state's convicted felon population.

Over 90 percent of criminal cases here are resolved in plea agreements, which would be immune to challenges. Further, felons sentenced to life terms and those convicted under the state's three-strikes law would not be able to argue for an adjusted sentence.

But in a state with 173,000 inmates, thousands could be affected, lawmakers and criminal justice experts said, as they worked to puzzle out what the court's ruling meant and how to address it legislatively.

"We are very disappointed today," David LaBahn, the executive director of the California District Attorneys Association, said of the court's decision that the 30-year-old sentencing law gave judges authority that the Constitution places with juries. Mr. LaBahn added that prosecutors in the state would now move to force jury trials over plea bargains in some criminal cases.

"Will that slow down the trials?" Mr. LaBahn said, "Yes it will. Will there be arguments between prosecutors and defense lawyers over bifurcating the trial and sentencing portion? Yes. Some judges are going to be grumpy because it will add court days, but our folks will do what is right and just."

The ruling comes at a time when the state's Legislature is trying to come up with a solution to the problem of crowding in the state's prisons. Both Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Senate majority leader have proposed establishing a sentencing commission to address the issue.

The governor issued a statement saying that his office was trying to determine the impact of the ruling, adding: "I support longer sentences for criminals who deserve them. As governor, I will work to ensure that this decision will not be a threat to public safety."

Calif. Criminal Sentencing Law Tossed (USAT)

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court struck down California's criminal sentencing law Monday, saying it violated defendants' right to a jury trial by giving judges too much power to toughen sentences. The decision could require new sentences for thousands of convicts in the nation's largest state prison system.

The 6-3 ruling in the case of a California man who sexually abused his son reflects a seven-year trend in which the high court has limited judges' discretion in sentencing. The ruling ensures that juries, not judges, determine any aggravating factors, such as the viciousness of the act or the vulnerability of a victim, that increase prison time.

"This court has repeatedly held that … any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by a jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the majority.

The court's previous decisions on the issue were decided by a five-justice majority, with then-chief justice William Rehnquist regularly dissenting. On Monday, Chief Justice John Roberts, who joined the court after Rehnquist's death in 2005, voted with the majority to produce a six-justice bloc favoring limits on judges' authority.

At least nine states have changed their sentencing laws to meet the Supreme Court's jury requirement, which was most firmly established in a 2004 decision.

"It's possible that thousands of cases would have to be retried for the enhanced sentence," said California Attorney General Jerry Brown, who was governor in 1977 when the state's sentencing law took effect.

John Cunningham was convicted in 2003 of continuous sexual abuse of a child under 14. His son had lived with the boy's mother for his early years, then moved in with Cunningham and Cunningham's girlfriend when he was 10.

Under California's three-tier sentencing scheme, the crime warranted one of three terms — six, 12 or 16 years — depending on its severity. In Cunningham's case, the rules dictated that the judge sentence him to 12 years unless the judge found additional aggravating factors, such as great bodily harm to the victim. The judge gave Cunningham a 16-year sentence.

The sentence was upheld by a state appeals court, but Ginsburg said the four-year increase in Cunningham's sentence violated his Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial.

The justices rejected arguments by California officials that the state's sentencing system was flexible like the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines the justices narrowly upheld in 2005. Seven months earlier, in June 2004, the high court had invalidated a Washington state sentencing regime and cast doubt on several systems that allowed judges to determine aggravating factors.

As to how the California system can be fixed, Ginsburg wrote, "the ball lies in California's court."

Ginsburg said California can now have the jury find any facts necessary for a tougher sentence — as seven states have done — or write new legislation that gives judges broad discretion within a statutory range, which at least two states have done.

Dissenting were Justices Anthony Kennedy, Stephen Breyer and Samuel Alito.

Court Constrains Judges' Power In Sentencing (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The Supreme Court invalidated California's criminal sentencing law on Monday, ruling that the 30-year-old statute gave judges authority that the Constitution places with juries.

The 6-to-3 decision will require the California courts to reconsider thousands of sentences as the Legislature contemplates its options for amending the statute to meet the justices' objections.

While no other state is directly affected, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's forcefully worded majority opinion demonstrated that the Roberts court is committed to carrying out the full implications of the revolution in criminal sentencing that the court began seven years ago in Apprendi v. New Jersey.

In fact, with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. joining the majority, the court planted its stake more firmly than ever in what criminal law scholars and practitioners have taken to referring to as Apprendi-land.

That decision invalidated New Jersey's hate-crime statute, which gave judges the power to make the specific factual findings that converted an ordinary crime into a hate crime, with an enhanced sentence. The court ruled that the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury gave that role to juries.

That decision was followed four years later by Blakely v. Washington, which invalidated Washington's sentencing guidelines for giving judges the power to impose sentences beyond the normal range based on specific findings about the defendant's conduct.

And two years ago, in United States v. Booker, the court applied that reasoning to the federal sentencing guidelines, ruling that the guidelines could be deemed constitutional only if they were regarded as "advisory" rather than mandatory.

All three cases were decided by 5-to-4 margins, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist a consistent dissenter from the court's Sixth Amendment analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0120462

So Chief Justice Roberts's vote with the majority on Monday strengthened the court's Apprendi majority, which cuts across the court's normal ideological lines and in addition to Justice Ginsburg consists of Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, David H. Souter and Clarence Thomas.

Writing the principal dissenting opinion on Monday, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. stepped into the shoes of his predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a strong dissenter from all the Apprendi cases. Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer also dissented.

Douglas A. Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University and a leading authority on sentencing, said the decision confirmed the Supreme Court as "the most liberal, pro-defendant court in the country on sentencing procedure."

The California law represented an early legislative effort to make sentences more uniform and predictable, an effort that Congress picked up when it adopted the federal guidelines system in 1984. Under California's previous system, judges imposed open-ended sentences, often one year to life, and left it to the parole board to determine the time an offender would actually serve.

The 1977 law adopted what is known as a determinate-sentencing approach. Each crime carried three possible sentences. The middle sentence was presumed to be the correct one unless the judge made findings that justified the higher or lower alternatives.

As the Supreme Court proceeded with the Apprendi cases, the California law looked increasingly vulnerable.

In the case the court decided on Monday, the law was challenged by a former police officer, John Cunningham, who was convicted of sexually abusing his young son and who received the longest of the three sentences, 16 years as opposed to the other options, 12 and 6 years.

The judge found that six aggravating factors, including the victim's vulnerability and the defendant's violent conduct, merited the highest sentence.

The California Court of Appeal upheld the sentence, ruling that the Sixth Amendment concerns were satisfied as long as the judge issued a sentence within the statutory range, in this instance 6 to 16 years.

That was not the correct analysis, Justice Ginsburg said in her majority opinion, Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551. She said the California law presented the judge not with a range, but with a "triad." The judge "had no discretion to select a sentence within a range of 6 to 16 years," Justice Ginsburg continued, adding:

"His instruction was to select 12 years, nothing less and nothing more, unless he found facts allowing the imposition of a sentence of 6 or 16 years. Factfinding to elevate a sentence from 12 to 16 years, our decisions make plain, falls within the province of the jury."

The California sentencing law, Justice Ginsburg concluded, "violates Apprendi's bright-line rule."

In his dissent, Justice Alito said that, to the contrary, the California system was "not meaningfully different" from the remedy the court endorsed, with Justice Ginsburg's concurrence, two years ago in the Booker case, on the federal sentencing guidelines.

By rendering the federal sentencing guidelines advisory, Justice Alito said, the court in the Booker case necessarily gave judges discretion to make factual findings to support their choice of sentence, a choice the court made subject to appellate review for "reasonableness."

Therefore, he said, the Booker decision "necessarily stands for the proposition that it is consistent with the Sixth Amendment for the imposition of an enhanced sentence to be conditioned on a factual finding made by a sentencing judge and not by a jury."

Next month in Rita v. United States, No. 06-5754, the court will hear arguments on whether a federal sentence within the guidelines range should be presumed to be reasonable.

Supreme Court Strikes Down California's Sentencing Law (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The U.S. Supreme Court yesterday struck down California's sentencing law and strongly reaffirmed the court's view that judges may not impose tough prison time based on factors that have not been determined by a jury.

The 6 to 3 decision orders California to overhaul its method of sentencing criminal defendants, which could mean shorter prison terms for thousands of state prisoners. For other states and the federal government, it was the latest in a series of rulings going back to 2000 that restrict a judge's ability to find the aggravating factors that would allow for tougher sentences.

"This court has repeatedly held that, under the Sixth Amendment, any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by the jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the majority.

It was a majority that gives credence to the justices' often-made complaint about attempts to peg them as either liberal or conservative.

The prevailing side in Cunningham v. California consisted of Ginsburg, Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia, John Paul Stevens and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. The newest justice, Samuel A. Alito Jr., wrote a dissent that was joined by Stephen G. Breyer and Anthony M. Kennedy, who also filed a separate dissent.

Roberts's decision to join the majority is especially important, according to Marquette University law professor Michael O'Hear and others who follow criminal justice issues; his predecessor, William H. Rehnquist, was on the other side. "Roberts's acceptance of jury-trial rights" means a solid majority exists for the future, O'Hear said.

The court's move began with Apprendi v. New Jersey, in which a 5 to 4 majority said that "any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."

The court expanded the finding in a 2004 ruling regarding the state of Washington, and in 2005 the court found federal mandatory-sentencing laws unconstitutional. The court held that to remedy the system, the mandatory guidelines must become advisory and appellate courts must review them for reasonableness.

Alito argued that California's law met the standards the court had set for the federal system. "The California sentencing law that the court strikes down today is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect" from the remedy the court offered in 2005, Alito wrote.

From the beginning, Kennedy and Breyer have opposed the court's resistance to systems that allow judicial discretion.

The debate may seem procedural rather than substantive, but the case that arrived at the court shows the impact.

Police officer John Cunningham was convicted in 2003 of molesting his young son, who had come to live with him and his girlfriend. Under California's Determinate Sentencing Law, Cunningham's crime was punishable by six, 12 or 16 years in prison. The law said that Cunningham should receive the middle term unless the judge found one or more "circumstances in aggravation."

The judge found six aggravating circumstances, including violent conduct, the boy's vulnerability and threats he made against his son. The only thing that the judge found in Cunningham's favor was that he had never been arrested before; he was sentenced to 16 years.

"We reserve that disposition because the four-year sentence elevation, based solely on a judge's fact-finding, denied Cunningham his Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury," Ginsburg read from the bench.

As for a remedy, Ginsburg said, "the ball lies in California's court." She noted that some states have responded to the court's rulings by amending their determinate sentencing laws to involve the jury in finding any facts that could elevate the sentence. Others have "chosen to permit judges to genuinely exercise broad discretion within a statutory range . . . without a mandatory middle," she said.

The court yesterday also unanimously struck down a lower court's decision that made it harder for prisoners to bring lawsuits alleging mistreatment. Jones v. Bock is one of many cases arising from the federal Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995 to cut down on prisoner lawsuits.

Supreme Court Rejects California Sentencing Law (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 23, 2007

The Supreme Court on Monday struck down California's sentencing law because it gives judges too much power to increase sentences based on facts not found by the jury.

The 6-3 ruling in California v. Cunningham may throw into uncertainty a segment of recent sentences imposed in California under the state's 1977 sentencing law.

"California has some work to do, but it should not cause havoc in the courts," says Stanford Law School professor Jeffrey Fisher, who wrote a brief in the case for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and is a key strategist in challenges to sentencing laws. Fisher said defendants on direct review should get a "fresh look" at their sentences as a result of the ruling Monday.

The decision also signals that the newly constituted Roberts Court is committed to the Apprendi line of cases, which, since 2000, have recalibrated the balance between judges and juries in the sentencing process and upended both state and federal sentencing laws. In Apprendi v. New Jersey, the Court held that any fact that increases a sentence beyond certain parameters set forth in the sentencing statute must be determined by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt.

"Because the [California law] authorizes the judge, not the jury, to find the facts permitting an upper-term sentence, the system cannot withstand measurement against our Sixth Amendment precedents," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the majority.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. voted with the majority upholding the Apprendi precedents, whereas his predecessor William Rehnquist opposed the recent sentencing decisions. Justice Samuel Alito Jr. dissented Monday, as his predecessor Sandra Day O'Connor probably would have. Justice Anthony Kennedy, joined by Justice Stephen Breyer, also dissented, asserting, "In my view, the Apprendi line of cases remains incorrect."

At issue Monday was the case of John Cunningham, convicted in 2003 of repeatedly molesting his son. Under the law, his offense carried a prison term of six, 12 or 16 years. The judge is obliged to pick the middle sentence unless he can find aggravating circumstances justifying the upper level. In Cunningham's case, the judge found six aggravating circumstances and gave Cunningham the higher sentence. California appeals courts upheld the higher sentence, setting the stage for Supreme Court review.

Ginsburg's ruling did not specify how California should repair its sentencing law, but it pointed to a dozen other states that have modified their sentencing laws to respond to the Apprendi precedents. Some have placed more of the fact-finding with the jury, while others have given judges discretion within a statutory range.

"California may follow the paths taken by its sister states or otherwise alter its system, so long as the state observes Sixth Amendment limitations declared in this Court's decisions," Ginsburg wrote.

Former California Attorney General John Van de Kamp, of counsel at Dewey Ballantine, says the ruling "will certainly spark a lot of debate on overall sentencing policies in California." But he says the ruling will actually affect only a small number of criminal cases in the state.

Supreme Court's Striking Down Of California Sentencing Law Could Mean Shorter Prison Sentences (AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The U.S. Supreme Court struck down California's sentencing law Monday, reaffirming limits on judges' discretion and presaging shorter sentences for thousands of state prisoners.

The 6-3 ruling effectively shaves four years off the 16-year sentence of former police officer John Cunningham, who was convicted of sexually abusing his son.

It is the latest in a series of high court rulings over the past seven years that limit judges' discretion in sentencing defendants. The court has held repeatedly that a judge may not increase a defendant's sentence based on factors that were not determined by a jury.

"This court has repeatedly held that, under the Sixth Amendment, any fact that exposes a defendant to a greater potential sentence must be found by the jury, not a judge, and established beyond a reasonable doubt, not merely by a preponderance of the evidence," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote for the court, referring to an article in the U.S. Constitution.

Several states have changed their sentencing laws to require prosecutors to prove to a jury aggravating factors that could lead to longer sentences.

California had argued that a 2005 state Supreme Court decision interpreting the state's Determinate Sentencing Law effectively brought the state into compliance with the U.S. high court's rulings. The law instructs judges to sentence inmates to the middle of three options, unless factors exist that justify the shorter or longer prison term.

The state warned that its criminal justice system would be burdened by having to re-sentence thousands of inmates.

Rather than prescribing a way to fix the law, Ginsburg said, "The ball lies in California's court."

Justice Samuel Alito said in dissent that California's law "is indistinguishable in any constitutionally significant respect" from the federal sentencing guidelines that have been approved by the Supreme Court.

There were just under a quarter-million felony convictions in the state in 2005. Data from the 1980s cited by the California Supreme Court suggests that roughly 15 percent of cases involving just one felony count result in sentences in which a judge, not a jury, finds an aggravating factor to justify the additional punishment.

But Peter Gold, Cunningham's lawyer, told the court that in many cases the standard term and longer option differ by just a year. In practical terms, many of those who might be affected by Wednesday's ruling might already have finished serving their time in prison.

Several justices suggested during oral argument in October that the state could tweak the law, rather than overhaul it, to remove constitutional violations.

Nine other states urged the court to uphold the California law.

Letting Juries Judge (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT on Monday overturned the 16-year prison sentence of a former California police officer convicted of molesting his 10-year-old son. Much as Californians may resent this ruling, which comes in a heinous case and could potentially trigger challenges to thousands of sentences, we should have seen it coming.

In theory, there's a neat division of labor between judges and juries in criminal trials. Juries decide whether a defendant did the crime; judges decide whether the defendant will do the time, and how much.

In reality, judges over the years have engaged in some serious fact-finding of their own in deciding how much punishment to mete out — too much fact-finding, in the view of the 21st century Supreme Court. In a series of decisions beginning in 2000, the high court has ruled that any fact connected to a crime that leads to a higher sentence "must be submitted to a jury and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."

John Cunningham of Contra Costa County, who won his appeal Monday, received 16 rather than the prescribed 12 years in prison because of aggravating factors, including the "great violence" of his conduct. Those findings were made not by a jury but by a judge, as provided for in California's 1977 Uniform Determinate Sentencing Act. Writing for the court, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg reasoned that because California law "authorizes the judge, not the jury, to find the facts permitting an upper-term sentence, the system cannot withstand measurement against our 6th Amendment precedent."

In their last major pronouncement in this area in 2005, the justices, while striking down mandatory federal sentencing rules, said that such guidelines could nevertheless remain on the books if they were used as an "advisory" resource for judges. But on Monday, six of nine justices rejected the argument that the rules that produced Cunningham's higher sentence fell into that same flexible category.

Like its previous recent decisions on judicial sentencing, the ruling leaves both legislatures and judges considerable leeway. Legislatures can still establish minimum and maximum sentences, and judges (if state law allows) can choose a particular sentence based on characteristics of the perpetrator, including previous convictions.

But it is clearer than ever that if sentencing depends on the particular facts of the crime, then it is up to the jury, not the judge, to make that call.

Feds: Prison Cost-cutter Took Bribes (OREG)

By ASHBEL S. GREEN

The Oregonian, January 23, 2007

Allegations - Agents link the food purchaser for Oregon corrections to a four-year kickback scheme

Federal agents found more than $450,000 in cash in the home and safety deposit box of an Oregon prison official accused of taking bribes from companies that sell food for inmates' meals and snacks.

Farhad "Fred" Monem, who earns $75,500 a year as the food service administrator for the Oregon Department of Corrections, was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his home and office Jan. 10.

A federal judge Friday unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme and detail what agents discovered during their searches.

Monem's lawyer declined to comment Monday. No charges have been filed against Monem or others allegedly involved.

Federal prosecutors declined to discuss a timeline for arrests in the bribery scheme, which they allege included Monem's wife, Karen, and officials from food distributors and brokers in California, New York and Maryland.

Monem, 48, was considered a whiz kid at the prison system, credited with saving the state millions of dollars because of his shrewd working of the commodities market. Prison officials praised Monem for reducing the daily cost of prison food from $2.88 to $2.30, third lowest in the nation.

One food broker praised Monem's business savvy in a March 2002 profile in The Oregonian.

"He'll let you earn a living, but you're not going to get rich off him," said Doug Levene of 21st Century Supply.

Levene, who could not be reached for comment Monday, is one of several food industry officials accused in federal court records of taking part in a bribery scheme that included splashy Las Vegas casino meetings, a junket to a football game in Chicago between the Bears and the Green Bay Packers and the creation of a shell company allegedly controlled by Karen Monem.

Court records single out Levin & Lawrence, Inc., a wholesale food distributor based in Santa Clarita, Calif. The company buys bulk food, some of it labeled "distressed" because it was close to the expiration date, marks it up and resells it for a profit.

Ex-cons Duped Secretary In Coke Case, Lawyer Says But Feds Say Facts Show She Was In Cahoots With Accomplices (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 23, 2007

Prosecutors opened their case in the Coke secrets trial Monday by vowing to prove that former secretary Joya Williams conspired with two accomplices to try to sell product samples and confidential documents for more than $1 million.

"This case is about greed and poor choices," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Chartash.

But Williams' defense attorney, Janice Singer, said her client was taken advantage of by two lying ex-cons.

She said Williams copied and took home various work materials for innocent reasons and never intended for them to fall into the hands of the alleged accomplices.

One of them, Edmond Duhaney of Decatur, who is testifying for the prosecution, took the stand for a short time Monday before the court broke for lunch. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy in October and hasn't been sentenced. His testimony is expected to resume later Monday.

According to prosecutors, here's how the case unfolded:

An executive at archrival PepsiCo got a letter in May 2006 from someone named Dirk, who said he had four years' worth of detailed marketing records from Coke.

Dirk said the "very detailed and confidential information" would "ensure your company gains a very decisive position in the cola wars." The letter said some of the information involved Coke Blak, a new Coke-infused coffee product introduced by the company last year.
